[On appeal from the High Court of Judicature at Bombay.]

Present :

VISCOUNT MAUGHAM, LORD WRIGHT, AND SIR GEORGE RANKIN.

• SHANKARRAO DAGADUJIRAO JAHAGIRDAR

v.

SHAMBHU NATHU PATIL.

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879), Secs. 83, 135 J—Permanent tenancy—Presumption—Antiquity of tenancy—Proof of origin of tenancy—Enhancement of rent paid by permanent tenant—Tenancy for agricultural purposes—Presumption as to permanency of tenancy—Record of Rights, entry in—Presumption as to its truth—Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Sec. 13—Kulkarni, statement by, as to character of tenancy—Relevancy of statement—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Secs. 100, 101—Second appeal—Findings of fact.

The particular presumption mentioned in s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, is not directed to be made save upon two conditions (among others) : first, that there is no satisfactory evidence of the date of the commencement of the tenancy, and, secondly, that this lack is due to the antiquity of the tenancy. The first condition is not excluded by showing that the tenancy had its origin at some date within a period of twenty years which cannot be more precisely ascertained. This is not satisfactory evidence of the date of its commencement. By a tenancy's antiquity the section does not intend any reference to remote ages in the past or to "time immemorial" in the sense of the English law. It is to be given the practical meaning appropriate to its context and afforded by the limits within which living testimony to past facts is necessarily restricted.

Hence, where lands are held under tenancies which are not proved to have been in existence before 1892, the presumption under s. 83 cannot properly be applied to them, notwithstanding that the evidence by no means excludes the possibility of an earlier origin.

An entry in the Record of Rights that a tenant has permanent interest in the land is presumed to be true by virtue of s. 135 J of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879. Proper effect should be given to such a statutory presumption. The presumption is not weakened by the mere consideration that when the record was made the landlord was a minor and his property was being managed by the Collector on his behalf, nor does the fact that at the time of the preparation of the record the permanency of the interest of the tenants was not disputed in any way detract from the force of the presumption.

Where the existence of a Record of Right does not appear from the judgment of the first appellate Court to have been appreciated by it and no effect whatever has been given to the statutory presumption under s. 135 J of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, the questions of fact as well as of law are open to the High Court on second appeal and can be considered by the Privy Council on appeal.

The fact that a tenancy is for agricultural purposes does not prima facie indicate that it is permanent or indeed that it is more than an annual tenancy. The inference of permanence is an inference which it is difficult to make and which requires the presence of circumstances explicable when taken as a whole only on the hypothesis of permanence.

A statement by the kulkarni of a village as to the character of a tenancy right in the village is admissible in evidence under s. 13 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

The findings of fact, though not the conclusions as to their effect in law, are prima facie conclusive in second appeal in view of ss. 100 and 101 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

Dhanna Mal v. Moti Sagar,<sup>3</sup> followed.

Held, also, that there were circumstances in the case sufficient to show that the presumption in favour of the truth of the Record of Rights derived support from a number of independent considerations the cumulative effect of which should be regarded as strong.

The fact that the tenancies were granted for the purpose of agriculture could not be regarded as sufficient either in fact or in law to negative the conclusion indicated by so many strong circumstances that the tenancies were of a permanent character.

EJECTMENT suit.

The plaintiff, Shankarrao, was the inamdar of the village of Khed Digar in Shahada taluka in the district of West Khandesh.

The inam was granted in 1798 by the Holkar who governed the place. It was confirmed in 1843 by the British Government who succeeded Holkar. The Government of Bombay issued a sanad to plaintiff's father in 1880.

The plaintiff's father Dagdujirao succeeded to the inam in 1857 and held it till his death in 1904. The plaintiff was then a minor of eight years. His estate, inclusive of the inam, passed into the management of the Collector of West Khandesh, who was appointed the guardian. The Collector's management lasted from 1909 to 1917. In 1917, the plaintiff attained majority.

The village lands included in the plaintiff's inam aggregated to 1195 acres. Out of these lands measuring 770 acres 9 gunthas were in the occupation of Shambhu (defendant) as a tenant. Other lands of smaller dimensions were in the occupation of defendants in other appeals. The defendant's tenancy originated somewhere between the years 1857 and 1892. After the year 1892 all the tenants were shown to be in occupation of their lands.

At first the out-bandhi system prevailed in the village. The term out meant a plough; and it was applied to the unit of lands which could be cultivated by a plough and a pair of bullocks. The lands in the possession of the defendants admeasured forty-four outs. The rent fixed for each out was originally Rs. 4 if the tenant was a Bhil, and Rs. 6 if the tenant belonged to any other class. After 1890 the rent was raised to a uniform rate of Rs. 12 per out. In 1909, while the village was under the management of the Collector, survey was introduced into the village; and the rent payable to the inamdar was fixed at one rupee per acre. In the year 1917-18 revision survey came into force, when the rent was raised to Rs. 1-6-0 per acre.

In the year 1915 the record of rights of the village was prepared. In that record, the defendant as well as other tenants were shown as occupants of the lands in their possession.

On November 23, 1927, the plaintiff gave notices to the defendant and other tenants to quit the lands in their occupation on March 31, 1928. The tenants failed to comply with the notices.

On June 26, 1928, the plaintiff filed a suit to eject the defendant from the lands. He filed similar suits against other defendants.

The defendant contended inter alia that all the lands in the suit were in his vahivat from generation to generation on payment of a fixed sum of assessment and the defendant had the right to retain the vahivat as such. He also contended that after the introduction of survey into the village his name was entered as a khatedar of the lands.

The trial Court held that as the plaintiff was only a grantee of the royal share of the revenue of the village he was not entitled to evict the defendant. It also held that the plaintiff was not estopped by the entries made in the revenue record after the survey of the village lands from contending that the defendant was not an occupant of the lands in his possession. The suit was accordingly dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

The appeal was heard by N. J. Wadia and Macklin JJ., on October 4, 1934, when the following judgment was delivered.

N. J. WADIA J. These six appeals arise out of suits filed by Shankarrao bin Dagdurao Matkar, the inamdar of the village of Khed Digar in the Shahada taluka of the West Khandesh District against certain persons who, according to him, were his annual tenants and from whom he sought to recover possession of lands which they had refused to hand over to him after proper notice had been given. In First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 the inamdar's suit was dismissed by the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia. In the second appeals (Nos. 405 to 409 of 1931) decrees were passed in favour of the plaintiff by the Joint Subordinate Judge of Nandurbar and were confirmed in appeal by the District Judge of West Khandesh. The inamdar is the appellant in First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 and the defendants tenants are the appellants in the five second appeals. The principal questions involved in all the six appeals are the same, and I propose therefore to deal with all of them in one judgment.

In all the suits the defendants contended that the inamdar was not the owner of the soil but had only the right to recover revenue, that the defendants and their ancestors had been in possession of the lands for several generations, that they had rights over the lands similar to those of holders in unalienated villages, and that they were not liable to be dispossessed so long as they paid the amounts fixed for assessment.

The questions which arise for consideration in these appeals are, firstly, whether the inamdar was a grantee of the soil or only of the royal share of the revenue; secondly, whether the defendants have proved that by reason of the antiquity of their tenancy and owing to want of evidence of the period of its intended duration they are entitled to the benefit of the presumption arising under s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879) and to be treated as permanent tenants; and, thirdly, whether, even if the defendants are not entitled to the benefit of s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, they prove that the conduct of the parties over a long period of years has been such as to justify an inference that there was an implied agreement on the part of the inamdar to treat them as permanent tenants.

With regard to the nature of the inam granted to the plaintiff, we have two documents of 1798—exhibits 110 and 109. Exhibit 110 is a letter written by Shree Mhalsakant Kashirao the son of Tukoji Holker to Rajeshri Narayanrao Yadav Kamdar of Pargana Sultanpur. It states that the village of mauje Khed Budruk which had been continuing with one Umabai Matkar as jahagir for a long time, and which had been attached, was now to be continued to her as the attachment had been removed. The document mentions that the village had been continued with Umabai as jahagir in respect of the whole of the amal (darobast amal) excepting the mokasa (right); that the attachment had been removed at the request of Rajeshri Babaji Matkar, and the officer to whom the letter was addressed was instructed not to interfere with the jahagirdar's management of the village. Exhibit 109 is an acknowledgment by Babaji Matkar in 1798 that he had taken the village " (the said place of the aforesaid Mouje) " into his possession. The sanad granted to the inamdar by the British Government is alleged by the plaintiff to have been lost. He has produced an extract (exhibit 37) from the Registrar of Sanads relating to his village. The extract shows that the whole village was to be continued with the plaintiff's family from generation to generation according to an order passed by Government in the Political Department on September 18, 1843. The form mentions that sanad No. 1567 had been granted to the inamdar on July 12, 1880, with regard to the village, and shows that the whole village was granted in inam subject to the deduction of an area of 120 acres 35 gunthas which had been already granted prior to the plaintiff's grant. The inamdar appears to have applied to the Government for a copy of the sanad and the reply received by him from Government, dated September 25, 1926, had been put in—exhibit 90. In that reply the plaintiff was informed that by Government letter, dated September 18, 1843, the Governor in Council had authorised the village of Kheree Budruk held by Puddum Row Mutkur to be continued to his family as having been a hereditary possession. The plaintiff has produced a copy of the relevant extract from the Registrar of Alienated Villages and Lands in the Shahada Taluka received by him from the Government relating to the village in suit. This extract—exhibit 88—shows that the village was granted as personal inam, permanent enfranchised or private property, to the plaintiff's family. Under the heading "Particulars of the villages or land alienated"—column 12—the entire village is shown as alienated excepting the area granted in kadim inam. Column 10 of the statement shows that a sanad had been granted to the inamdar in Form No. 19 and a blank copy of a sanad in Form No. 19 is attached to the copy. The form deals with the grant of a whole village as an hereditary inam and contains a declaration that the village granted shall be continued for ever without increase of land-tax or nazzerana.

The details given in the Register of Sanads and in the Register of Alienated Villages suggest that the grant to the plaintiff's family was a grant of the soil of the village and not merely of the royal share of the revenue. The sanad in Form No. 19, which was granted to the plaintiff's family, was granted under Section XVI, clause B, of Act II of 1863. Inams so granted were of particular lands or of a whole village or of the amal or share of the revenue. According to Joglekar's Alienation Manual, 1921, when the inam was of the whole village the sanad given was in a certain form which is mentioned at page 49 of his Manual. The form corresponds to Form No. 19. When the grant was of the amal or share of the revenue, the sanad was in a different form, which is quoted at page 52 of the Alienation Manual. The form used and the reference to the grant of the whole village in the Register of Sanads and of alienated villages are in my opinion sufficient to show that the grant in this case was a grant of the whole village. In the second appeals there is some more evidence adduced which also supports this inference. A letter has been produced—exhibit 112—dated November 20, 1886, addressed by the Mamlatdar of the Shahada taluka to the Jahagirdar of Khed Digar, which mentions that a copy of a tharav or decision of Government to the effect that the rights regarding the forest belong to the Jahagirdar, had been sent. This letter gives strong support to the plaintiff's contention that he was a grantee of the soil and not merely of the royal share of the revenue. If he was merely a grantee of the latter kind, forest rights would not belong to him. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff inamdar must be held to be a grantee of the soil.

The defendants in all the suits contended that they and their ancestors had been in possession of the lands as permanent tenants for a very long time. In the suit from which First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 arises, the defendant, who was in possession of a very large area of 770 acres 9 gunthas, contended that his family had been Patils of the village for more than four generations, and had been in possession of some of the lands in suit since ancient times, and that they had subsequently purchased some other lands from occupants who had themselves been in possession for many years. P. C. 1940 the suits from which the second appeals arise, although the individual holdings were small, the contentions raised were similar. The plaintiff's case was that none of the defendants had been in possession of the lands prior to 1892-93.

SHANKARRAO In that year for the first time their names appear in the lawani-patra— DAGADUJI- exhibit 103. In the *khatawani*s of the years 1856-57, 1865-66 and 1869-70 RAO the names of the defendants in all these suits admittedly do not appear. The
v. plaintiff therefore contends that the tenancies of the defendants in the five SHAMBHU second appeals can be said to begin from 1892, or at most some time NATHU between 1871 and 1892, since in the khatawani of the year 1869-70 their PATIL names do not appear. With regard to the defendant in the First Appeal, the N. J. Wadia J. plaintiff's contention is that his tenancy can be said to begin either from 1892 or from sometime between 1878 and 1892, since in the aut bandi list of the year 1878-79 the name of the defendant does not appear.

I will take first the case of the defendant in First Appeal No. 179 of 1930. The aut-bandi list of 1878-79, by which the plaintiff attempts to show that in that year neither Shambhu Nathu nor any of his ancestors was in possession of any of the suit lands, is not a document on which any reliance can be placed. It does not appear to be a recognised village form. It bears no signature or seal and is only a rough list of occupants. There is nothing to show that it is a complete list. It is not signed even by the talati of the village. No reliance can therefore be placed on it. The khatawani of 1869-70 is also not a document on which much reliance can be placed. It appears to be a proper khatawani, but it has been seriously damaged. Most of the entries are only partially legible. The endorsement at the end with regard to the numbering and sealing of the pages of the book by the Mamlatdar has been torn. The book does not bear the signature of the Mamlatdar, nor are the pages sealed. The khatawani of the year 1865-66 is better preserved than that of 1869-70, but even that book is only partially written up. Seven out of the nineteen pages are blank. In my opinion it is not possible to place any reliance on the khatawani of 1869-70, and it is doubtful whether much reliance can be placed on that of 1865-66. There is nothing to show that that book contains a complete list of the occupants in that year since part of the book is blank. The khatawani of the year 1856-57 does show that none of the defendants held lands in the village in that year. Some of the lands held by the defendant in First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 had been purchased by him or his ancestors from others. The names of the ancestors of two of such vendors Lala Govardhan and Kesaraya Dongar appear in the khatawani of 1856-57. Govardhan is shown as holding one aut in 1856-57. The khatawani shows that in the previous year he held no lands. Dongrya Revji the father of Kesaraya Dongar is shown as holding two auts of land in 1856-57 and also in the previous year 1855-56. With regard to the land at least which was purchased by the ancestors of Shambhu Nathu from Dongrya Revji, the plaintiff's own record shows that the tenancy goes as far back as 1855-56, and as he has produced no record prior to that date, it must be presumed that the tenancy continued beyond that date also.

With regard to the other lands of Shambhu Nathu and the lands of the defendants in the second appeals, the position therefore is that according to the plaintiff's own records the defendants were in possession of the lands.

in 1892-93 and were not in possession in the year 1856-57. In the suits from which the second appeals arise the plaintiff himself admitted that he could not say when the tenancies of the defendants first came into existence. All that his records prove is that their tenancies must have come into existence some time between 1856 and 1892—a period of thirty-six years. If the tenancies had commenced soon after 1856, they would be seventy-two years old at the date when the suits were filed.

In the case of Shambhu Nathu, the defendant in the suit from which the First Appeal arises, the presumption that the tenancy must have commenced soon after 1856 is all the stronger, since his ancestors were admittedly Patils of the village for several generations. The khatawani of the year 1856-57 bears the signature of Narji walad Dayal Patil, an ancestor of Shambhu Nathu. Section 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, says that where by reason of the antiquity of a tenancy, no satisfactory evidence of its commencement is forthcoming, and there is not any such evidence of the period of its intended duration, if any, agreed upon between the landlord and tenant, or those under whom they respectively claim title, or any usage of the locality as to the duration of such tenancy, the tenancy shall, as against the immediate landlord of the tenant, be presumed to be co-extensive with the duration of the tenure of such landlord and of those who derive title under him. If the tenancies of the defendants in these suits began soon after 1856—and there is nothing to show that they did not, and some reason to presume at least in the case of one of the defendants that they did—the tenancies can reasonably be called ancient. All that the plaintiff had shown with regard to the commencement of these tenancies is that they must have commenced sometime during the period of thirty-six years between 1856 and 1892. In my opinion it cannot be said that this is definite evidence of the commencement of the tenancies, such as would prevent the defendants from getting the benefit of the presumption under s. 83 that they were permanent tenants. It was held by Fawcett J. in Narayan v. Pandurang<sup>1</sup> that in the absence of proof of the commencement of a tenancy in a particular year, a definite period, say of about twenty years, might be considered to be sufficient to show the commencement of the tenancy in order to counteract the presumption under s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. In that case the plaintiff was able to show that the commencement of the tenancy was within a certain period of twenty years. In the cases before us the evidence shows that the tenancies may have commenced anywhere between 1856 and 1892. I am not prepared to hold that this is satisfactory evidence of the commencement of the tenancies. With regard to all the tenancies, therefore, the defendants are in my opinion entitled to the benefit of the presumption arising under s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code that their tenancies are permanent, and on this ground alone the plaintiff's suits must fail.

Even however if it were held that the commencement of the tenancies in all these cases had been satisfactorily proved, and that the defendants were not entitled to the benefit of the presumption under s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, it is in my opinion open to the defendants to show that from the conduct of the parties subsequent to 1892 a presumption of permanent tenancy arises. It was strenuously contended by Mr. Desai on behalf of the inamdar that we cannot go into this question since this contention had not been put forward by the defendants in the lower Courts. I do not think there is much force in this contention. All the defendants had contended in the lower Courts that they and their predecessors had held their lands under a permanent tenancy with rights similar to those of occupants in Government villages, that after the survey had been introduced the inamdar did not repudiate it when he attained majority, and that he had, up to the date of the suits, accepted the assessment fixed by the survey, thus accepting directly and impliedly the rules and regulations of the survey. They had also alleged that they had entered into transactions with regard to these lands. In my opinion the contention raised by the defendants with regard to the conduct of the inamdar clearly suggested that their case was that apart from s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code they were entitled to be considered as permanent tenants. In the suits from which the second appeals arise the learned Subordinate Judge in the course of his judgment said :

"But though they (the defendants) may not be occupants by virtue of the Land Revenue Code provisions it is open for them to show that they are owners of miras-dars or permanent tenants in the land by other means such as a specific grant from plaintiff or contract, or their being on the land prior to plaintiff's grant or implied contract etc. It is fairly conceded on the part of the defendants that there is no direct proof of any such grant or contract; but an implied contract to this effect can be inferred from the above acts of the defendants which mean that from the very inception of the defendants' holding the plaintiff had given the land to the defendants as full owners."

The issues raised by the trial Court in these suits were broad enough to cover this contention. In the memorandum of appeal to the District Court the defendants contended that the lower Court should have found the defendants to be permanent tenants in view of the continuous payment of amounts equal to assessment for the land for a very long period and that it should have taken into consideration the fact that dealings by way of transfer in various ways by sinking wells and spending a lot of money on the land, by devolution of the land, by inheritance, adoption, gift, etc., by the holders of the lands, and the recognition of these in the record of the plaintiff proved that the defendants were permanent tenants. Similar contentions were raised by the defendant in the first appeal. Both sides have led evidence on this question, and I see no reason therefore why this Court should not go into it.

Section 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not exhaustive. It only provides that under certain circumstances a presumption of permanent tenancy must be drawn, but it does not say that this presumption cannot be drawn from other circumstances even when the origin of the tenancy is not lost in obscurity. Circumstances may exist which might justify the inference that the parties had all along treated the tenancy as a permanent one. In the present case we find a large number of such circumstances. Any one of these taken singly might not perhaps justify the inference that the tenancy was a permanent one, but the cumulative effect of all of them is such as to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the inamdar has treated the defendants as permanent tenants. The records of the inamdar himself show that during the whole period from 1856 to 1928—a period of 72 years—the inamdar has recovered only assessment from the tenants and no more. The khatawanis and the lawani-patraks produced by the inamdar show that the amounts recovered from the occupants were for assessment (akar). It has been argued that the word akar may mean either assessment or rent. But in the present case we find that the local fund cess has invariably been calculated on the amount recovered as akar. The local fund can be calculated only on the assessment not on the amount of rent, when the rent exceeds the assessment. The presumption therefore from this fact is very strong that the amounts which were recovered were recovered as assessment and not as a rent. The recoveries have also been at a uniform rate. We find that up to the year 1890 Rs. 4 per aut (plough) were recovered from Bhil tenants and Rs. 6 per aut were recovered from non-Bhil or Shahu tenants. After that year a uniform rate of Rs. 12 per aut was recovered from all tenants till the introduction of the survey. Subsequent to the survey, assessment has been recovered from all the tenants as fixed by the survey. We do not find that there were any variations in the amounts recovered from individuals. It was alleged by the plaintiff that the tenants did not always hold the same lands, and that the inamdar allotted portions of land or auts as he pleased, but there is no evidence on this point. It has been admitted by the plaintiff's own witness—exhibit 135—that during this whole period not a single rent-note was ever taken from any of the defendants or their ancestors or predecessors-in-title. There is evidence to show that the inamdar himself holds about 180 acres of land in the village which he has let out to tenants at various rents from Rs. 40 to Rs. 60 per acre for three years, and that for the lands so let out he has taken rent-notes from the tenants. This fact in itself suggests very strongly that there was a clearly marked distinction between the annual tenants of the inamdar and the defendants. The plaintiff has alleged that all the defendants and their predecessors-in-title were aut-bandi tenants. His own witness—exhibit 137—has deposed that an aut bandi tenant cannot be deprived of his holding so long as he continues to cultivate the land. The statement suggests clearly that an aut-bandi tenant was regarded as a permanent tenant.

It is not denied that the defendants as well as other occupants in the village have sold and mortgaged the lands which they held from the plaintiff. The bulk of the lands which Shambhu Nathu, the defendant in First Appeal No. 179 now holds, was acquired by him or his ancestors from previous occupants. The defendants in two of the Second Appeals, Nos. 407 and 408, have also acquired their lands by purchase. In the case of Sambhu Nathu as many as eleven purchases took place between the years 1894 and 1899, during the lifetime of the plaintiff's father. One purchase was in 1922, five years after the plaintiff himself had attained majority. There were also three mortgage deeds relating to the lands in First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 during the lifetime of the plaintiff's father. It is difficult to explain these transactions if the tenancies were annual tenancies. The purchasers would never have paid such large amounts for lands if they thought that the vendors were only annual tenants of them; nor can it be believed that the plaintiff and his father would have allowed annual tenants to sell their lands to others. It has been suggested that there is no evidence to show that the plaintiff or his father was aware of these transactions; that the inamdar was only concerned with recovering rents or assessment due for the lands and did not probably care to ascertain who were in possession. I find it difficult to accept this explanation. It may be a plausible explanation if we were dealing with only one or two transactions, but it fails to explain such a large number of transactions, spread over the whole period from 1894 to 1922. The only inference that can be drawn is that both parties—the inamdar as well as the defendants—regarded the tenancies as permanent, and this conclusion is supported by

In 1909 and 1913 lands were acquired by Government for public purposes, and on both occasions compensation for the lands acquired was paid not to the inamdar but to the tenants, some of whom were the defendants in suit. In one case some land was acquired from the inamdar himself and some from his tenants, and compensation was paid to the inamdar for his land, and to the tenants for theirs. It is true that at the time when this happened the plaintiff was a minor and the village was being administered for him by the Collector as guardian, but that is no reason why we should assume that the Collector was negligent in asserting the plaintiff's rights as inamdar.

In the year 1909 when the village was being administered by the Collector it was decided by Government at the suggestion of the Collector that a survey should be introduced into the village. In the course of the inquiries which were made in connection with the survey one Ganesh Laxman Savale, who was the assistant manager of the plaintiff's village, made a statement before the Mamlatdar in October, 1912, in which he said :—

"The persons who are at present actually cultivating the lands of the village Mauje Khed Digar those very lands were in their vahivat and they were always cultivating the same up to this day. There is no vahivat of pherapali (i.e. vahivat in turns) that is, with one person (lit. in one place) for the current year, and with another person (lit. at another place) for the next year. From the day on which the village (land) was brought under cultivation, up to this day (the lands) are in the vahivat of those respective tenants and their lands are fixed. The khatedars of the aforesaid lands consider themselves as possessing haks (i.e. rights) over their lands and they do deal with the same by purchase, sale, mortgage, etc. Decrees have been passed by civil Courts also, and the lands have been given into possession through the Civil Courts."

It has been contended by Mr. Desai that this statement of Savale was not admissible in evidence as Savale was not examined as a witness. It appears from the records that the defendants had cited Savale as a witness. No objection was raised, however, to the admission of this statement on behalf of the plaintiff, and on this ground apparently, Savale, who had failed to appear on the first day on which he was called, was not again summoned. The statement appears to me to be admissible under s. 13 of the Indian Evidence Act. It shows clearly that the defendants regarded themselves as permanent tenants and were treated by the inamdar as permanent tenants.

There is evidence to show that one of the defendants, Shambhu Nathu, had himself let out many of the lands in suit to sub-tenants by registered rent-notes. In the Record of Rights prepared in 1915 the defendants are shown as occupants. The lands in suit have descended over a very long period.

There is one other piece of evidence which goes very strongly against the plaintiff's contention. Shambhu Nathu had stated in his evidence that he had sunk wells in his land at a cost of over Rs. 4,000. The defendants in Second Appeals Nos. 406 and 408 have also sunk wells on their lands, and with regard to these wells it has been admitted by the plaintiff that he himself advanced them loans to sink these wells. He has admitted having done so with regard to another tenant who is not concerned in these appeals. The plaintiff would never have done this if he had regarded the defendants as annual tenants whom he could remove at any time, and it is even less likely that the defendants would have taken loans to improve lands the tenure of which was uncertain.

The cumulative effect of all these circumstances is, as I have already stated, such as to suggest very strongly the inference that the defendants were permanent tenants. On no other supposition can such conduct, not merely on the part of the defendants, but on the part of the inamdar himself, be explained. I am of opinion therefore that the defendants have succeeded in proving that they are permanent tenants for the purposes of s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, and that, even apart from s. 83, the evidence shows that the plaintiff has all along treated them from 1892 onwards as permanent tenants. The suits filed by the plaintiff must therefore fail.

First Appeal No. 179 of 1930 filed by the inamdar must be dismissed with costs. In Second Appeals Nos. 405 to 409 of 1931 the decrees passed by the lower Court will be reversed and the appeals allowed. Appellants to get their costs throughout.

SIR GEORGE RANKIN. In this case six appeals have been consolidated. They are brought from a decision of the High Court of Bombay dated October 4, 1934, in suits by the appellant for ejectment of the respondents from the lands of their tenancies under him. In each case the basis of the claim was that the tenancy is an annual tenancy determinable at the end of the agricultural year, namely March 31, upon three months' notice. The lands in question are arable land in the inam village of Khed Digar. This village is in the Shahada taluka of the West Khandesh District in the Presidency of Bombay, and lies upon the extreme northern boundary of the Deccan where it abuts upon the Barwani State. The total area of the village would appear to be under 1,400 acres and the population about 400 persons of whom a little more than a quarter are Bhils.

The appellant is the inamdar of the village and traces his title back to an inam grant by the Maratha ruler in 1798. This title was confirmed by the British Government in 1843, and in 1880 a sanad was granted by the Government of Bombay to the appellant's father showing that, subject to the deduction of some 120 acres alienated by grants of earlier date than 1798, the village was the grantee's permanent heritable property held subject to payment to Government of a judi or quit rent of 13 rupees per annum, and nazarana of rupees 14, annas 8, in all rupees 27, annas 8. It has been contended for the respondents that the appellant is not shown to be a grantee of the village but only of a certain share in the revenue of the village, but the finding of the High Court that he is grantee of the soil appears to their Lordships to be so well founded that it is unnecessary to discuss the question afresh.

Sir George Rankin

Each of the six suits was brought against a single defendant as sole tenant, but this appeal has been contested by one only of the six defendants, namely by the respondent Shambhu Nathu (herein called the first respondent), who was in possession of a large area of 770 acres. He was sued in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia on June 26, 1928, and he succeeded in that Court upon the ground (which their Lordships think to be erroneous) that the appellant had no title to the soil but only to the revenue of the village. From this decision the appeal to the High Court was a first appeal in which questions of fact as well as of law were open. The other respondents were sued in the Court of the Second Class Subordinate Judge at Nandurbar on July 6, 1928. These suits were decreed and ejectment ordered by the trial Judge (March 20, 1930), and on first appeal the District Judge affirmed this decision (January 8, 1931). The High Court dealt with all six cases by one judgment and dismissed the suits (October 4, 1934).

The appellant's father had succeeded to the inam by 1857. He lived till 1904 and was succeeded by the appellant who was then aged eight years. The Collector of West Khandesh was appointed by the District Judge as the appellant's guardian in 1905 and acted as such till the appellant came of age in 1917.

Such documentary evidence as there is of the history of the agricultural tenancies in this village has reference almost entirely to the lifetime of the appellant's father. It consists mainly of documents produced by the appellant to show that the tenancies in question cannot be traced back beyond a certain number of years. The result of the documents in this respect has been found by the High Court to be as follows : that Shambhu Nathu, who has acquired an interest in a large part of the village through purchases of the rights of other tenants made from time to time by his father and by himself, has shown that one of his tenancies goes back to 1855-56 and another to 1856-57, but that he cannot be held to have traced his other tenancies back to a period earlier than the year 1892 ; and the tenancies of the other respondents likewise are traced only to 1892. By a village ledger (khatavani) for the year 1856 it would appear that the lands in the village under cultivation in that year were measured as fifteen ploughs (auts) and no more. (It is agreed that the original meaning of aut as a measure of land is as much as could be cultivated by means of a plough with two bullocks). From other documents it would appear that in 1851, 1852, 1859-1860 the village was deserted (ujad). The tenants at this period would seem all to have been Bhils and to have possessed a single plough each. By the late seventies of last century the village had become one of fifty ploughs, and by the early nineties the number of ploughs had increased to about eighty, a number which has

Before the year 1890 the payment made by the tenants to the inamdar at a time when the tenants were Bhils was 4 rupees per plough. A few persons not Bhils were charged 6 rupees per plough in later years, but by 1890 the amount obtained per plough by the inamdar was 12 rupees and this was the position at the time when the appellant succeeded in 1904. It is plain that all the tenancies now in question began under a system of autbandi; and the question whether any of them have permanent rights is rendered difficult of solution by the fact that evidence of the nature or character of the autbandi system of cultivation as it has obtained in this village is neither plentiful nor clear. Their Lordships are not entitled or prepared to assume that it had any necessary similarity to practices which may go by similar names in other parts of India, nor do they know whether it is a system in general use in the Presidency of Bombay. It may originally have been—what the learned Subordinate Judge at Dhulia thought it—a system of assessment to land revenue, or a mere method of measurement and not a kind of tenancy at all. What it became in the village of Khed is the relevant question—a somewhat special question to which the answer must in large measure depend upon what was done and permitted in the time of the appellant's father.

In 1908 the Collector of Khandesh suggested to the Local Government that a survey should be made of the lands of the village, and by resolution of the Government of India dated January 26, 1909, it was decided that such a survey should be undertaken and a record of rights prepared. This resulted in 1915 in a record of rights, of which it is sufficient to say that it treated the tenants as having permanent tenancies, and on the basis of the survey the proper rents payable to the inamdar were fixed as 1 rupee per acre. This was to obtain only until 1917-18 when a general revision of the rates of the whole of the taluka was due to be made. The result of this survey settlement appears to have been a slight increase in the revenue of the inamdar. In 1918 this settlement was revised and the tenants' rents raised by about one-third to a figure of rupee 1, annas 6 or thereabouts. The appellant who came of age in 1917 accepted rents from the respondents on the footing of these settlements, but at the end of 1927 he appears to have decided to evict them and gave notice to quit accordingly.

The oral evidence produced by the appellant in support of his claim amounts to very little. He gave evidence himself but claimed to know little or nothing about the documents produced or the history of the village. Thus in the suit against the first respondent Shambhu Nathu he said that he did not know until the day on which he was giving evidence that the village had been surveyed; or whether a record of rights had been prepared, or if any revision survey had been made, or any assistance suits filed on his behalf. Under cross-examination for the defendants in the other cases he appeared, however, to know a little more, admitting that there had been a survey settlement, that he had certain lands in the village in his own name let out to tenants upon leases for rents that are at higher rates than the respondents' rents. He admitted also that holders of land in the village had built wells some of which had been made by money lent by himself. His main witness was his clerk Keshav Ganesh, whose evidence is of small value in view of the fact that before 1922 he had no connection with the village, though he appears to have officiated as village accountant in some other villages before that period. In the suit against Shambhu Nathu the appellant called a village accountant of the name of Mahadev Ramakant who professed to know about the autbandi system. He described it as meaning assessment charged on the basis of so much on each aut of land, the quality of the land not being considered in settling the assessment. A tenant, he said, cannot be ousted of his aut lands as long as he is cultivating : only fallow lands could be given to fresh tenants. He claimed to make this statement about autbandi from what he had seen, though he had not worked as a village accountant in any village where this system was prevailing. He claimed to know the system from a village accountant (talati) who had worked in such a village. The system, he said, was in vogue in villages mostly occupied by Bhils, the papers of such villages being in the office of the Shafada taluka. This witness gave his evidence before the First Class Subordinate Judge at Dhulia on September 17, 1929, but he was not called by the appellant in the other five cases. Evidence was called for the respondents to the effect that under the autbandi system the lands of the tenant were not changed though there were no survey numbers before the survey and settlement was completed in 1915. Shambhu Nathu gave evidence in the suits against the other respondents as well as in his own. He stated in cross-examination that one Ganesh Lakshman "was cultivating some land in Khed and plaintiff has retaken it from him" explaining in re-examination that "the land of Ganesh that was retaken was taken by him on new tenure system." A witness Dullav Vedu who explained that his father had four auts in Khed, three of which were exchanged by him for land in another village with the father of the first respondent, mentioned also that he was cultivating some other land of the village Khed near the boundary of the village and "it was retaken by the plaintiff." No evidence of either of these two transactions was offered sufficient to enable any Court to ascertain its character. Had there been any case in which the appellant or his father by giving notice had terminated a tenancy and retaken possession of the lands as of right, definite evidence to that effect would doubtless have been adduced. No instance of the sort has been proved.

The High Court came to the conclusion that the tenancies in all six cases attracted the provisions of the second paragraph of s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879 :—

"And where by reason of the antiquity of a tenancy, no satisfactory evidence of its commencement is forthcoming, and there is not any such evidence of the period of its intended duration, if any, agreed upon between the landlord and tenant, or those under whom they respectively claimed title, or any usage of the locality as to duration of such tenancy, it shall, as against the immediate landlord of the tenant, be presumed to be co-extensive with the duration of the tenure of such landlord and of those who derive title under him."

The learned Judges, as already mentioned, found that as regards a part of the land of Shambhu Nathu, his tenancy is traced back as far as 1855-56, and that of the other lands all were held in possession of one respondent or another in 1892, the period between 1856 and 1892 being a blank. Hence they were of opinion that the tenancies can reasonably be called ancient and that all that has been shown with regard to the commencement of the tenancies found to have been existing in 1892 is that they must have commenced some time during the period of thirty-six years between 1856 and 1892. Learned counsel for the appellant did not accept these findings contending that a number of the tenancies now in question can be traced back to a more definite origin in the seventies. Apart from this line of criticism, which it is not necessary to follow in detail, their Lordships think that there is some difficulty in the reasoning of the High Court since on any view a number of the tenancies are not proved to have originated before the nineties. Some cases have been cited to their Lordships to show the interpretation put upon this provision of s. 83 by the High Court of Bombay (Maneklal Vamanrao v. Bai Amba,<sup>1</sup> Sidhanath v. Chiko,<sup>2</sup> Narayan Ramchandra v. Pandurang Balkrishna Ramchandra v. Dattu,<sup>3</sup> and Shripadbhat v. Rama<sup>4</sup>). Their Lordships think that for the purposes of the present case it is sufficient to note that the particular presumption mentioned in the clause is not directed to be made save upon these two conditions (among others) : first, that there is no satisfactory evidence of the date of the commencement of the tenancy, and, secondly, that this lack is due to the antiquity of the tenancy. They cannot agree that the first condition is excluded by showing that the tenancy had its origin at some date within a period of twenty years which cannot be more precisely ascertained. This is not satisfactory evidence of the date of its commencement, and the view taken in Narayan's case (supra) fails in their Lordships' opinion to give effect to the ordinary meaning of the language of the clause. Again, by a tenancy's antiquity the section does not in their Lordships' opinion intend any reference to remote ages in the past or to "time immemorial" in the sense of the English law. It is to be given the practical meaning appropriate to its context and afforded by the limits within which living testimony to past facts is necessarily restricted. As a number of the lands in suit are held under tenancies which are not proved to have been in existence before 1892, their Lordships do not think that the presumption can properly be applied to them, notwithstanding that the evidence by no means excludes the possibility of an earlier origin. They do not proceed as regards any of the respondents upon the presumption authorised by s. 83.

It is clear, however, and it is not disputed on behalf of the appellant, that the respondents have by the record of rights been recorded as having a permanent interest. This entry is entitled to the full benefit of the provision of s. 135J of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879 :—

"An entry in the record of rights and a certified entry in the register of mutations shall be presumed to be true until the contrary is proved or a new entry is lawfully substituted therefor."

This provision is the same in character as that which has long prevailed in Bengal under s. 103B of the Bengal Tenancy Act and it is most important that proper effect should be given to such a statutory presumption. The suggestion that it is materially weakened by the mere consideration that when the record was made the appellant was a minor and that his property was being managed by the Collector on his behalf cannot be accepted; and if it be the case that at the time of the preparation of the record the permanency of the interest of the tenants was not disputed this circumstance of itself in no way detracts from the force of the presumption. So far as regards the five cases which came before the High Court on second appeal the findings of fact of the District Judge, though not his conclusions as to their effect in law, would prima facie be conclusive in view of ss. 100 and 101 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (Dhanna Mal v. Moti Sagar<sup>1</sup>). But the existence of the record of rights does not appear from the judgment of the learned District Judge to have been appreciated by him, and as he has given no effect whatever to the statutory presumption, their Lordships are unable to regard the appellant as taking any advantage from the circumstance that five of the cases were dealt with in the High Court upon second appeal. The questions of fact as well as of law were open to the High Court and must be considered by the Board. The broad question before their Lordships is whether the record of rights is shown to be untrue, and the view arrived at by the learned District Judge as entitling the plaintiff to succeed in ejectment is that under the autbandi system there was no settled tenancy in the village, the same lands not being cultivated in different years by the same people, cultivation and tenancy being "quite uncertain and fluctuating." The evidence of the plaintiff's witness Mahadev is directly opposed to such a finding; and, though it is not clear from his own evidence whether his knowledge of the system is extensive or gained at first hand, it cannot be regarded as insignificant, coinciding as it does with other evidence firmly pointing to the conclusion that autbandi tenants had permanent interest in specific land.

The main features in this other evidence must now be indicated. In a jarib-kharda or rough draft of a land survey it is entered by the Mamlatdar of the Shahada taluka for the year 1901-02 that Nathu, father of the contesting respondent, possessed 38 ploughs in the village, "35 permanent as of the last year and three additional in the current year." In similar documents for the years 1897-98 and 1898-99 the same reference to permanent ploughs is to be found. In 1912 when enquiries were being made as to the position of the cultivators in the village, the assistant manager, who was acting as an officer of the Collector during the plaintiff's minority, stated before the Mamlatdar that the khatedars had always been in management of the same lands, that there was no practice of cultivating lands in one place in one year and in another place in another year, but from the time when lands came to be cultivated they have been in the management of the respective tenants only and their lands have been fixed. He stated also that on this understanding the khatedars had executed purchases as well as mortgages and that decrees of civil Courts had recognised these rights. This witness is shown by one of the documents to have been kulkarni of the village in 1901-02, and their Lordships are of opinion that his statement was rightly admitted under s. 13 of the Indian Evidence Act. The transactions of sale and mortgage entered into by tenants in respect of lands held on the autbandi system are, as the

High Court notes, too numerous and important for it to be supposed that the inamdar or those acting on his behalf did not come to know of them, or considered themselves entitled to object to them. It appears that in the case of Shambhu Nathu eleven purchases took place between 1894 and 1899 in the lifetime of the plaintiff's father. Three mortgage deeds are also shown to have been entered into. These transactions are difficult to explain on the supposition that the tenancies were annual tenancies and the absence of objection on the part of the inamdar reinforces this consideration. It is proved that in 1909-13 (during the minority, it is true, of the appellant), compensation for lands compulsorily acquired by the Government was on two occasions paid not to the inamdar but to the tenant. Not only were the tenants before 1890 charged for their land at a uniform rate of 4 rupees per aut if they were Bhils and a uniform rate of 6 rupees per aut if non-Bhil or Shahu tenants, but after that year 12 rupees per aut was recovered from all tenants without discrimination until the introduction of the survey. Again, the appellant himself holds about 180 acres of land in the village which he has let out to tenants at rates which are substantially higher than the rates charged in respect of the tenancies in suit. From these tenants of his own land he has taken "rent notes" or tenancy agreements though in respect of the tenancies in suit or other autbandi tenancies no rent notes would appear to have been taken at any time. It is clear, further, that the interest of the autbandi tenant has been treated in numerous cases as heritable, descending from father to son without objection; and at the time of the trial the recognition of the heritable character of the tenants' interest had continued for a very long time. The appellant has from time to time lent money to tenants to sink wells; and it is difficult to think that a tenant who was removable at the end of a year would have undertaken the liability for a capital sum in order to improve his land. The first respondent and at least one other has sublet his lands to others at substantial rents.

These circumstances are sufficient to show that the presumption in favour of the truth of the record of rights derives support from a number of independent considerations the cumulative effect of which must be regarded as strong. Unless, therefore, there be something in the documents, produced by the plaintiff to show the history of tenancies in suit and the precarious character of the autbandi system, sufficiently strong to overthrow the tenants' claim to have a permanent interest in their lands, it is difficult to refuse agreement to the conclusion of the learned Judges of the High Court that the inamdar over a long period of years has treated the tenancies as permanent. The documents produced by the plaintiff are in some respects difficult to interpret; and in their Lordships' view the difficulty arises mainly from the fact that village accountants and other officers, accustomed to accounts which in form are applicable to holders of land paying land revenue to Government, have tended to apply the same language and the same forms to an inam village, notwithstanding that what the tenant pays to the inamdar is not revenue assessed upon it by Government but rent. Ledgers (khatawanis) and lists of tenants (lavari-patraks) use the word akar (assessment) for the payment and khatedar for the tenant. In particular the local fund cess, which is to be calculated on the assessment to land revenue, has in this village been calculated on the akar. Outside an inam village, persons similar in occupation to the respondents were paying land revenue to Government and holding as occupants with permanent rights in the land; and it is not difficult to see, if only from the documents produced on behalf of the plaintiff, that the fact of the village having been granted in inam, or alienated, would not readily be regarded as implying that the position of the tenant as against the inamdar was very markedly different from the position of the khatedar in an unalienated village. A good deal of the history of the village is consistent only with the assumption that it had not occurred to the appellant's father that he should put his tenants in a position lower than their neighbours.

The clear and forceful argument of Mr. Page upon the documents was to the effect that it is necessary to look to the inception of each tenancy, and that, as in each case it is clear that the tenancy was granted for the purposes of agriculture, it should not be held that the landlord had parted with so large an interest for an agricultural purpose and at so small a rent. The smallness of the rent, however, adds considerably to the force of the other indications that the tenants were being treated as having permanent right. It is true that many of them were Bhils, a class of persons who have to be treated leniently and are unlikely to be able to support a high rate of rent. In the appellant's favour is the fact that though at one time Bhils were charged 4 rupees only per plough, after the year 1890 a uniform charge of 12 rupees is found to be collected. Their Lordships think that detailed and reliable evidence of the manner in which and the basis on which this increase of rent was made might have had great effect in the present case. From s. 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879 it appears that a right on the part of the landlord to enhance a rent payable is not unknown in the Province; as otherwise it would have been unnecessary to enact a saving of this right on the part of the landlord "if he have the same either by virtue of agreement, usage, or otherwise." A right of enhancement, though well understood in Bengal under the permanent settlement and not inapplicable to tenures which are perpetual (Bamasoondery Dassyah v. Radhika Chowdhraim,<sup>1</sup> Krishnendra Nath Sarkar v. Kusum Kamini Devi<sup>2</sup>) has not, so far as their Lordships know, come before the Board in any case arising from the Presidency of Bombay. It might have been much to the interest of the appellant to show the circumstances under which the rent was raised to 12 rupees: whether it was done upon the footing that the appellant had a right to terminate an annual tenancy and to impose such charge as he pleased as a condition of granting a new tenancy, or upon the footing that he was entitled to a customary or other reasonable rate whether based on the value of the staple crops or otherwise. No evidence at all upon this subject was adduced at the trial, and their Lordships are wholly unable to accept any of the documents which have been produced as showing that the plaintiff year in and year out determined what the rent chargeable should be for the year. In these circumstances the fact that the tenancies were granted for the purpose of agriculture cannot be regarded as sufficient either in fact or in law to negative the conclusion indicated by so many strong circumstances that the tenancies were of a permanent character. Their Lordships would not willingly cast doubt upon the principle that the fact that a tenancy is for agricultural purposes does not prima facie indicate that it is permanent or indeed that it is more than an annual tenancy. The inference of permanence is an inference which it is difficult to make and which requires the presence of circumstances explicable when taken as a whole only on the hypothesis of permanence. A full exposition of the principles upon which such inference is to be made or rejected has been given by the Board in previous cases and need not here be repeated (cf. Secretary of State for India v. Maharajah Luchmeswar Singh,<sup>1</sup> and Nabakumari Debi v. Behari Lal Sen). Their Lordships agree with the High Court in thinking that the inference in the present case is fully warranted.

Considerable discussion took place before the Board upon the effect of the survey and settlement made between 1909 and 1916 in view of s. 111 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879. Attention was drawn to the terms of s. 216 and to the amendments made in 1929 to the provisions of this section. Had their Lordships been of opinion that, independently of the settlement of 1915 and the revision settlement in 1918, the respondents were unable to show a permanent interest in their lands, it would have been necessary to give careful consideration to the question whether the Collector in acting upon the survey settlement and the plaintiff in accepting rents fixed thereunder after he came of age had not given to the respondents a right to claim that they had become permanent tenants. In the result, however, this question does not require to be decided, and their Lordships must not be taken as expressing or as accepting any opinion as to the limits of a Collector's powers under these sections. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this consolidated appeal should be dismissed. The appellant will pay to the respondent Shambhu walad Nathu Patil his costs of the appeal.

Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Sec. 10—"Common intention"—Interpretation—Anything said, done or written by conspirator during pendency of conspiracy—Relevancy of—Statement made by one conspirator against another not relevant if made after termination of conspiracy—North-West Frontier Province Courts Regulation, 1931, Sec. 7—Rules made under section—Construction.

The evidence of a conspirator is admissible against his co-conspirator on the principle that the thing done, written or spoken was something done in carrying out the conspiracy and was receivable as a step in the proof of the conspiracy. The words written or spoken may be a declaration accompanying an act and indicating the quality of the act as being an act in the course of the conspiracy : or the words written or spoken may in themselves be acts done in the course of the conspiracy.

The words of s. 10 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, must be construed in accordance with the above principle, and are not capable of being widely construed so as to include a statement made by one conspirator in the absence of the other with reference to past acts done in the actual course of carrying out the conspiracy, after it has been completed. The common intention is in the past.

The words "common intention" in s. 10 signify a common intention existing at the time when the thing was said, done or written by the one of them. Things said, done or written while the conspiracy was on foot are relevant as evidence of the common intention, once reasonable ground has been shown to believe in its existence. Hence, any narrative or statement or confession made to a third party after the common intention or conspiracy was no longer operating and had ceased to exist is not admissible against the other party. There is then no common intention of the conspirators to which the statement can have reference.

There is a distinction between communications between conspirators while the conspiracy was going on with reference to the carrying out of the conspiracy and statements made after arrest or after the conspiracy has ended, by way of description of events then past.

LORD WRIGHT. This is an appeal in forma pauperis by special leave from a judgment and order of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, North-West Frontier Province, dated July 10, 1939. The learned Judicial Commissioner dismissed the appellant's appeal from his conviction of an offence punishable under s. 302/120-B, Indian Penal Code, i.e., conspiracy to murder in consequence of which conspiracy murder was committed, and confirmed the sentence of death passed on him by the Additional Sessions Judge, Peshawar Division, on May 8, 1939.

The appeal raises two main points, which are the only points calling in their Lordships' judgment for consideration here. They are independent of each other. The first is a question as to the jurisdiction of the Court by which the sentence was confirmed. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the Court was not legally constituted, because the appeal to the Court was dismissed and the sentence confirmed by a single Judge of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner sitting alone. The second was whether if the objection as to jurisdiction failed, the decision of the Court was vitiated by misreception of evidence. As their Lordships announced at the conclusion of the arguments before them, they were of opinion that both points failed the appellant and that the appeal should be dismissed. They will now state their reason for coming to that conclusion.

The appellant was charged with conspiracy to murder, in consequence of which conspiracy murder was committed under the joint effect of s. 302/120B of the Indian Penal Code. He was convicted and sentenced to death by the trial Judge, Mr. Mohammad Ibrahim, Additional Sessions Judge, Peshawar Division, assisted by four assessors who were unanimously of opinion that all three accused including the appellant were guilty. The facts of the case and the circumstances under which they were convicted will be dealt with, so far as relevant in this appeal, in connection with the second question, that of evidence. When, after some preliminary proceedings, the appeal came on for hearing before the Court of the Judicial Commissioner on July 10, 1939, it was heard by Almond, the Judicial Commissioner, sitting alone. Kazi Mir Ahmad A. J. C., the Additional Judicial Commissioner, was absent on leave. The period of his leave was for two months with effect from May 30, 1939. The Honourable Mr. M. A. Soofi had been appointed under s. 222(2) of the Government of India Act, 1935, to act as a Judge of the Court during the absence of Kazi Mir Ahmad, A. J. C. But it happened that in this particular case Mr. M. A. Soofi was disqualified from sitting on the appeal because, as the Judicial Commissioner at the outset of his judgment on the appeal explained, Mr. M. A. Soofi had exercised judicial functions in the proceedings. The question whether in those circumstances the Court was properly constituted by Almond J. C. sitting alone falls to be determined on the basis of rr. 1 and 3, of the Rules made on May 19, 1939, by the Governor of the North-West Frontier Province in the exercise of the powers conferred on him by s. 7 of the North-West Frontier Province Courts Regulation, 1931 (as amended), for the purpose of specifying the classes of civil and criminal proceedings which were to be heard by a bench of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, North-West Frontier Province. The rules provide respectively as follows :—

Lord Wright

Rule 1 of the said rules provides that the following classes of criminal cases are to be disposed of by a Bench, viz., any appeal from a sentence of death or of transportation for life and any cases of confirmation or revision of any such sentence.

Rule 3 provides that notwithstanding anything contained in these rules where a Judge of the Court has in a subordinate capacity exercised judicial functions at any stage of a criminal proceeding or is personally interested therein, he shall not hear any appeal or reference arising out of such proceeding, and if it is not practicable to constitute a Bench without such Judge, such appeal or reference shall be heard by another Judge sitting alone.

That Mr. M. A. Soofi was disqualified under r. 3 was not disputed, but it was contended on behalf of the appellant that in the circumstances of the case compliance with r. 1 was not excused and that the appeal could only be legally disposed of by a bench. It was not established, so it was contended, that it was not practicable to constitute a bench without such Judge (that is Mr. M. A. Soofi), and accordingly the appeal could not legally be heard by another Judge (in this case the Judicial Commissioner), sitting alone.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the objection is not well founded. On July 10, 1939, when the appeal came on for hearing, it was not practicable to constitute a bench without Mr. M. A. Soofi, because there was no other Judge of the Court available to sit with Almond J. C. In the event the precise language of r. 3 was thus satisfied. It was however contended that the appeal might have been adjourned until the return of Kazi Mir Ahmad A. J. C., from his leave, say, until July 30, 1939, an adjournment of twenty days. But their Lordships find in the rule nothing to justify this qualification of the words of the rule. If however there is some reservation implied, so that the rule is to be construed as meaning "not reasonably practicable", there must be some authority to decide what is reasonable in the circumstances. Their Lordships think that this authority could be no other than the Judge. To decide whether or not an appeal should be adjourned is particularly a matter for the discretion of the Judge. It is not here necessary to decide whether in any case the decision of the Judge under r. 3 can be overruled, but their Lordships think that if the exercise of this discretion, which is a judicial discretion, is to be in any case overruled, strong grounds for doing so must be shown. It is enough to say that no such grounds are shown here.

No authority has been cited directly in point. Reference was made to various decisions under s. 274 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that where any accused person is charged with an offence punishable with death, the jury shall consist of not less than seven persons and if practicable of nine persons. The language of this provision is different from that of the rule and the conditions are different, particularly in view of s. 276, which enables a deficiency to be made good by leave of the Court by choosing other jurors from persons who may be present. There has been some difference of judicial opinion as to the true effect of the s. 274, but the more recent, and, in their Lordships' opinion, better, view is that adopted in Emperor v. Benat Pramanik<sup>1</sup>, which is that if the Judge proceeds with seven jurors, it must be assumed in the absence of anything on the record to satisfy the Appeal Court that it was practicable to have more than seven jurors, that s. 274 had been complied with. These decisions so far as they go may tend to support the opinion just expressed in regard to r. 3, but as already stated, they do not give direct help in the construction of r. 3.

Lord Wright

In their Lordships' judgment the objection of want of jurisdiction fails.

The second objection requires some statement of the facts and the evidence. The appellant was tried along with the actual murderer Umar Sher, and with Mst. Mehr Taja who had been the wife of the murdered man, Ali Askar. The murder was committed on August 23, 1938, in the village of Taus Banda about four miles from Hoti. The guilt of Umar Sher was not really open to doubt. He was practically caught red-handed. He was caught running away with a single barrel shot gun in his hand, the barrel of which smelt as if freshly discharged. There was an empty cartridge jammed in the barrel. When the appellant came up from the field in which he had been working about half a mile away from the scene of the murder he asserted that Umar Sher was innocent and should be released, but the others present refused to do so. Umar Sher's main defence seems to have been absence of motive. This fact however was relied upon by the prosecution as showing that he was a hired assassin, bribed to commit the murder by the appellant and Mst. Mehr Taja who were co-conspirators in that regard. This was found by the Court to have been the fact. The principal evidence of the conspiracy between these two prisoners consisted of three letters, two from the female prisoner to the appellant, and one from the appellant to the female prisoner. The authenticity of the letters as being what they purport to be, and the handwriting have not and could not have been contested before their Lordships.

It will be convenient to set out the relevant portions of the three letters. They are (1) exhibit P.A. in the handwriting of Mst. Mehr Taja :

"Greetings to thee O my sweet-heart. Mind not in the least if I have been hard on thee at times—pray forgive me for the same. In fact I feel offended when ill is spoken of thee. Khan Khela who had visited my house when Amir Jan was suffering from pain had a lot of talk against thee, but beware and lend not thy ears to these. They are arch devils. Partake not of anything from their hands. Now I shall sell myself and do this act if only I have thee at my back. What a blissful hour it would be when with Amir Jan wailing over Ali Askar we contract our Nikah and enjoy ourselves. Be not angry my darling for thy sorrow makes me sad. However hard on thee I have been in the past, that is all past. Henceforth I solemnly promise to desist. I do fervently cherish the hope that God will make thee mine. Try and send Mir Aftab often to me so that I may talk to him. I have found out money for thee but thou must unhesitatingly find out the man. My heart is bursting for thee and I long for thee immensely. In the end accept my greetings."

Exhibit P. B. (also in Mst. Mehr Taja's handwriting) :—

"Letter to the sweet-heart. Peace be on you. The fact, my darling is that I am in great distress : otherwise I would not have conveyed thee such harsh things. I say these to thee for I am extremely distressed. Whom but thee have I as my own in this land of the Lord ... I have a lot to tell you but I am helpless. For God's sake spare not a moment or thou wilt ever repent my loss. They are all one against me. It would be better if aught thou couldst do. Accept greetings."

Exhibit P. D. (in handwriting of the appellant) :—

"My sweet-heart and the bearer of my burden. If thou tauntest me in regard to my mother what do I care for her. I look to my God and to thee only for reliance. I cannot wait any more. For the sake of God and his Prophet do try or I will die. You must find out the money or I would die. Is it of my choice to be

P.C.. roaming about and thou be enjoying with him, but what shall I do. If I had my 1940 own way I would not have left you to remain with him. I am burning and have — pity on me for God's sake. To me the passing of each day is like months and years.
 MIRZA Once place thyself in my charge and satiate me with the honey of thy red lips. Even AKBAR if thou cuttest my head off my neck I would still yearn for thy white breast. This is my last word if only thou wouldst attend to it. I have vowed for thy sake at many a shrine. The house of the torturer will be rendered desolate. Mirza Akbar's limbs have grown sapless after thee."

 Lord Wright

The Judges in the Court below have found in these letters, their authenticity being established, evidence justifying the conviction of the appellant and Mst. Mehr Taja. The Judicial Commissioner, in dismissing these prisoners' appeals, thus summed up the position, with special reference to the letters. He said :—

"There is a reference to Mirza Akbar by name in Ex. P. D. and the name clearly refers to the writer of the document. Furthermore, the three documents taken as a whole show that the two writers of the documents desired to get rid of Ali Askar so that they should marry each other and there was a question of finding money for hired assassin to get rid of him. Subsequently we find that Ali Askar was shot by a man who had no motive to shoot him. In addition to this there was the strange conduct of Mirza Akbar when Umar Sher was arrested. There is no reason for doubting the statement of the witnesses that he did request that Umar Sher should be released. It is true that in the earlier statements the witnesses did not mention this fact, but the obvious reason is that they did not attach any importance to it at the time because they had no conception as to what was the motive for the commission of the offence.

In my opinion there is no doubt whatsoever that these two appellants Mirza Akbar and Mst. Mehr Taja did enter into conspiracy to murder Ali Askar and that they hired Umar Sher to commit the actual murder, which he did."

But the appellant's contention was that this conclusion was vitiated by the admission as against him of a statement made by Mst. Mehr Taja before the Examining Magistrate after she had been arrested on the charge of conspiracy. That statement which was made in the appellant's absence was admitted in evidence both by the trial Judge and by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal as relevant against the appellant under s. 10 of the Indian Evidence Act. The Judicial Commissioner said that it had been argued that s. 10 did not apply to any statement made by conspirators if the offence to commit which they conspired has actually been committed. He rejected that argument and refused to hold that s. 10 had that limited meaning, though he held that the evidence of the statement could not have great weight as against the appellant, since he had not had any opportunity of cross-examining Mst. Mehr Taja upon it.

The English rule on this matter is in general well settled. It is a common law rule not based on, or limited by, express statutory words. The leading case of The Queen v. Blake<sup>1</sup> illustrates the two aspects of it, because that authority shows both what is admissible and what is inadmissible. What in that case was held to be admissible against the conspirator was the evidence of entries made by his fellow conspirator contained in various documents actually used for carrying out the fraud. But a document not created in the course of carrying out the transaction, but made by one of the conspirators after the fraud was completed, was held to be inadmissible against the other. No doubt what was contained in it amounted to a statement evidencing what had been done and also the common intent with which at the time it had been done, but it had nothing to do with carrying the conspiracy into effect. Lord Denman said at p. 138 that the evidence must be rejected on the principle that a mere statement made by one conspirator to a third party or any act not done in pursuance of the conspiracy is not evidence for or against another conspirator.

Patteson J. described it as "a statement made after the conspiracy was effected". Williams J. said that it merely related "to a conspiracy at that time completed". Coleridge J. said that it "did not relate to the furtherance of the common object". The words relied upon in s. 10 of the Indian Evidence Act are "in reference to their common intention". These words may have been chosen as having the same significance as the word 'related' used by Williams and Coleridge JJ. Where the evidence is admissible it is in their Lordships' judgment on the principle that the thing done, written or spoken, was something done in carrying out the conspiracy and was receivable as a step in the proof of the conspiracy (per Patteson J. at p. 139). The words written or spoken may be a declaration accompanying an act and indicating the quality of the act as being an act in the course of the conspiracy: or the words written or spoken may in themselves be acts done in the course of the conspiracy. This being the principle, their Lordships think the words of s. 10 must be construed in accordance with it and are not capable of being widely construed so as to include a statement made by one conspirator in the absence of the other with reference to past acts done in the actual course of carrying out the conspiracy, after it has been completed. The common intention is in the past. In their Lordships' judgment, the words "common intention" signify a common intention existing at the time when the thing was said, done or written by the one of them. Things said, done or written while the conspiracy was on foot are relevant as evidence of the common intention, once reasonable ground has been shown to believe in its existence. But it would be a very different matter to hold that any narrative or statement or confession made to a third party after the common intention or conspiracy was no longer operating and had ceased to exist is admissible against the other party. There is then no common intention of the conspirators to which the statement can have reference. In their Lordships' judgment s. 10 embodies this principle. That is the construction which has been rightly applied to s. 10 in decisions in India, for instance, in Emperor v. Vaishampayan<sup>1</sup>, Emperor v. Abani Bhushan Chuckerbutty.<sup>2</sup> In these cases the distinction was rightly drawn between communications between conspirators while the conspiracy was going on with reference to the carrying out of the conspiracy and statements made, after arrest or after the conspiracy has ended, by way of description of events then past.

Lord Wright

In their Lordships' judgment the statement of Mst. Mehr Taja falls under the latter category, and was wrongly admitted.

But in truth the question of law is not really material in this case. The statement so far from admitting a conspiracy with the appellant, categorically denied it. While the woman stated that the appellant had threatened to kill her and her husband if she refused to marry him, she had, she said, refused his advances and stopped him coming to the house. Mr. Roberts, counsel for respondent, frankly admitted that apart from the legal question, he could not rely on the statement as evidence of the conspiracy, or indeed on any other ground.

In their Lordships' judgment, however, the admission of the statement (to which it should be repeated that the Judicial Commissioner did not attach very great weight) did not vitiate the proceedings. On the material before the Court, after the statement is excluded, there was evidence sufficient to justify the conviction. The terms of the letters are only consistent with a conspiracy between the prisoners to procure the death of Ali Askar. The vague suggestion that they related merely to a scheme to obtain a divorce and to raise money for that purpose is clearly untenable. The handwriting of the letters is clearly established. Under those circumstances their Lordships will follow the precedent established in Pakala Narayana Swami v. The King-Emperor<sup>1</sup> and hold that in this case as in that it is impossible to say that the proceedings which ended with the conviction resulted in a failure of justice.

They accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

from the decision of M. S. Patil,

First Class Subordinate Judge of
of 1936.

A money decree passed by consent directed the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the amount of Rs. 9,000 by yearly instalments of Rs. 2,000 each, and made the whole amount payable on default of payment of two instalments. It further gave a charge in favour of the plaintiff for the decretal amount on certain shares belonging to the defendant, and provided: "If defendant fails to pay money in time, the same should be recovered by sale of the said shares." The defendant having failed to pay two instalments on their due dates, the plaintiff had the shares sold and realised Rs. 4,350. The plaintiff next applied to execute the decree for the balance by attachment and sale of a house belonging to the defendant. The defendant contended, first, that the plaintiff having taken a charge on specific shares, had abandoned his right to recover the money by any other means, and alternatively, that even if he had such right, he should first of all proceed to get a personal decree for payment:—

Held, in construing the decree, that the plaintiff having failed to realise the whole amount of his debt by sale of the charged shares could proceed under the decree to attach any other property of the judgment-debtor which might be available:

PROCEEDINGS in execution.

Suit to recover balance due on a khata.

On April 13, 1931, the plaintiff firm of Amarangji Vanichand sued to recover Rs. 10,392 on a khata passed by Gurappa Gurushiddappa (defendant). The case made out in the plaint was that the defendant had pledged certain shares belonging to him with the plaintiff by way of security and took a loan of Rs. 8,000 on September 16, 1928. The prayer in the plaint ran thus:—

"Plaintiff may be awarded from the defendant the amount of claim (viz.) Rs. 10,392 and all the Court costs and future interest according to the said stipulated rate from the date of the filing of the suit till payment. If the defendant does not pay the amount a decree may be passed to recover the amount by sale of the share certificates deposited with the plaintiff by the defendant as security for the loan (amount) and in case of deficit to recover the same from the defendant personally."

"It is ordered as follows: (1) The defendant do pay to the plaintiff a lump sum of Rs. 9,000 in respect of the amount of claim by yearly instalments of Rs. 2,000 (each). (2) The first instalment shall be paid on May 1, 1932, and the further instalments shall also be paid on May 1 of successive years. (3) If the defendant fails to pay to the plaintiff two instalments consecutively, the plaintiff shall have the right to recover the whole of the remaining amount at once. (4) Future interest on Rs. 9,000 at 0-6-0 six annas per cent. per month from the date of the decree till payment of the whole of the amount shall be paid to the plaintiff. (5) A charge of the plaintiff for the said decretal amount of Rs. 9,000 is kept upon the suit shares. (6) If the defendant fails to pay the monies in time, the same should be recovered by sale of the said shares. The said shares are with the plaintiff. On payment of the amount (the same) shall be forthwith returned to the defendant."

F. B. . There was failure in payment of instalments. The plaintiff filed an application (No. 116 of 1934) to recover the decretal amount. He recovered Rs. 4,350 by sale of the shares under charge. The darkhast was disposed of on December 9, 1935.

In 1936, the plaintiff filed another darkhast (No. 212 of 1936) to recover the balance of Rs. 4,241-6-0 and costs of execution by sale of a house of the defendant. The house was attached on June 29, 1937. An order for sale of the house was made on July 2, 1937.

On July 5, 1937, the defendant applied to the Court contending that the plaintiff had no right to proceed either against him personally or against his property other than the shares under charge, in execution of the decree.

"Reading the decree as a whole I feel no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the defendant had undertaken to pay the decretal amount personally by the consent decree and that the plaintiff is within his rights in recovering the balance of the decretal amount by sale of the property now under attachment. The decree directs the defendant to pay the decretal amount by annual instalments, as seen from the first portion of the operative part of the consent decree. 'The defendant should pay plaintiff a lump sum of Rs. 9,000 by annual instalments etc.' There was an obligation on the part of the defendant to pay and a consequent authority in the plaintiff to recover the same from the defendant personally. The subsequent portion of the decree awarded additional relief to the plaintiff to recover at once the entire amount of the decree under certain circumstances. In case of need the plaintiff was further granted the right to sell the shares under charge for the recovery of the decretal amount. The submission of the learned pleader for the defendant that the sale of these aforesaid shares was the sole relief awarded to the plaintiff by the consent decree is unacceptable having regard to the meaning of the first portion of the operative part of the decree which has been already referred to above. If his interpretation were to be accepted this portion of the decree becomes redundant. He bases his argument relying mostly on the ruling in Janardan v. Krishnaji (22 Bom. L. R. 953). But that ruling is inapplicable in the present case. The consent decree in the reported case which was interpreted had been passed in a mortgage suit of immoveable property; and consequently the provisions of r. 6 of O. XXXIV, Civil Procedure Code, had to be applied in interpreting the several clauses in the decree to ascertain if the decree-holder in the course of the execution proceedings could at once apply to execute the decree personally against the judgment-debtor without getting the decree made final. It was held in that reported case that the plaintiff was not entitled to proceed against the other property of the defendant, since there must be a decree made personally against the defendant before it could be executed against property other than the mortgaged property. No such consideration can arise in this case as the property under charge is moveable property and further as the provisions of the rules under O. XXXIV, Civil Procedure Code, relating to mortgages apply merely to mortgages of immoveable properties as seen from the heading of that Order and the ruling in Official Assignee, Bombay v. Chinnai Motilal, 34 Bom. L. R. 1615, at pp. 1621 to 1623. As the provisions of r. 6 of O. XXXIV, Civil Procedure Code, are inapplicable in this case and further as there are no similar provisions applicable in the cases of pledge or charge of immoveables in the Civil Procedure Code, the mode of interpretation of the decree in the reported case cannot be taken as a guide to interpret the consent decree now in execution. The ruling relied on for the defendant is clearly distinguishable. It is inapplicable to the facts of the present case. The argument advanced for the defendant is thus untenable. Giving due importance to the plain and unambiguous language used in the decree I interpret it as making it obligatory on the defendant to pay the decretal amount personally and consequently authorising the plaintiff to recover the balance of the decretal amount by attachment and sale of the defendant's property other than that under charge."

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

The appeal was heard by Beaumont C. J. and Wassoodew J. on August 21 and 22, 1940, when their Lordships referred it to a full bench.

The reference was heard by a full bench consisting of Beaumont C. J., N. J. Wadia J. and Wassoodew J., on September 6, 1940.

S. A. Desai, with A. G. Desai, for the appellant.

S. R. Parulekar, for the respondent.

S. A. Desai. I submit that where in the course of a suit a charge is created, such charge negatives personal liability. Secondly, by expressly mentioning a particular remedy granted by a decree the other reliefs are denied : expressio unius exclusio alterius. Thirdly, you cannot divorce a decree from the plaint, for s. 11, expln. V, of the Civil Procedure Code, provides : "Any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, . . . be deemed to have been refused." Fourthly, the principle of O. XXXIV of the Code applies to the present case where charge is created for the first time by the decree itself. On the last point there is a divergence of opinion among Judges of our Court. Further question is whether O. XXXIV applies to moveables in principle.

In his second edition of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, Sir Dinshah Mulla says (p. 547) : "When a charge is created by act of parties the specification of the particular fund or property negatives a personal liability. The remedy of the holder of the charge is against the property charged only." The decree in the present case, being one passed in terms of a compromise, is on the footing of a contract between two parties. The judgment-debtor has made a concession by admitting the whole amount claimed and has therefore consented to the creation of a charge. Hence probably the creditor agreed to be content with the creation of the charge only. Even if the decree is so construed, the darkhast must be dismissed. The parties should be held to the contract.

The Allahabad High Court in Raghukul Tilak v. Pitam Singh<sup>1</sup> said (p. 904) : "It appears to us that the question whether a charge-holder has a personal remedy against the person over whose property he holds a charge is a matter of contract. In the case of a simple mortgage it has been recognized that in the absence of a contract to the contrary, a simple mortgage carries a personal liability. Where there is a simple mortgage, there is a presumption that there is a personal liability, and unless the personal liability is excluded by an express contract it will exist. No such rule applies to the case of a charge." See also Posti Mal v. Radha Kishan Lalchand.<sup>2</sup>

In the case of an ordinary money decree the principle of O. II, r. 2, will apply. That principle does not apply to mortgage decrees, which are governed by O. XXXIV, r. 14, in so far as a mortgagor may waive his right to the institution of the second suit. The latter provision should be confined to a charge created before the institution of a suit, and not to a charge which came into existence during the progress of a suit. In every case, however, it must be a question of construction of the decree. It is laid down by Broomfield and Divatia JJ. in the recent case of Raychand Jivaji v. Basappa Virappa<sup>1</sup> (p. 1122) : "...the principles underlying O. XXXIV, although they may not strictly apply in the case of a charge, may be applied and ought to be applied by analogy to charges created by a decree, unless indeed the terms of the decree make it clear that the remedy of recovering the decretal amount from the property charged was not given in lieu of the personal remedy, but in addition to it." The learned Judges referred with approval to Janardan v. Krishnaji,<sup>2</sup> which has been followed over and over again not only in this High Court but in other High Courts also. It is recently followed by Kania J. in Gurupadappa Mallappa v. Basappa Shiddappa.<sup>3</sup> Ordinarily, when you create a charge, you prima facie exclude personal liability. The whole question is one of construction, and in the light of certain canons of interpretation the decree stands on the same footing as any other contract between parties thereof. It is open to parties to provide for various eventualities. If they do not, they take the consequences. The decree should be construed in the light of explanation V of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, inasmuch as in the present case the plaintiff had prayed in the plaint for a personal decree which has not been expressly granted in the decree. Furthermore a charge excludes personal liability.

Shah J. in Ambalal v. Narayan<sup>4</sup> was of opinion (p. 705) : Order XXXIV, r. 14, meant "that the decree should relate to the payment of money in satisfaction of a claim arising under the mortgage, i.e., a mortgage independent of the decree. It can have no application where the charge or the mortgage is created by the decree and where the direction as to payment of money is in no sense in respect of a claim arising under the charge or the mortgage." This case can be distinguished on three grounds : (1) liberty to apply was reserved in that decree ; (2) decree was merely declaratory ; and (3) in the present case, the charge was created prior to the decree by a compromise.

I submit that either O. XXXIV applies or it does not apply. If it applies, then there must be a separate application for a personal decree. If it does not apply, then s. 11, expln. V, comes in in any event. The Order does not apply where the mortgage does not exist prior to the decree. Here, prior to the passing of the decree, the charge was created by the compromise. If O. XXXIV applies, in the present case no application for personal decree under r. 6 has been made and hence the darkhast must be dismissed.

The analogy from a decree for maintenance as in Srinivasa Ayyar v. Lakshmi Ammal,<sup>5</sup> as was pointed out in the case before Lokur J. in Lakshmi Bai v. Shantaram,<sup>6</sup> is irrelevant ; where you mention a particular relief in a decree you are confined to that relief only.

There also are cases which bear against my contention. The first one is Gurupadappa v. Karveerappa,<sup>7</sup> which emphasizes that O. XXXIV, r. 14, has no application to the execution of a decree which creates a charge for the first time, there being no prior mortgage. The principle of O. XXXIV, however, applies only to immoveable property. It demands that if there is a deficit from sale of property mortgaged, the decree-holder should apply for a personal decree. If O. XXXIV does not apply, the decree-holder comes under s. 11, expln. V, or else he should file another suit. Where there is a money decree plus something else, that something else changes the character of the decree : Gurupadappa v. Karveerappa.<sup>1</sup> Where there is a complicated decree, you should read it as a whole. So read, it is clear that the personal relief is not expressly granted.

Secondly, there is the unreported judgment of Barlee J. in The Automobile Sales Company, Ltd. v. Anant Subrao Yatgiri,<sup>2</sup> which is directly against me.

In Shibu Bera v. Chandra Mohan Jana<sup>3</sup> a mortgagee first instituted a suit to enforce his security and took merely a money decree, but failed to obtain satisfaction of the decree. He then brought a second suit to realize the debt by the sale of the mortgaged property. In holding that the second suit was not competent Maclean C. J. said (p. 851) : "Apart from authority, I should have thought that, inasmuch as the plaintiff elected to take a decree in the form he did, in the former suit, and practically abandoned or waived his right, which he then undoubtedly had, to have the mortgaged property sold in the event of the money not being paid, he cannot now, having regard to the provisions of section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, successfully ask that the property should be sold in the present suit." Much more so in the present case. The principle of res judicata is not confined to the terms of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, i.e., s. 11 is not exhaustive. It applies not only when the question arises in two suits but also in a darkhast, a suit or vice versa or in the continuation of the same suit : Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, 10th edn., p. 86.

The case of Official Assignee, Bombay v. Chimmiram Motilal<sup>4</sup> is against me. But it is an authority for r. 14 of O. XXXIV and not r. 6.

A decree passed by consent creates estoppel by judgment. Order XXXIV, r. 14, does not apply to consent decrees. If the principle of O. XXXIV is followed here, the decree-holder should first apply to the Court for a personal decree.

In The Co-operative Hindusthan Bank, Ltd. v. Surendranath De<sup>5</sup> the Calcutta High Court applied the rules of O. XXXIV to mortgages of moveables, and in Mahamaya Debi v. Haridas Haldar<sup>6</sup> it was held that foreclosure, as a remedy of the mortgagee, was not confined to mortgages of land ; it was equally applicable to mortgages of chattels.

Explanation V to s. 11 applies as much to consent decrees as to contested decrees. The rule applies not only to mortgages but also to charges (see Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, 10th edn., p. 1022). At any rate the principle of r. 6 of O. XXXIV should be applied to the present case of moveables because it is a rule of procedure based on equitable considerations.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dharwar, and it raises a question in execution, which has caused some difference of opinion in this Court, and is of very common occurrence.

In 1928 the plaintiff made an advance of Rs. 8,000 to the defendant, and certain shares were charged to secure the amount. In 1931 the plaintiff sued to recover the amount due, and on November 28 there was a consent decree. The decree recites the plaint, and then (in cl. 1) directs the defendant to pay to the plaintiff a lump sum of Rs. 9,000 by yearly instalments of Rs. 2,000. Then there is a default clause making the whole amount payable on default of payment of two instalments. Then it is provided that a charge in favour of the plaintiff for the decretal amount of Rs. 9,000 is kept upon the suit shares, and then the decree goes on : " If defendant fails to pay the monies in time, the same should be recovered by sale of the said shares." The defendant failed to pay the instalments on the due dates, and in 1934 the shares were sold and realised Rs. 4,350. In 1936 the plaintiff took out the present dakhast to recover the balance of the debt by attachment and sale of a house belonging to the defendant. It is contended by the defendant that the plaintiff, having taken a charge on specific shares, has abandoned his right to recover the money by any other means. Alternatively, it is said that if he desires to recover the money by any other means, and has a right to do so, he must first of all proceed to get a personal decree for payment. The learned Subordinate Judge decided in favour of the plaintiff.

Now, taking the decree as it stands, and without reference to authorities in the first instance, I should have thought that its meaning was perfectly plain. It is very common to have a consent decree for payment of money making the amount payable by instalments ; but if the creditor agrees to instalments, he is, of course, abandoning his present right to execute the decree for the full amount due, and to compensate him for that it is very common for the debtor to give him a charge on property. In the present case, property, namely the shares, had been charged beforehand, but I think the same principle would apply if the charge had been created in the first instance by the decree. But in taking a charge it seems to me that what the creditor is looking to is his protection against the rights of intervening creditors, who may attach property of the judgment-debtor whilst the plaintiff's hands are tied by the time given for payment of instalments. That seems to me to be the object of a charge ; not to regulate the order in which the defendant's property is liable to be attached. Taking cl. (1) of this decree, it is perfectly plain that it amounts to an order for payment, and if such clause stood alone, it could be enforced by any of the methods authorized by the Civil Procedure Code, including attachment and sale of any of the defendant's property. There is nothing in the rest of the decree which expressly takes away or limits that right, and I can see no reason why it should be held that the plaintiff by implication has deprived himself of that right or delayed its enforcement, merely because he has protected himself against other creditors by taking a charge on part of the defendant's property. Therefore, if I had to construe the decree without reference to authorities, I should say that there was no doubt whatever that the plaintiff, having failed to realize the whole amount of his debt by sale of the charged shares, can proceed under the decree to attach any other property of the judgment-debtor which may be available.

However, there are undoubtedly two cases of this Court, which are against that view. There is, first of all, a decision of an appellate bench in Janardan v. Krishnaji.<sup>1</sup> The learned trial Judge distinguished that case by pointing out that it was a mortgage suit, as no doubt it was, but in that mortgage suit there was a consent decree, very much in the same terms as the decree in the present suit. Mr. Justice Shah, in the Court of first instance, said this (p. 956) :—

"I see no reason to limit the plain meaning of the decree as to the payment of the full amount in instalments by the provision as to the realisation of the full amount by the sale of the mortgaged property in default of the payment of any two instalments. The decree directs the defendants to pay the full amount, and the obligation is not in my opinion limited by the provision relating to the sale of the mortgaged property."

I think that is right ; but in appeal Sir Norman Macleod, the Chief Justice, said (p. 958) :

"It seems clear to me that there must be a decree personally made against the mortgagor before it can be executed against property other than the mortgaged property. The decree in this case cannot be said to be a personal decree merely because it directs that the defendants should pay the amount."

With all respect to the learned Chief Justice, I do not follow the last proposition. A decree which directs payment of the amount is prima facie a personal decree. The Court in that case purported to act by analogy to O. XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code. Now, O. XXXIV is a code, which regulates the enforcement by suit of mortgages, and the scheme of the Order is that in the preliminary decree there is a direction on the mortgagor to pay the amount found due into Court ; on payment there is to be redemption, and on failure to pay, the mortgaged property can be ordered to be sold ; and then there is liberty reserved to the mortgagee to apply for a personal decree against the mortgagor for any balance not realized. That is the general scheme of the Code, and where one is dealing with a decree in a mortgage suit relating to immoveable property, one must follow that scheme. I agree that one must read the decree as a whole, and if a preliminary mortgage decree provided, in the first instance, that the mortgagor should pay the amount, not into Court but to the mortgagee, the Court would not be justified in construing that as an executable decree for payment, because, taking the decree as a whole, it provides that there is not to be a personal decree for payment until the mortgaged property has been sold and a deficit has resulted. But I cannot see any reason why one should apply the analogy of a mortgage decree to a consent decree, which must be construed according to the terms of the language used. Mr. Desai contends that the principles of O. XXXIV should be applied. I do not quite know what is meant by the principles of O. XXXIV. It would have been quite easy to provide in the Code that in the preliminary decree there should be a personal judgment for the balance remaining due after sale of the mortgaged property. There is no principle of equity, which I know of, which would make such a provision improper ; but it happens that that is not the scheme of the Code framed by the Legislature. There is, however, to my mind nothing inequitable in construing an agreement between parties so as to provide that the mortgagor shall pay to the mortgagee anything remaining due after sale of the mortgaged property, or that there shall be a personal decree for payment, which may be enforced before recourse is had to the mortgaged property. There is nothing inequitable in requiring that a debtor shall pay his debt immediately after the liability has been ascertained. In my opinion, the decision of Mr. Justice Shah in Janardan v. Krishnaji was right, and the decision of the appellate Court was wrong.

Then there is another case, to which we have been referred, a very recent decision of this Court in a Letters Patent Appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice N. J. Wadia (Raychand Jivaji v. Basappa Virappa<sup>1</sup>). In that case there was a consent decree under which the defendant was directed to pay a certain sum by instalments; there was no default clause, but certain immoveable property was charged for the amount. It may be that the absence of a default clause creates a distinction; the case has not yet been reported,<sup>1</sup> and I do not know the exact facts. But Mr. Justice Broomfield in giving the judgment of the Court refers to Janardan v. Krishnaji and to other cases, and he concludes in these words (p. 1122) :—

“In every case it must be essentially a question of construction of the decree, but unless the contrary appears, we think the ordinary rule should be that when a charge is created by act of parties the specification of the particular fund or property negatives a personal liability and the remedy of the holder of the charge is against the property charged only or at any rate against the property charged in the first instance. In my opinion that is the way in which the decree in this case should be construed.”

I am unable to agree with that conclusion. To apply such a rule of construction to a consent decree for payment of money would seem to me to be wrong in principle, and inexpedient in practice. In arranging consent decrees of the nature in question, it is usually the creditor, and not the debtor, who is master of the situation, and I can see no justification for holding that, by taking a charge upon specific property, the primary object of which, as I have pointed out, is to secure him against other creditors, the creditor abandons his right to proceed against other property of the debtor. Such an abandonment should not be presumed in the absence of language making clear the intention to abandon. On the other hand, to hold that the creditor can only attach other property after obtaining a fresh order for payment is to ignore the fact that the decree already contains an order for payment. The only effect of the latter construction would be to impose further delay and additional expense upon the creditor. In this country experience shows that there are opportunities in plenty afforded to a judgment-debtor to delay his creditor, and I am not disposed to add to the number.

We were referred to other cases which can be distinguished. Ambalal Babubhai v. Narayan Tatyaba<sup>2</sup> which was followed in Gurupadappa v. Karveerappa<sup>3</sup> is rather in favour of the view which I take, but is no doubt distinguish-able. In both those cases there had been a decree and a charge created by the decree on immoveable property, and it was held that the charge could be enforced by execution of the decree without the necessity of filing a separate suit. The cases were both based on the view that the decree, which for practical purposes was in the same terms as the present decree, created a personal liability for payment of the amount due, and to that extent the cases are in favour of the view which I take. The decision of Mr. Justice Kania in Gurupadappa Mallappa v. Basappa Shiddappa<sup>1</sup> is again distinguishable. The learned Judge there held that the particular decree, with which he had to deal, was in the nature of a preliminary mortgage decree, and that being so, the provisions of O. XXXIV applied to it. It is not necessary to consider whether I should have come to the same conclusion as to the construction of that particular decree, but I agree that if once you find that the decree is in its nature a preliminary mortgage decree, the provisions of O. XXXIV apply, and there must be a further application for a personal decree. But, in my opinion, the decree with which we have to deal is quite plain in its meaning. It does not in terms restrict the right of the creditor to proceed against other property, and it does contain a decree for personal payment. It can therefore be executed against the house of the judgment-debtor.

Hindu law—Marriage—Contract of marriage—Betrothal—Agreement of betrothal entered into by mother of minor girl—Father entering into agreement on behalf of his major boy—Breach of contract—Right of minor girl to sue for damages—Contract of marriage conditional—Suitability of spouse.

Amongst Hindus a contract of marriage entered into on behalf of a minor by the minor's legal guardian and shown to be for the minor's benefit is enforceable at the instance of the minor.

Where a contract of marriage was entered into between the mother of the plaintiff, who was a minor Hindu girl, acting as her guardian and on her behalf, and the father of the defendant on behalf of the defendant who was a Hindu and a major :—

Held, on consideration of the habits and customs prevailing amongst Hindus, that the contract being for the benefit of the minor girl could be enforced by her, and she could maintain a suit for damages for breach thereof by the defendant :

BREACH of contract of marriage.

The plaintiff Manibai and defendant No. 1, Khimji Kuverji, defendant No. 2, Jethabhai Lakhamasi, and defendant No. 3, Shamji Chapsi, belonged to the Cutchi Dasha Oswal Jain Caste.

In 1926, defendant No. 1, who was nineteen years of age, was betrothed to the plaintiff, who was then four years of age. The betrothal was arranged between the plaintiff's mother as the natural guardian for and on behalf of the plaintiff and defendant No. 1's father for and on behalf of defendant No. 1, though defendant No. 1 was a major at the time.

On August 9, 1934, defendant No. 1 wrote to the plaintiff's mother who was her guardian calling upon her to get the plaintiff married to him. The plaintiff's mother replied on August 11, 1934, requesting defendant No. 1 to wait till the plaintiff attained marriageable age, the plaintiff being only twelve years old then.

The plaintiff alleged that her brother, Lalji Karamsi, repeatedly called upon defendant No. 1 since 1936 to fix a date for the performance of her marriage but defendant No. 1 failed to comply with his request, that defendant No. 1 wanted to back out of the betrothal arrangement and he had applied in 1935 to the Bombay Mahajan to get the betrothal cancelled ; and that defendant No. 1 got himself secretly married to the daughter of defendant No. 2 on March 19, 1938.

The plaintiff submitted that the betrothal agreement was entered into with her mother on her behalf and for her benefit by defendant No. 1's father on defendant No. 1's behalf and for his benefit, and the agreement was ratified by defendant No. 1 when he wrote a letter to her mother to perform her marriage in pursuance of the said agreement. She complained that although on her part she was ready and willing to have her marriage performed with defendant No. 1, defendant No. 1 committed a breach of the agreement by marrying the other girl, and she filed this suit through her eldest brother as her next friend to recover Rs. 10,001 as damages for the alleged breach. She made defendant No. 2, who was the father of the girl to whom defendant No. 1 was married, and defendant No. 3, who was the maternal grandfather of that girl and the father-in-law of defendant No. 2, parties to the suit as they, according to her, had conspired with defendant No. 1 and maliciously induced him to commit breach of the betrothal agreement.

Defendant No. 1 contended, inter alia, that as the betrothal agreement was arrived at between his father and the mother of the plaintiff when the plaintiff was a minor, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the suit; that the plaintiff's mother agreed to marry the plaintiff with him in consideration of his father agreeing to marry defendant No. 1's sister with the plaintiff's brother; that the plaintiff's mother demanded 2,500 korries (a coin) by way of further consideration and that was paid to her; that the consideration for his betrothal agreement was immoral and opposed to public policy and unlawful; that the agreement was, therefore, void and the plaintiff could not sue in respect of it.

Defendant No. 1 further contended that, in spite of his and his father's repeated requests, the plaintiff's mother neglected to perform the plaintiff's marriage with him; that the plaintiff's brother was convicted of theft and was not a suitable match for his sister; that he and his father had intimated to the plaintiff's mother that they were not going to marry his sister with the plaintiff's brother; that the plaintiff's mother intimated him and his father that unless his marriage with the plaintiff and the plaintiff's brother's marriage with his sister were performed simultaneously, she would not perform the marriage of the plaintiff with him; that he had, therefore, applied to the Bombay Mahajan in 1935 to cancel his betrothal; that he married the daughter of defendant No. 2 as there was no chance of his marriage with the plaintiff; that the breach of his betrothal agreement was committed by the plaintiff's mother and brother; and that the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to claim any damages.

Defendant No. 2 stated that he and defendant No. 3 did not conspire with defendant No. 1 or maliciously induce defendant No. 1 to commit a breach of the alleged betrothal agreement.

Defendant No. 3 contended similarly.

B. J. Wadia J., who heard the suit, held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the suit and passed a decree on December 19, 1939, in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 1,000 against defendant No. 1, and dismissed the suit against defendant No. 3, defendant No. 2 being dead, holding that there was no conspiracy between defendant No. 1 and defendants Nos. 2 and 3 as alleged by the plaintiff. The following is the material portion of his Lordship's judgment :-

B. J. WADIA J. [After narrating the facts his Lordship proceeded :] It is alleged by the plaintiff's mother that defendant No. 1 was present at the betrothal, whereas according to defendant No. 1 and his father defendant No. 1 was not present at the time, but was studying at school in Palitana. His presence or absence at the time of the betrothal is immaterial. The betrothal was arranged between the plaintiff's mother on behalf of the plaintiff and defendant No. 1's father on behalf of defendant No. 1, though defendant

No. 1 was of the age of majority at the time. I have already stated<sup>1</sup> before that the betrothal is not in dispute, and one of defendant No. 1's witnesses, Thakersi Hirji, at present the Vice-president of the Community to which the parties belong in Bombay, said that betrothals in their community were generally arranged by parents. It is nevertheless contended that the plaintiff cannot enforce the agreement made by her mother. Counsel relied on a passage in Mayne's Hindu Law, 10th edn., p. 146, where it is stated that "there can be no enforceable contract to marry on behalf of minor children", but no authority in support of this proposition has been cited. In Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves,<sup>2</sup> where the parties were Goans, Mr. Justice Taraporewala, as he then was, held that it was a well recognised duty of parents among the Hindu and Mahomedan communities to make contracts of marriage for their daughters according to custom, and that there would also be a similar custom amongst parents belonging to the Goan community. No distinct custom prevalent among the Goans was alleged in the pleadings in that suit. The only custom referred to by the learned Judge was the general custom according to which amongst Indian communities such contracts are arranged by the parents. In Bai Ugri v. Palel Purshottam Bhudar,<sup>3</sup> Sargent C. J. observed at p. 406 that "the Hindu law leaves it entirely to the parents to marry their daughters, . . ." and in Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Husaini Begam,<sup>4</sup> Mr. Ameer Ali, who delivered the judgment of their Lordships, observed as follows (p. 413):—

The common-law doctrine there referred to is that a person who is not a party to an agreement is not entitled to enforce it. In that particular case the agreement of which the respondent wanted to take advantage specifically charged immoveable property for a certain allowance which she claimed, but the observation of Mr. Ameer Ali to which I have just referred is general, and it applies with equal force to the Hindus. Mr. Justice Taraporewala held that it was lawful for parents and guardians among the Hindu and Mahomedan and the Goan communities to make binding contracts of marriage on behalf of minor children, and that an agreement made by such parent or guardian on behalf of the minor where the parent or the guardian had the power to enter into an agreement binding on the minor, could, where the agreement was for the minor's benefit, be enforced by both parties to the agreement including the minor. I agree with the conclusion which the learned Judge arrived at. This decision was referred to by the Appeal Court in Great American Insurance Company v. Madanlal Sonulal,<sup>4</sup> in which it was laid down that though a minor's contract was void, a contract made on behalf of a minor by a person acting as his or her guardian and which was for the minor's benefit could be enforced by the minor. I do not think it is correct to say that the decision in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves<sup>1</sup> was not accepted by the Appeal Court. In National Petroleum Company, Ltd. v. Popatlal<sup>2</sup> the same Judges of the Appeal Court, differing from the judgment in Kshirodebihari Datta v. Mangobinda Panda,<sup>3</sup> held that an entire stranger to a contract cannot enforce or sue upon it. That was also held in an earlier decision in Shankar Vishwanath v. Umabai.<sup>4</sup> This rule of law is, however, subject to certain exceptions which have been set out in National Petroleum Company, Ltd. v. Popatlal,<sup>5</sup> namely, that a third person can sue if he claims through a party to the contract, or if he is in the position of a cestui que trust, or in the position of a principal suing through his agent, or if he claims under a family settlement. Counsel for defendant No. 1 argued that this particular case did not come under any one of those exceptions, but the rule of law to which there are these exceptions is a different rule. Shortly put, the rule is that when A and B enter into a contract under which A agreed to indemnify B against all his debts and liabilities, one of B's creditors cannot sue A upon the contract. That is a different proposition. Such a contract was not made for the creditor's benefit, even though he might subsequently come in and derive benefit under it. Similarly it was held by the Privy Council in Nanku Prasad Singh v. Kamta Prasad Singh<sup>6</sup> that a recital in a sale-deed executed by A in favour of B that B was to pay off a mortgage debt to the mortgagee would give no cause of action to the mortgagee to sue B. In Krishna Lal Sadhu v. Pramila Bala Dasi<sup>7</sup> Rankin C. J. observed at p. 1327 that there might be special rules of law applicable to communities among whom marriages are contracted for minors by parents and guardians which may form an exception to the general rule that persons who are not parties to the contract cannot enforce it, but he expressed no definite opinion on the point. This case was referred to in Subbu Chetti v. Arunachalam Chettiar.<sup>8</sup> In the latter case also the ordinary rule of law applied that where there was a contract between A and B under which B agreed to pay a sum of money to C and no more circumstances appeared, C as a stranger to the contract could not sue B. In England a contract of apprenticeship made by a father for his minor son is good and is enforceable not only by the father but also by the minor as being a contract made for the minor's benefit. Similarly a contract of marriage made by a natural guardian in India for the benefit of the minor is binding upon the minor and can be enforced by both parties. Where therefore according to the well recognised custom and practice of the community marriages are arranged by parents and guardians, it would, as Mr. Ameer Ali pointed out in the passage from Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Husaini Begam,<sup>9</sup> which I have already cited, "occasion serious injustice" and hardship if the minor was to be deprived of any relief under an agreement made by the guardian, having the power to make the agreement, on the minor's behalf and for the minor's benefit. If a minor girl for whom a contract of marriage was made could not sue for its breach, she would have no relief at all, for the guardian cannot sue for damages, having sustained none. The party who is aggrieved by the breach is the minor boy or the girl, and if the minor boy can sue, as in Purshotamdas Tribhovandas v. Purshotamdas Mangaldas,<sup>1</sup> whether after attaining majority as in that case, or by a next friend while still a minor, I see no reason why a minor girl under similar circumstances cannot sue for breach of the agreement.

Defendant No. 1 further contends that even if the agreement is enforceable, it is void and not binding for the reasons stated in paragraphs 3 and 4 of his written statement. The first reason is that the betrothal of the plaintiff to defendant No. 1 was arranged as an exchange for and was therefore in consideration of a betrothal of defendant No. 1's sister Jethbai to plaintiff's brother Padamsi. The second reason is that the plaintiff's mother consented to plaintiff's betrothal in consideration of the payment to her of 2,500 'korris' by defendant No. 1's father. For both these reasons it is contended that the consideration for the agreement was immoral and opposed to public policy and therefore unlawful, and that the betrothal agreement was therefore void.

Defendant No. 1 was not present at the betrothal according to him and his father, nor was the plaintiff's brother Lalji present. According to the plaintiff's mother her brother Kanji and his son Naranji were present. Kanji is dead; Naranji is alive, but has not been called. According to defendant No. 1's father his brother Jetha Shamji, one Sonbai and one Maya Mansi were present at the betrothal. None of them has been called, nor examined on commission. There is therefore the word of the plaintiff's mother as against that of defendant No. 1's father as to what happened at the time of the betrothal. According to her the talk about the plaintiff's betrothal took place at Suthri about ten to fifteen days after her son Padamsi was betrothed to defendant No. 1's sister at Ranpur about fourteen miles away from Suthri. The two betrothals were separately recorded, one with the Mahajan of Ranpur and the other with the Mahajan of Suthri. She said that there was no talk about the two betrothals at the same time, whereas according to defendant No. 1's father there was. He said that his daughter Jethbai's betrothal was settled at the same time as the plaintiff's betrothal to his son, and that such betrothals were called 'adodiyun', or as he put it, 'adana', which were common in the Cutchi Dasa Oswal Jain community. Plaintiff's brother Lalji also stated that this sort of betrothal known as 'adodiyun' in Cutch was common in the community. He made certain statements in answer to his counsel's question. The question was whether plaintiff's betrothal to defendant No. 1 was in exchange for defendant No. 1's sister's betrothal to Padamsi. His answer was that it was in exchange. He was then asked whether the one was in consideration of the other, and there was considerable difficulty to make him understand in Gujarati the correct import of the question "whether the one betrothal was made in consideration of the other," but he answered it in the affirmative. He was asked whether he could say that but for the betrothal of Jethbai to Padamsi plaintiff would not have been betrothed to defendant No. 1, and he answered yes. That was the only way in which the expression as to the one betrothal being in consideration of the other could be explained to him, and I am not sure whether he really understood the correct import of the question. He began by saying that these were not cross betrothals, which according to defendant No. 1's contention they were. He admitted that the betrothals were known as 'adodiyun' in Cutch, but he said that in Bombay there was no special word for it, that some called it 'adodiyun' and others said it meant one betrothal taking place after another. I do not think that it can be said that there is any admission on his part which is binding upon the plaintiff. His statement is a mixed statement of law and fact, and assuming even that he understood what he was saying, I cannot hold that the statement he made as the next friend, who is in the same position as a guardian, is binding upon the plaintiff or her mother. The real question to my mind is whether this transaction, which, according to defendant No. 1's father, was one single transaction, made the two girls, namely, the plaintiff and defendant No. 1's sister Jethbai, objects of barter or objects of value, one to be set off against the other. It is true that a marriage by exchange or a 'sata' marriage is prohibited by the Hindu Shastras and is not known to the strict Hindu law, though a custom allowing one marriage to be conditional upon the performance of another was recognised by this Court as being according to a custom in the Kudwa Kunbi caste in Bai Ugri v. Patel Purshottam Bhudar.<sup>1</sup> There is, however, a case decided by Mr. Justice Jardine in Mulji Thakersey v. Gombi and Kastur,<sup>2</sup> in which there was a written agreement of betrothal. One of the clauses of the written agreement was that at the time when the two marriages were to take place the marriages of the two girls were to be performed together. The words that follow were "When you shall give (your daughter) in marriage, I also am at the same time to give (my daughter) in marriage." Mr. Justice Jardine held that in spite of this clause the transactions did not amount to a reciprocal contingent contract, the substance of which could be said to be a bargain of the girls as objects of barter or exchange. It sometimes does happen that family arrangements are made between two families by which the family of A gives a girl to be taken as a wife in the family of B, and a girl in the family of B is at the same time given as a wife in the family of A. Such betrothals and the marriages consequent thereupon often take place, probably for reasons of convenience and economy, but in order to make the transaction invalid according to the Hindu law there must be a contract making the one betrothal strictly conditional upon the other betrothal, so as to make it, in the words of Mr. Justice Jardine, a real bargain or set-off of the girls as two objects of value. Here the two betrothals took place separately and were separately registered with two different Mahajans, and even if the preliminary talk about the two betrothals took place at one and the same time which the plaintiff's mother denied, it has nowhere been stated by defendant No. 1 or his father in evidence that one betrothal was in consideration of the other, so as to make the whole transaction a reciprocal contingent agreement amounting to a barter or exchange.

[After discussing the evidence his Lordship proceeded :] In my opinion the evidence shows that plaintiff's mother and brother were negotiating for the marriage and were ready and willing up to the date of defendant No. 1's marriage to have it performed, and that it was defendant No. 1 who committed a breach of the agreement when his betrothal was still subsisting and not cancelled.

A betrothal in Hindu law is a promise to give a girl in marriage, and its form is that of a promise by the father or guardian of the girl in favour of the bridegroom and/or the bridegroom's father or guardian. No ceremonies are essential to the validity of a betrothal as they are in the case of a marriage. There are certain texts of the Hindu law according to which it used to be understood that a betrothal agreement was irrevocable, but the more correct view is the one which regards a betrothal as a revocable promise of marriage, though such revocation would be improper without a just cause, such as where a better suitor is forthcoming for the girl. A betrothal can also be broken off if either party was found to be of a lower caste or to have an incurable disease, or the intended husband was found to be unfit, or the girl was found to be unchaste, or for other reasons. It was held by this Court as far back as 1870 in Umed Kika v. Nagindas Narotamdas<sup>1</sup> that a betrothal agreement cannot be specifically enforced, and it was pointed out that a case of a breach of a contract of marriage had never been considered one in which anything more than a money award could be decreed. This case was followed in 1875 in In the matter of Gumpat Narain Singh<sup>2</sup>. The point, however, has since been settled by the Legislature, and it has now been laid down by the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 21, cl. (b), as explained by the illustration to that clause, that a contract of betrothal cannot be specifically enforced. The party injured by the breach is entitled to recover compensation for any pecuniary damages that may have been sustained and also for any injury to character or prospects in life which may naturally arise in the normal course of the breach. It was held in Abdul Razak v. Mahomed Hussein<sup>3</sup> by Mr. Justice Kemp, where the parties were Mahomedans, that in a suit for damages for breach of promise of marriage plaintiff was not entitled to damages as in an action for breach of promise of marriage which is a peculiarity of the English common law, but to a return merely of the ornaments, clothes and other things given at the time or after the betrothal. A breach of a betrothal agreement, however, stands on the same footing as the breach of any other contract, and under s. 73 of the Indian Contract Act the legal consequence of a breach would follow. In a breach of promise of marriage case the damages are really to be given as and by way of compensation, though in England juries have been known to award exemplary damages. Apart, however, from the question of damages, the policy of the law requires that a betrothal agreement should not be lightly broken. The breach of a betrothal agreement furnishes a good cause of action in England and in India, if it is proved, and it is immaterial if so far there has been no known case filed by a Hindu girl for damages for breach of a betrothal agreement. If there is a breach, it is as much a breach against the intended wife as against the intended husband under the betrothal agreement.

The only remaining issue is that of conspiracy. The plaintiff's case is that the original defendants Nos. 2 and 3 maliciously conspired with defendant No. 1 and induced defendant No. 1 to commit a breach of the betrothal agreement. Both defendants Nos. 1 and 3 deny maliciously conspiring to induce a breach of the agreement. In an action for conspiracy the plaintiff has to prove conspiracy or a combination of two or more persons, and also to prove malice in the sense of ill-will or an improper motive to injure the plaintiff, which motive excludes the legitimate motive of advancing the defendant's interests. The essentials of the tort consist in the combination of two or more persons to injure the plaintiff and to exercise power over other persons for the purpose of compelling them to injure the plaintiff. The modern doctrine of actionable conspiracy has been differently explained by various Judges, but taking the authorities as they stand, the last word on the subject has not yet been written. It must, however, be a combination of two or more persons maliciously to injure a person in his trade, business or employment or in any other matter of interest to the plaintiff which results in damage to him. The leading cases on the subject are Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor Gow & Co.<sup>1</sup>, Allen v. Flood<sup>2</sup> and Quinn v. Leathem.<sup>3</sup> These three cases have been called by Viscount Cave L. C. as "the famous trilogy" in Sorrell v. Smith.<sup>4</sup> The attempt to reconcile these cases has caused the Courts endless difficulties. Scrutton L. J. observed in Ware and De Freville, Ltd. v. Motor Trade Association<sup>5</sup> that it was quite impossible to harmonise the cases, or to use Viscount Cave's own words in the case just cited, this attempt to harmonise would be "an endless talk". In Sorrell v. Smith it was laid down (a) that a combination of two or more persons wilfully to injure a man in his trade or business was unlawful, and if damages resulted, the combination was actionable; (b) if the purpose of the combination was not to injure the plaintiff but to further the defendant's trade interests, it was not an actionable wrong though damages followed, provided the means adopted were not unlawful. This case still leaves various questions unsolved. One thing, however, has been decided that in the case of an actionable conspiracy malice is an essential ingredient, and by malice is meant ill-will or improper motive to injure the plaintiff. That was held by Beaman J. in Khimji Vassonji v. Narsi Dhanji.<sup>6</sup> That case was referred to by the same Judge sitting in appeal in Jekisondas Harkisondas v. Ranchoddas Bhagvandas,<sup>7</sup> but as in the Appeal Court the question of malice or want of it did not specifically arise, there was no decision on the point. The onus is on the plaintiff to prove malice, and not for the defendants to show that they had a just cause. That was pointed out in the same case, Sorrell v. Smith,<sup>8</sup> by Lord Buckmaster.

In an action for procuring a breach of contract plaintiff must show that the defendant knowingly and wilfully procured the breach without just cause or excuse. As Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leatham<sup>1</sup> observed, this rule of law is only an illustration of the wider principle that a violation of a legal right knowingly committed is a cause of action. It is clear that no action will lie for inducing a breach of contract which is null and void. If any lawful justification is pleaded, it is for the defendant to prove it, because knowingly to procure a breach of contract is prima facie wrong. It is a violation of a legal right which prohibits interference with contracts and contractual relations, provided there is no lawful justification for the interference. What is sufficient or lawful justification is a point which has not yet been finally settled, but this much has been settled that malice in the sense of improper motive is not the just or essential element of an action to procure a breach of contract. That was also pointed out in Irene Fanny Colquhoun v. Fanny Smither.<sup>2</sup> I may point out that merely advising a breach of contract does not, as the authorities stand today, appear to be actionable.

N. P. Engineer, with M. M. Desai, for the appellant.

M. J. Mehta, with H. H. Dalal, for the respondents.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice B. J. Wadia. The plaintiff sued for damages for breach of a contract of marriage. There was also a claim against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 for conspiracy, but as that claim was dismissed and as there is no appeal against that part of the decision, I need not refer to defendants Nos. 2 and 3. Defendant No. 1 is the person who was to marry the plaintiff, and I will allude to him merely as "the defendant."

The contract as pleaded was made in 1926 by the mother of the plaintiff on behalf of the plaintiff with the defendant's father on behalf of the defendant, and is alleged to have been ratified by the defendant. At the time of the contract the plaintiff was aged four years, and the defendant was nineteen. It is important to note that the defendant was of age at the time of the contract, because it is well settled that a guardian cannot enter into a personal contract imposing liability on a minor. (See Waghela Rajasariji v. Sheikh Mashudin.<sup>3</sup>) If the defendant had been a minor, it would have been necessary to show that he had entered into a contract after attaining majority adopting the contract in suit. However, as he was a major, he could ratify the contract, and there is no doubt that he did ratify the contract; the letter written by him in 1934, exhibit A, shows this. The contract sued on is not pleaded as specifically as it should have been. No implied terms are pleaded, and clearly there must have been implied terms. To begin with, there is the question as to the date when the marriage was to be performed. The plaintiff being only four years of age at the time of the contract, it is not suggested that the marriage was to be performed for some years. Since 1929, by virtue of the Sarda Act, it is an offence to celebrate the marriage of a girl under fourteen years of age. It is admitted that it was an implied term of this contract that the marriage should be performed within a reasonable time after the plaintiff attained marriageable age. There is also in Hindu law an implied term in a contract of this sort that when the time arrives for the solemnization of the marriage, the husband, at any rate, shall be suitable as a spouse. The texts on the subject are verses 26 and 27 of section XI of chapter II. of the Mitakshara, which were quoted by this Court in Balubhai Hiralal v. Nanabhai Bhagubhai.<sup>1</sup> Verse 26 says :—

2 (1909) I. L. R. 33 Mad. 417.

"For detaining a damsel, after affiancing her, the offender should be fined, and should also make good the expenditure together with interest."

Verse 27 says :—

"If there be good cause, he shall not be fined, since retraction is authorized in such a case. The damsel, though betrothed, may be withheld, if a preferable suitor present himself."

So that if good cause is shown, the contract may be retracted, and in the case of the bride, she may be withheld, if a preferable suitor presents himself. There may be various grounds justifying the cancellation of the contract, for instance, illness of a serious character, or a defective moral character in one of the parties to the marriage. However, nothing of that sort is suggested in this case. It is admitted that the defendant was at all times a suitable person with whom the plaintiff could contract a marriage.

The first question, which calls for decision, is whether a suit of this sort lies. There have been a good many cases in this Court in which claims for breach of promise of a contract of marriage entered into on behalf of minor children have been entertained. In Umed Kika v. Nagindas Narotamdas<sup>2</sup> damages were given to the bridegroom against the father of the bride for breach of promise, though specific performance of the contract of marriage was refused. Mulji Thakersey v. Gomti and Kastur<sup>3</sup> was a suit by the bridegroom and his father against the bride and her mother, and damages were given against the mother, but were refused against the bride who was a minor. In Purshotamdas Tribhovandas v. Purshotamdas Mangaldas<sup>4</sup> the bridegroom sued the girl's father for damages for breach of promise, the contract having been made by the plaintiff's father when he was a minor, and it was held that he was entitled to recover damages, and that the fact that the girl declined to enter into the marriage did not excuse her father from carrying out his contract. In Abdul Razak v. Mahomed Hussein<sup>5</sup> a Muslim father of the bridegroom sued the father of the bride for damages for breach of his contract to give his daughter in marriage. That was a case of a contract between the two parents, and Mr. Justice Kemp decreed the suit, but held that the measure of damage must be based on the damage suffered by the plaintiff's father, and not on the damage suffered by the prospective bridegroom in the loss of a wife; and if such a suit lies, I agree with the view of Mr. Justice Kemp as to the measure of damage. In this case the bride herself is the plaintiff, so we need not consider the question whether a suit for damages lies by one father against the other for breach of a contract made between them for the marriage of their minor children.

v.

LALJI

Beaumont C.J.

In none of those cases was the exact nature of the action considered, but in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves,<sup>1</sup> which was a suit by the bride, who was a minor at the date of the contract made by her father, against the bridegroom who was a major, the bride claimed damages for breach of the contract, and in that case the nature of the suit was discussed, because it was alleged that if the contract was to be regarded as a contract made by the minor plaintiff, it was void under the decision of the Privy Council in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose,<sup>2</sup> and that if the contract was to be regarded as a contract between the parents, the bride not being a party, could not sue upon it. The same questions arise in this case, and we have to consider whether the decision in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves is right. Now, the learned Judge in that case pointed out that it is customary amongst most of the communities in India for parents to arrange marriages between their minor children, often when the children are of very tender age. Amongst Hindus marriage is usually confined to members of the same caste, and sometimes sub-caste, and it may happen that at the date when a husband or wife is required, there may be very few suitable boys or girls available; therefore, a prudent parent makes arrangements for the marriage of his child in plenty of time. Of course, in England different customs prevail. It could not be suggested that in England a parent is entitled to enter into a contract to marry his child, still less to carry the marriage into effect, and I think that in England a suit like the present one would not lie. But the law must adapt itself to the habits and customs of the people governed by such law, unless, of course, those habits or customs are held to be opposed to principles of justice, equity and good conscience. I think it would be wrong in India to hold that this practice, which is so common, of arranging marriages between children who are under age, is contrary to principles of justice, equity and good conscience. It is according to the habits and customs of the people. I should, therefore, be very reluctant to hold that the decision in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves is wrong.

The technical rule established in Tweddle v. Atkinson,<sup>3</sup> that a stranger to a contract cannot sue upon it, is subject to certain well recognized exceptions, one exception being in favour of a cestui que trust. Where a contract is made by a trustee on behalf of a cestui que trust, it can be enforced in equity by the cestui que trust, and in this country all Courts administer equity. In National Petroleum Company, Ltd. v. Popatlal,<sup>4</sup> which was referred to by the learned trial Judge, this Court applied that exception to the case of a contract made by a guardian on behalf of a minor. The contract there was a contract to insure against fire the minor's property, which was subsequently burnt down, and it was held that the minor could sue on the contract and recover the insurance money. No doubt, a parent entering into a contract of betrothal of marriage on behalf of his minor child cannot be said, strictly speaking, to be acting as a trustee, and I think the exception to the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson, which was acted upon, and perhaps established, in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves, is an exception, which, it may well be, would not be recognized in any other country than India, but I see no reason why it should not be recognized in India, where it is in conformity with the habits and customs of the people.

In Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Husaini Begam<sup>1</sup> there are observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council, which are very pertinent to the present question. In that case a contract had been entered into by the father of the bride with the bridegroom's father, under which certain moneys were payable to the bride and were made a charge on property, and the Privy Council in considering the application of Tweddle v. Atkinson held that this was a case in which moneys payable to the plaintiff were charged on specific property, and she could in equity enforce the charge. But then their Lordships observed as follows (p. 413) :—

"Their Lordships desire to observe that in India and among communities circumstanced as the Muhammadans, among whom marriages are contracted for minors by parents and guardians, it might occasion serious injustice if the common-law doctrine was applied to agreements or arrangements entered into in connection with such contracts."

The learned trial Judge in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves relied strongly on that observation, and I think rightly so, and in my view Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves was correctly decided. It has stood for fourteen years, and I see no reason why we should not follow it.

It is an essential condition of the enforceability of such a contract as this that it should be for the benefit of the minor, and I have felt some difficulty as to whether a contract to give in marriage a girl of four years of age must be considered as for her benefit. If one had nothing but the bare contract pleaded, I should say that it could not be so regarded, because it would be a chance whether in ten years' time the choice of the particular husband would prove a wise one. But, then, as I have pointed out, under Hindu law the contract is conditional on the other party being a suitable spouse at the time when the marriage is to be performed, and there being no more suitable husband available. If that is so, and having regard to the importance attached by the Hindu community to marriage, and to the fact that except amongst a very small minority of the educated community very few girls amongst the Hindus remain unmarried, I think that one must hold that a contract to get a girl married, however young she may be at the time of the contract, is, at any rate prima facie, for her benefit. In Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves the case was an easier one from that point of view, because the plaintiff was about thirteen years of age at the time of the contract, and the contract was to be performed within two years, so that it was easier to hold that it was for her benefit. On the other hand, there was the difficulty in that case that the parties were not Hindus, but Goan Christians, amongst whom customs may not be the same.

In my opinion this suit lies at the instance of the plaintiff. I may mention that since the decree, and since the appeal was filed, the plaintiff has died, and the appeal is prosecuted by her legal representatives; but as she died only after the decree, it does not, in my opinion, affect the cause of action.

v.

LALJI

KARAMSI.

Beaumont C.J.

O. C. J.      The defence of the defendant on the merits is this. Shortly before his 1940 contract of betrothal, it is admitted that the plaintiff's brother Padamsi had been betrothed to the defendant's sister Jethbai then aged about two years.
 KHIMJI In 1932 Padamsi had some trouble in a criminal Court, and in the result KUMERJI the defendant and his father declined to marry Jethbai to Padamsi, and after
 v. that date the defendant ceased to visit the plaintiff's family and ceased to LALJI see the plaintiff, their families being estranged. In 1934, according to exhibit KARANSI A, the defendant was ready and willing to marry the plaintiff, but the plaintiff's mother said that the plaintiff was too young, as no doubt she was. But in 1936 she was of a suitable age to marry, and the defendant's case is that he was ready and willing to marry her from 1936 down to 1938, but that the plaintiff's mother declined to perform the marriage, unless he would agree to his sister marrying Padamsi, and that he declined to do that because he considered that Padamsi was not a suitable husband for his sister. There is a suggestion also that the mother said in the alternative that he must pay a substantial sum of money to avoid the contract of betrothal. The defendant's case is that this was an unreasonable and improper refusal on the part of the plaintiff's mother, and justified him in repudiating the contract.

Beaumont C.J.

The breach of contract relied on in the plaint is that the defendant in 1938 married another girl. It may be observed that that is not necessarily a breach, because under Hindu law a man may marry as many wives as he likes, and there is no plea that the contract was that the plaintiff should be the senior or the only wife. However, that objection is not taken by the defendant; no issue was raised as to whether he broke the contract. I think he in effect admitted that he broke the contract if subsisting by remarriage. If he had denied the breach and pleaded that he was ready and willing to perform the contract, he might have been saddled with two wives, and he may have thought that it would be cheaper to pay damages; or it may be that there is a custom in this caste against a second marriage. However, the point has not been made, and the defendant does not dispute that in 1938 by his marriage to another girl he repudiated this contract if then subsisting; his case is that he was justified in doing so by the behaviour of the mother. On the other hand, the mother and her witnesses say that from 1936 onwards, when the girl was of suitable age, they were pressing the defendant to carry out the marriage, and he always put them off, and that there was no justification for his breach of the contract.

I may say at once that I think the learned Judge was clearly right in holding that these two betrothals were not dependent one on the other. They were made on different dates and the girls were of different ages, which would mean that the marriages would be performed normally on different dates, and I can see no justification for holding that the one contract was to be terminated by the collapse of the other.

The question whether the defendant repudiated the contract, or the plaintiff's mother repudiated it, is a question depending on the oral evidence. We have been through the whole of the notes of evidence, and I must confess that if I had to decide the question as a Court of first instance on the depositions of the witnesses, I should be disposed to say that the defendant's story seems to me a more likely one than the plaintiff's. On the plaintiff's story there seems to be no explanation why the defendant did not carry out the marriage between 1936 and 1938 ; there is the mere allegation that he would not do so. On the other hand, girls in this community seem to be rare, and it seems to me not improbable that the plaintiff's mother having got a son she was finding it difficult to marry, tried to take advantage of the hold she had over the defendant for the purpose of getting herself out of the difficulty. The defendant called a good deal of evidence, which seems to have been independent, and which certainly supports his case. But the learned Judge, who saw the witnesses in the box, preferred the story of the plaintiff's witnesses to that of the defendant's. In my opinion, it would be contrary to the settled principles on which this Court acts that we should substitute our opinion on the facts based on the written depositions for the opinion of the learned Judge who saw the witnesses in the box. It may be that if we had seen the witnesses in the box, we should have arrived at the same conclusion as he did. A Court of Appeal always attaches a great weight to the opinion of the trial Judge on the credibility of the witnesses called before him. This is not a case in which there are any relevant documents, so that it is not open to us to say that the learned Judge's view of the credibility of the oral evidence is not consistent with the documents. It seems to me impossible for this Court to say that the learned Judge was wrong in the view he took of the oral evidence.

That being so, I think that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. One counsel in this Court.

KANIA J. As the first contention about the maintainability of the suit is important, I desire to state my grounds for the conclusion of this Court.

The contract in suit was made by the original plaintiff's mother for the betrothal of the plaintiff to defendant No. 1. The contracting party on the defendant's side actually present at the time was defendant No. 1's father. The plaintiff was admittedly of tender age, while defendant No. 1 was about nineteen years old. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that this contract cannot be enforced on behalf of the plaintiff, and the suit was, therefore, not maintainable. Four points appear to arise for consideration. (1) Between whom was this contract made? (2) Are the minors parties to the contract? If not, (3) can they enforce it? (4) Can the contract be enforced against them?

Having regard to the decision in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose,<sup>1</sup> if any of the contracting parties is a minor, under s. 11 of the Indian Contract Act, the contract is void. It is not voidable as was thought at one time. The facts established are that the contracting parties in this case were clearly the original plaintiff's mother and defendant No. 1 acting through his agent, his father. I say that, because defendant No. 1 had admittedly attained the age of majority. He has accepted the contract, and in 1934 asked for carrying out the same. The authority of his father, therefore, to enter into this contract on his behalf is not disputed. The original plaintiff was not a contracting party. These facts take the contract out of the defect which may attach to it and avoid it under s. 11 of the Indian Contract Act.

Kania J.

The next question is whether the minors can enforce it. The decisions of this Court in Umed Kika v. Nagindas Nanotamdas,<sup>1</sup> Mulji Thakersey v. Gomti and Kastur<sup>2</sup> and Purshotamdas Tribhovandas v. Purshotamdas Mangaldas<sup>3</sup> show that a contract of betrothal made by the guardian of a minor Hindu was not questioned as enforceable. When the minor brought a suit against the other contracting party to get his rights declared and enforced, the Court assisted him in doing so. The principle on which it appears that contracts of this kind are considered enforceable at the instance of the minor is that the contract was made on behalf of the minor by his guardian, and if the Court found that it was for his benefit, the Court enforced it. The question whether contracts made between two persons could be enforced at the instance of a third party, who was not a contracting party, has come to be considered both in England and in India. Tweddle v. Atkinson is the recognized authority for holding that a third party to a contract cannot enforce it. Exceptions to this rule have also been recognized in favour of beneficiaries, persons claiming interest through the contracting parties, and principals on the footing that the contracts were made on their behalf by their agents. In Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Husaini Begam<sup>4</sup> an agreement made on behalf of a minor Mahomedan girl by her father, for her marriage with the boy's father, was sought to be enforced by the girl after her marriage and after she had attained majority. One of the terms of the contract was that the father-in-law of the girl was to give her a certain amount after her marriage every month. That was made a charge on the property of the father-in-law. In dealing with the question whether this contract could be enforced at the instance of the girl, who was not a contracting party, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that as there was a charge created on the immoveable property, and the sole beneficiary was the plaintiff, the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson did not come in her way. They further observed as follows (p. 413):—

"Their Lordships desire to observe that in India and among communities circumstanced as the Muhammadans, among whom marriages are contracted for minors by parents and guardians, it might occasion serious injustice if the common-law doctrine was applied to agreements or arrangements entered into in connection with such contracts."

Those observations clearly recognize that in India ancillary contracts to the contracts of betrothal are outside the rule in Tweddle v. Atkinson so far as Mahomedans and, I believe, communities similarly situated are concerned. All the more so the rule is inapplicable to the contract of betrothal itself, and stands outside that principle. That view was taken by Mr. Justice Taraporewala in Rose Fernandes v. Joseph Gonsalves,<sup>5</sup> after a review of all the authorities then brought to his notice and having regard to the customs of the different communities in India. In that case this principle which was recognised as applicable to Hindus and Mahomedans was extended and applied to Goan Christians. That judgment has stood unshaken for fourteen years. The observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council quoted above indicate that the same view had been taken so far back as 1910. I, therefore, think that contracts of betrothal entered into on behalf of minors by their guardians and shown to be for their benefit, are enforceable at the instance of the minors.

This is the first case brought to our notice in which a girl had sought to enforce her right against the boy himself. But when an attempt was made to enforce the right against a minor defendant, the claim was rejected. That is shown by the decision in Mulji Thakersy v. Gombi and Kastur. That is, again, in consonance with the recognized rule that a guardian has no right to enter into a personal covenant which could be enforced against the minor. In Waghela Rajsanji v. Sheikh Masuldin<sup>1</sup> and in Maharaja Shri Ramnarsingji v. Vadilal Vakhatchand<sup>2</sup> this was recognized. It, therefore, appears that while the contract could be enforced against the other contracting party at the instance of the minor, it cannot be enforced against the minor.

It was further argued that this contract is not binding, because the mother was not the legal guardian for the purpose of entering into the contract of betrothal. In support of that contention the appellant relied on Shridhar v. Hiralal Vithal<sup>3</sup> and on Bai Ramkore v. Jamnadas Mulchand.<sup>4</sup> In my opinion this contention is unsound. If the father is alive, he is the legal guardian of his minor children. If he is dead, the mother is the legal guardian. She has, therefore, the right to enter into a contract of betrothal on behalf of her minor children. If acting under the authority given to her by law, she attempts to abuse the same, a person otherwise interested in the minor may bring her action to the notice of the Court, and the Court may restrain her from abusing her authority. That, however, does not go against the root principle of the mother having the authority to enter into a contract of this type. The decisions relied upon by the appellant, in my opinion, do not support his contention. Bai Ramkore v. Jamnadas Mulchand clearly indicates that the authority to give in marriage referred to in those decisions is merely confined to the physical act of giving in marriage as a part of the marriage ceremony. Mr. Justice Chandavarkar has in terms stated that the words "the authority to give in marriage" are only confined to the act of giving in marriage as a part of the marriage ceremony which is called kanyadana. Therefore, the authority of the mother to enter into the contract, provided it is shown that it is for the benefit of the minor, cannot be disputed. For these reasons, I think the contract is binding on the parties and enforceable by the plaintiff against the defendant.

I do not propose to go into the details of the evidence on the question whether the defendant was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract. In his written statement he contended that by reason of the plaintiff's mother failing to celebrate the marriage, in spite of his repeated demands, he treated the contract of betrothal as abandoned on behalf of the plaintiff and married the second girl. He had not contended in his written statement that he had committed no breach of the contract by his second marriage and was ready and willing to stand by the contract of betrothal. As regards the party's readiness and willingness to carry out the contract of betrothal, the learned Judge had the advantage of seeing the witnesses, and in his judgment he has in terms stated that having watched the demeanour of the witnesses he preferred to accept the evidence led on behalf of the plaintiff. The duty of a Court of Appeal in matters of this kind is very clearly pointed out by Lord Wright in Powell and Wife v. Streatham Manor Nursing Home,<sup>1</sup> where he quotes the words of Lord Kingsdown in Bland v. Ross : The Julia<sup>2</sup> at page 265:—

"First it is clear that in an appeal of this character, that is from the decision of a trial judge based on his opinion of the trustworthiness of witnesses whom he has seen, the Court of Appeal 'must, in order to reverse, not merely entertain doubts whether the decision below is right, but be convinced that it is wrong.'"

"The problem in truth only arises in cases where the Judge has found crucial facts on his impression of the witnesses: many, perhaps most cases, turn on inferences from facts which are not in doubt, or on documents: in all such cases the appellate Court is in as good a position to decide as the trial judge. But where the evidence is conflicting and the issue is one of fact depending on evidence, any judge who has had experience of trying cases with witnesses cannot fail to realize the truth of what Lord Sumner says: as the evidence proceeds through examination, cross-examination and re-examination the judge is gradually imbibing almost instinctively, but in fact as a result of close attention and of long experience, an impression of the personality of the witness and of his trustworthiness and of the accuracy of his observation and memory or the reverse."

A decision arrived at on a consideration of the oral evidence in this way cannot be lightly differed from, and it is not open to this Court to consider the evidence in print before it and find out whether it would have come to the same conclusion as the learned trial Judge had. In view of the clear and emphatic opinion of the learned Judge about the credibility of the witnesses, I see no reason to differ from his conclusion.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

A guarantor is entitled to have the debt of the principal debtor proved as against him, before he is made liable for the debt. The fact that the principal debtor has admitted the debt, or that a judgment or award has been given against him for the debt, does not bind the guarantor, unless he was a party to the admission of the principal debtor, or was party to the proceedings in which the judgment or the award was given.

The liability of a guarantor must depend on the true construction of the guarantee which he has given. If the guarantor merely guarantees payment of the debt of the principal debtor, then he is entitled to require the debt to be proved as against him in accordance with the ordinary law. If, on the other hand, the principal debtor has agreed that as against him the debt shall be proved in a particular way, and the guarantor has guaranteed the debt so to be proved, then there can be no doubt that the guarantor would be bound by the particular method of proof agreed to by the principal debtor and accepted by himself.

The plaintiff carried on business in Bombay as cotton commission agent under the name of Ratilal & Co.

Defendant No. 1 was a joint stock company registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, under the name of Sree Sundareswarar Company Ltd., and had its registered office at Madura.

Defendant No. 2 was also a joint stock company registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, under the name of Sree Meenakshi Mills, Ltd., and had its registered office at Madura.

Defendant No. 3, Karumuttu Thiagarajan Chettiar, was the sole proprietor of the firm of Thiagarajan Chetty & Co. and was the managing director of defendant No. 1. He was also a director of defendant No. 2 and his firm was the managing agent of defendant No. 2.

The plaintiff stated that in February, 1935, defendant No. 3, as managing director of defendant No. 1, employed him as commission agent to enter into forward transactions in American cotton for October, 1935, delivery. Defendant No. 3 gave him Rs. 7,500 as margin money against the forward business.

The plaintiff purchased on February 25, 1935, 300 bales of American cotton

On March 5, 1935, the plaintiff purchased, under instructions from defendant No. 1, 200 bales of American cotton for October, 1935, delivery at 12.35 c. per lb.

On March 6, 1935, the plaintiff purchased, under instructions from defendant No. 1, 100 bales of American cotton for October, 1935, delivery at 12.30 c. per lb.

On March 11, 1935, in view of the fluctuations in the New York market, the plaintiff demanded from defendant No. 1 Rs. 4,000 by way of further margin money and intimated to defendant No. 1 that in the event of the failure to remit the amount, he would close the transactions.

Defendant No. 1 failed to remit the margin money, and the plaintiff closed the transactions and sent the contract note in respect thereof to defendant No. 1.

After giving credit to defendant No. 1 for the margin already received a sum of Rs. 7,229 was found due to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff filed this suit against defendants Nos. 1 to 3, alleging that he repeatedly called upon defendant No. 1 to pay the amount but defendant No. 1 had failed to do so; that defendant No. 3 as the managing agent of defendant No. 2 for and on behalf of defendant No. 2 had guaranteed payment of the amount due by defendant No. 1 to him in respect of the said transactions; that the plaintiff became personally liable in respect of those transactions and had paid the amount due in respect thereof; that the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified in respect of the liability incurred and payments made by him; and that he was entitled to claim the amount due from defendant No. 2.

Defendant No. 1 went into voluntary liquidation after the suit was filed and did not appear at the hearing of the suit.

Defendant No. 2 contended, inter alia, that defendant No. 3 did not possess any authority to bind defendant No. 2; that defendant No. 3 as managing agent of defendant No. 2 did not guarantee payment of the amount due by defendant No. 1; that defendant No. 2 was not given any intimation about the transactions entered into by the plaintiff or the demand of the margin money; that no guarantee was given to the plaintiff on behalf of defendant No. 2; that defendant No. 3 was not entitled in law and had no authority to give any such guarantee; that even if such guarantee was given it was invalid and was not binding on defendant No. 2; that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount claimed from defendant No. 2 unless and until he proved his claim against defendant No. 1.

Defendant No. 3 contended, inter alia, that he had no such wide powers in respect of the affairs of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 as alleged by the plaintiff; that as managing agent of defendant No. 2 he did not guarantee payment of any amount due by defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff in respect of any transactions of defendant No. 1; that he had no authority and was not entitled in law to give any such guarantee; that the plaintiff was not entitled to be indemnified in respect of any liability incurred or payment made on behalf of defendant No. 1; that in any event the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief against him unless the plaintiff proved his claim against defendant No. 1.

RATILAL
TRIBHOVAN-

B. J. WADIA J. The plaintiff carries on business in Bombay as cotton-commission agent in the name and style of Ratilal & Co. of which he is the sole proprietor. Defendant No. 3 was the managing director of the 1st defendant company until that company went into voluntary liquidation in 1939. He is also a director of the 2nd defendant company and at the same time the sole proprietor of the firm of Thiagaraja Chetty & Co., who are the managing agents of the 2nd defendant company. The 1st defendant company carried on, and the 2nd defendant company still carries on, business at Madura. The suit is in respect of certain forward transactions in American cotton for the October, 1935, delivery which the plaintiff was instructed to put through on behalf of and for the 1st defendant company. The terms of business on which the plaintiff was prepared to do business were sent to the 1st defendant company by his letter dated November 9, 1934; according to those terms the business might be either local or what is called "New York business". In addition to the terms contained in that letter there are certain terms at the back of the plaintiff's printed contract form under which the New York business was to be executed by the plaintiff in accordance with the instructions given on behalf of the 1st defendant company and subject to the rules, regulations and by-laws of the New York Cotton Exchange, and also subject to the office terms and conditions of the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff the transactions were done for the 1st defendant company, and the 2nd defendant company agreed to stand guarantee to him for any loss that might arise out of the transactions. The guarantee is thus stated in para. 4 of the plaint, namely, that defendant No. 3 as the managing agent of the 2nd defendant company for and on behalf of the 2nd defendant company guaranteed payment of the amount due by the 1st defendant company to the plaintiff in respect of the transactions of the 1st defendant company effected through the plaintiff. In the alternative the plaintiff contends that the transactions were really the transactions of the 2nd defendant company, though done in the name of the 1st defendant company, and that they were so done at the instance of defendant No. 3. The transactions were of the purchase of 600 bales of American cotton for October, 1935, delivery. Defendant No. 3 on behalf of the 1st defendant company deposited with the plaintiff a sum of Rs. 7,500 as margin against the transactions on February 25, 1935. The plaintiff demanded a further margin about March 11, 1935, as the American market in cotton went down, but the 1st defendant company failed to send any further margin, and after due intimation the transactions were closed by sale of the 600 bales in accordance with the term as to margin contained in the terms of business. This resulted in a loss which, after giving credit to the 1st defendant company for Rs. 7,500 deposited with the plaintiff, amounted

O. C. J. to Rs. 7,229. There were also certain other separate dealings in cotton between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant company in respect of which a sum of Rs. 5,870-3-6 was due and payable by the plaintiff to that company.

B. J. Wadia J.

The 1st defendant company went into voluntary liquidation on or about April 26, 1939, i.e., after the suit was filed. Section 205 of the Indian Companies Act deals with the effect of a voluntary liquidation upon the status of the company, and it is provided that though the company could not do any fresh business, its corporate powers still continued until the company was dissolved. The 1st defendant company was not represented at the hearing. The 2nd defendant company and defendant No. 3 appeared, and have put in almost similar defences. They say that defendant No. 3 had no authority to guarantee any loss on behalf of the 2nd defendant company to the plaintiff. They deny that in fact any guarantee was given by defendant No. 3. They also deny that the transactions were really of the 2nd defendant company though done in the name of the 1st defendant company. Defendant No. 3 in addition contends that the plaintiff must prove that the transactions were carried out by the plaintiff in the New York market. The 2nd defendant company in their written statement say that they are not concerned with the transactions in suit. The 2nd defendant company has counterclaimed against the plaintiff for payment of the sum of Rs. 5,870-3-6, which I have referred to before.

Negotiations for doing business for the 1st defendant company started some time in October, 1934. The 2nd defendant company had dealings with the plaintiff long before that, and there was a separate account between plaintiff and that company in respect of those dealings. It was defendant No. 3 who always acted and gave instructions on behalf of both the companies. He used to come to Bombay from time to time and meet the plaintiff. On October 20, 1934, the 2nd defendant company through their managing agents wrote to the plaintiff to transfer the contracts and the account of the separate transactions done for the 2nd defendant company into the name of the 1st defendant company which was described as "a sister concern", meaning thereby a sister concern of the 2nd defendant company. Plaintiff by his reply of October 23 refused to do so. Thereafter the request was repeated both by the 2nd defendant company and the newly formed 1st defendant company on November 5, 1934. Both these letters are signed by defendant No. 3. The letter of the 2nd defendant company is signed by him on behalf of the managing agency firm. The letter of the 1st defendant company is signed by him as its director. Plaintiff still refused to transfer the contracts and account, but he sent his terms of business to the 1st defendant company on November 9, 1934. Thereafter defendant No. 3 personally came to Bombay and saw the plaintiff at his 'pedhi' at Marwadi Bazar on February 25, 1935, and again repeated his request to the plaintiff to transfer the old account of the 2nd defendant company to the name of the 1st defendant company. Again the plaintiff refused. Defendant No. 3 persisted in his request, but plaintiff said he did not want to deal with the 1st defendant company and thereby get mixed up with any complications that may arise between the two companies. Defendant No. 3 thought that the plaintiff did not understand what "a sister concern" meant, and plaintiff asked his clerk

Chhaganlal Raghani who was then a law student as to what that expression meant. Even after he received an explanation of what it meant plaintiff was unwilling and was not satisfied that the two companies were really one. Thereupon defendant No. 3 on behalf of 2nd defendant company agreed to stand guarantee for the amount of loss that might be incurred in the business done for the 1st defendant company, and on that guarantee plaintiff agreed to do business for the 1st defendant company. He stated in his evidence that but for that guarantee he would not have agreed to do the business. His clerk Chhaganlal corroborated him about the guarantee as he was present during that part of the interview between the plaintiff and defendant No. 3 at which the guarantee was discussed and agreed to. According also to Chhaganlal defendant No. 3 guaranteed on behalf of the 2nd defendant company payment of any moneys that might remain unpaid by the 1st defendant company, and he further stated that thereupon the plaintiff agreed to do the business.

On the same day defendant No. 3 gave instructions on behalf of the 1st defendant company for purchase of 600 bales of American cotton for October 1935 delivery at varying rates, and deposited Rs. 7,500 by way of margin. Plaintiff stated that defendant No. 3 told him at the time of the deposit that the moneys so deposited belonged to the 2nd defendant company. How the moneys were credited and debited in the books either of the 1st defendant company or the 2nd defendant company is not known, as not a single book of account of either of the two companies has been produced; ordinarily entries would be made at the time when the deposit was given. Thereafter the plaintiff got the transactions put through in the New York market through his New York friends, Messrs. Harriss & Vose, who are cotton brokers working on the New York Cotton Exchange. Defendant No. 3 knew or must have known that the plaintiff could not personally put the transactions through in New York, as the plaintiff is an "alien member" of the New York Cotton Exchange who could not according to its rules effect transactions himself in the ring of the Exchange. 300 bales were purchased on February 25, 1935, 200 on March 5, and 100 on March 6, through Harriss & Vose, according to the instructions which were received by the plaintiff from defendant No. 3 and which in turn were transmitted by him to Harriss & Vose. After he heard from New York plaintiff duly intimated the purchase to the 1st defendant company and also sent his contracts, one of which, namely, the first for the purchase of 300 bales was duly returned signed by the 1st defendant company. The other two for 200 and 100 bales respectively were not signed and returned, but there is no dispute that the contracts were accepted by the 1st defendant company. Several wires, letters, intimation notes and two statements of account of the loss sent by Harriss & Vose to the plaintiff in Bombay were objected to by counsel for defendants Nos. 2 and 3 on the ground that the contents of those documents could not be evidence against them until Harriss & Vose who purported to send them were examined as to their contents. In the first place therefore these documents were marked merely as purporting to come from Harriss & Vose but subject to any arguments that counsel may advance as to the admissibility of their contents. Ordinarily a party cannot make the contents of a document written by a third

O. C. J. party evidence against the other side unless the party writing the document is 1940 called and examined. In this case, however, the entire evidence of the facts SREE and circumstances of the case is important to determine the admissibility of MEENAKSHI the documents objected to. The wires were sent from Bombay to New MILLS, LTD. York and received from New York in Bombay under a special arrange-
 v. ment between the plaintiff and Harriss & Vose. Shortly speaking it RATILAL was so arranged that the wires sent from Bombay by the plaintiff were TRIBHOVAN- sent to a telegraphic address which was meant to indicate that the wires DAS were sent by the plaintiff to Harriss & Vose and no one else, and the B. J. Wadia J. wires from Harriss & Vose were sent to Bombay under a similar arrange——— ment which indicated that they came from Harriss & Vose and were to be delivered only to the plaintiff in Bombay and no one else. According to the plaintiff this was the method of doing business with his New York friends which he had been following for years. The signature on behalf of Harriss & Vose is the same on all the documents. The intimation notes confirmed the purchases about which wires had been previously sent. The plaintiff duly followed up all the information received from New York by sending his own contracts immediately to the 1st defendant company, intimating the purchase of cotton at the very rates at which defendant No. 3 had instructed him to purchase. The contracts which have not been disputed state that the business was done in New York according to the rules, regulations and by-laws of the New York Cotton Exchange. On considering the routine of business and the course of conduct followed by the plaintiff for years, and followed in this case immediately on receipt of information about the transactions from New York by sending his own contracts, letters, wires, and statements of account which were accepted by the 1st defendant company, I hold that the documents are admissible in evidence. Defendant No. 3 had opportunities to object to the contracts, letters, wires, and statements of account sent to the 1st defendant company as and when they were received, but neither he nor any one else on behalf of the company raised any objection at all.

Subsequently the market in American Cotton declined and by the first wire of March 10 plaintiff asked for Rs. 4,000 as further margin. As none was sent he wrote to the 1st defendant company on March 11 that he would have to write to his New York friends to liquidate the purchases.
 Thereafter on March 12 the plaintiff asked for a sum of Rs. 10,000 from the 1st defendant company as the market went lower and lower. The 1st defendant company wired on March 12 that they could not send the moneys immediately owing to difficulties but would do so within a few days. Plaintiff according to his terms of business wrote to the 1st defendant company that he was obliged to liquidate the purchases. He accordingly informed Messrs.
 Harriss & Vose, and in turn was informed by them of the sale of 600 bales on March 12. Immediately he informed the 1st defendant company of the sale and sent the relative contract to them. There was a loss of 5144.72 dollars or Rs. 14,715-5-9. A statement of account was sent by the plaintiff with his letter of March 19 showing a loss of Rs. 7,232-0-6 which was subsequently corrected to Rs. 7,229. Intimation of the correction was given to the 1st defendant company on April 9, 1935.

Defendant No. 3 came to Bombay about the middle of April, 1935, and saw the plaintiff when the plaintiff again demanded the moneys due in respect of the loss, but the plaintiff said that defendant No. 3 asked him to wait and not to proceed further. It seems that there was a suit pending between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant company, being suit No. 595 of 1935, for the recovery of about Rs. 16,000 from the 2nd defendant company in respect of other transactions. A consent decree in that suit was taken in Bombay in July, 1935, and it was about that time that defendant No. 3 again came to Bombay and saw the plaintiff. The plaintiff repeated his demand for the moneys, but was again asked by defendant No. 3 to wait. Thereafter the plaintiff wrote his letter to defendant No. 3 on November 9, 1935, referring to his interview in April at which he was asked to wait and not to proceed further. The next interview between the plaintiff and defendant No. 3 in Bombay was early in January, 1936. Again the plaintiff made his demand and again he was asked to wait. Probably the interview was about January 3, 1936, for on that day defendant No. 3 arranged a scheme with the plaintiff for doing new business in the name of the 1st defendant company under which the 2nd defendant company would be able to pay off gradually the sum of Rs. 7,229 due by the 1st defendant company to the plaintiff. I will refer to the scheme later. Plaintiff wrote again to defendant No. 3 on October 22, 1936, about his moneys. To both these letters, namely of November, 1935, and October, 1936, there was no reply. The 1st defendant company was the principal debtor, and therefore the communications were first addressed to them, as the primary liability to the creditor is that of the principal debtor. When moneys were not paid the plaintiff wrote to defendant No. 2 on December 5, 1936, about his claim for Rs. 7,229, and repeated all that he had said in his previous letters. On December 9 the 2nd defendant company wrote back through its secretary that the company had nothing to do with the amount claimed from the 1st defendant company. The other allegations in the letter were neither referred to nor denied. Plaintiff wrote two letters on December 12 the second of which was a reply to the 2nd defendant company's letter of December 9, in which he referred to the old correspondence of October-November, 1934, when he was unwilling to transfer the account of the old contracts and transactions between him and the 2nd defendant company to the 1st defendant company, but had agreed to do so only on the guarantee he got from defendant No. 3 on behalf of the 2nd defendant company. The 2nd defendant company replied by a wire on December 15 that it would be a breach of trust if the account of the 1st defendant company was transferred to the account with the 2nd defendant company, but the guarantee was not denied. The fact that the account of the 1st defendant company was separate from the account of the 2nd defendant company is by no means inconsistent with the case of the guarantee, for payment of any loss arising under the account of the 1st defendant company. Plaintiff, however, replied that he would not transfer the one account to the other, and threatened to file a suit against both the companies for recovery of his money. Thereafter this suit was filed on January 7, 1937.

The plaintiff seeks to recover from defendants Nos. 1 and 2 the balance

 • RATILAL has paid the same, and is therefore entitled to be indemnified by his principal.
 TRIBHOVAN- It is a well-known principle that every contract of agency imposes on the DAS agent the duty of rendering a true and complete account regarding the sub-— B. J. Wadia J. ject-matter of the agency. In his written statement defendant No. 3 has, as I have said before, contended that the plaintiff had to prove that the transactions were put through in the New York market. The 2nd defendant company stated in para. 3 of their written statement that they were not concerned with the transactions. They merely denied the guarantee and defendant No.
 3's authority to guarantee. Nevertheless an issue has been raised on behalf of both the 2nd defendant company and defendant No. 3 as to the proof of the transactions. With regard to the 1st defendant company the transactions were never disputed. The copy of the balance-sheet prepared as of April 26, 1939, and sent to the plaintiff with their letter of May 27, 1939, shows that the amount due to the plaintiff was Rs. 7,229. That is an admission of liability on behalf of the 1st defendant company. Counsel for defendants Nos. 2 and 3, however, argued that any admission of liability by the principal debtor is not binding on the guarantor or the surety, and that before the 2nd defendant company could be held liable on the guarantee that company was entitled to call upon the plaintiff to prove not only that the transactions were duly entered into but that they resulted in a loss of Rs. 7,229.
 Counsel referred to Ex parte Young : In re Kitchin<sup>1</sup>, in which it was held that in the absence of a special agreement, a judgment or an award against a principal debtor was not binding on the surety, for it was no evidence against the surety in an action against him by the creditor, and that the surety was entitled to have the liability proved as against him in the same way as against the principal debtor. As was pointed out by James L. J. at p. 671, "it is perfectly clear that in an action against a surety the amount of the damage cannot be proved by any admissions of the principal", and as pointed out by Lush L. J. at p. 673, the surety is only bound to pay the amount which shall be proved against him. In Guardians, Abbeyeleix Union v. Sutcliffe,<sup>2</sup> it was held by the majority of Judges that the entries in a rate-collector's books as to the amount collected were admissible in evidence against the surety, probably on the ground that the faithful discharge of his duties by the debtor was guaranteed by the surety, but O'Brien J. held that as against the surety everything must be strictly proved. The point as to the admissibility in evidence of any statement or admission made by the principal debtor as against the surety is, as Lord Kenyon pointed out in Perchard and Ham-merton Sheriffs of London v Tindall,<sup>3</sup> not free from doubt. It might be dangerous to make such an admission binding upon the surety, as it might well have been due to collusion between the creditor and the debtor. In my opinion the admission of the 1st defendant company as to the actual amount of the loss could not be binding on the 2nd defendant company, but I do not think that an agent owes the same duty to the guarantor which he owes to the principal in the matter of proving the transactions. I do not therefore think that the agent is bound to prove the transactions to the guarantors, but he has got to prove the amount of the liability for which the surety stood guarantee.

The plaintiff seeks to rely on the duplicate copy of the scheme dated January 3, 1936, as an admission of liability on the part of the 2nd defendant company that Rs. 7,229 are due and payable by the 2nd defendant company to the plaintiff. This scheme was discussed between defendant No. 3 and the plaintiff when defendant No. 3 came to Bombay and saw the plaintiff early in January, 1936, and certain terms of business that was to be done in future between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant company were discussed. The heading of the document is that an arrangement was made between the Sree Meenakshi Mills, Limited, of Madura and Messrs. Ratilal & Co. of Bombay, i.e., between the 2nd defendant company and the plaintiff, for doing business in cotton for and on behalf of defendant No. 2 mills in the name of the 1st defendant company according to the terms of the document. The plaintiff and his witness Chhaganlal stated that the original document was taken away by defendant No. 3 to Madura for being signed but was not returned to the plaintiff. The document left with the plaintiff was the duplicate. Counsel for defendant No. 3 argued that the duplicate was a bogus document, and that there was no such original document at all. The original has not been produced, and there is nothing on my record to show that defendant No. 3, who has chosen not to come to Bombay to give evidence, was even asked whether the original of this document was given to him or not. There is an alteration in the figure of the year 1936 in the document. Originally it was 1935 and the figure '5' has been turned into '6'. The year 1935 was obviously a mistake, because the transactions in respect of which Rs. 7,229 became due had not even commenced in January, 1935. It is provided by para. 4 of the scheme that two-thirds of the net profit in the new business that will be done will go to defendant No. 2 Mills, and the remaining one-third will go to the plaintiff in payment of the amount due to him from the 1st defendant company until the whole amount was recovered. A line has been added, namely, "the amount due is Rs. 7,229 and interest". It was argued on the appearance of the type that this was a subsequent interpolation, but both plaintiff and Chhaganlal said that it was added after he had typed the rest at the instance of the plaintiff and in the presence of defendant No. 3. Can this clause be construed as containing an admission of liability on the part of the 2nd defendant company to pay Rs. 7,229 and interest to the plaintiff? I do not think so. In the first place the scheme for one reason or the other was not acted upon, and, secondly, it may have been equally part of the consideration for the plaintiff to do new business for the 2nd defendant company that his old claim against the 1st defendant company should be paid off by the 2nd defendant com-

O. C. J. pany in the manner suggested. It is, however, significant that though the 1940 scheme has been subsequently referred to in the correspondence, there has been no denial on the part of defendant No. 3 that such a scheme was SRBB proposed and discussed. On the other hand the plaintiff by his letter of MEENAKSHI December 5, 1936, has stated that the scheme was to be approved of by MILLS, LTD. 2nd defendant Mills. As it was not signed and returned, the fair inference
 v. would be that it was not finally approved of. I do not agree that this RATILAL document is by any means a bogus document. At the same time I do not TRIBHOVAN- think that this clause is a clear admission of liability. The clause is, however,
 DAS important to show that the 2nd defendant company through defendant No. 3
 B. J. Wadia J. knew at least on January 3, 1936, that the amount of the loss which the plaintiff claimed from the 1st defendant company, and which amount according to the plaintiff was guaranteed by the 2nd defendant company, amounted to Rs. 7,229.

Counsel argued that in order to succeed against the 2nd defendant company plaintiff must prove that the transactions were put through in the New York market, that the transactions resulted in a loss of Rs. 7,229, and that payment of the loss was guaranteed by the 2nd defendant company. There is also the question of the authority of defendant No. 3 to give such guarantee. I have already stated before that the creditor has to prove the amount of the loss as against the surety, for it is really the amount of the loss which he has guaranteed to pay. I will, however, deal with the question of the putting through of the transactions as it has been discussed at length and about which an issue was raised.

It is in evidence that instructions were given by defendant No. 3 to the plaintiff on February 25 to purchase the 600 bales of cotton within different limits of price. The plaintiff has said, and there is no contradiction, that the instructions were given to him by defendant No. 3 both as a director of the 1st defendant company and as representing the managing agency firm of the 2nd defendant company. On the very day on which the instructions were given and the deposit of Rs. 7,500 was made, plaintiff wired to his friends in New York, Harriss & Vose, under their registered telegraphic address 'Ratihar' to effect the purchase. On the same day plaintiff received a wire from New York at his telegraphic address in Bombay 'Harisrati' that 300 bales had been purchased at 12.39 c. per lb. of cotton, the limit given in the instructions. The account of the 1st defendant company was given the number, 40. The cable address 'Ratihar' was registered in New York. The cable address 'Harisrati' has been registered in Bombay. The two words are made up of the plaintiff's name Ratilal and the name of Harriss, of the firm of Harriss & Vose. The object of the registration was that wires sent by plaintiff to 'Ratihar' could only be delivered to Harriss & Vose in New York as coming from the plaintiff, and wires sent by Harriss & Vose to 'Harisrati' could be delivered only to plaintiff in Bombay as coming from Harriss & Vose. Plaintiff's general telegraphic address is 'Çabin', that of the managing agency firm is "Karumuttu", and that of the 1st defendant company was "Pearl". On March 1 the plaintiff wrote to Harriss & Vose at New York confirming the exchange of wires or radiograms regarding the purchase of 300 bales for October delivery in the account No. 40. Plaintiff also stated that the signature of Harriss & Vose on all the communications received from them was uniform. On receipt of the wire from New York plaintiff wrote on February 26 to the 1st defendant company, enclosing contract No. 249 for the purchase of 300 bales. On March 2 the counter-part was duly signed by or on behalf of the 1st defendant company and returned to the plaintiff. Defendant No. 1 company also confirmed the purchase of the 300 bales in accordance with the instructions given for the purpose. The same procedure was followed regarding the purchase of the 200 bales on March 5 at 12.35 c. per lb. of cotton. On receipt of two wires from New York under the address 'Hariharati' in reply to the plaintiff's wire sent under the address 'Ratihar', plaintiff wired to the 1st defendant company and wrote to them on March 6 intimating the purchase of the 200 bales and sent his contract No. 252 to the 1st defendant company. A similar procedure was followed in respect of the purchase of the 100 bales, and the plaintiff sent his contract No. 254 to the 1st defendant company. These last two contracts have not been signed and returned to the plaintiff. A similar procedure was also followed in respect of the sale of the 600 bales for closing the purchases, and plaintiff sent his contract No. 262 to the 1st defendant company which was also not returned. The plaintiff got a statement of the loss in the transactions from Harriss & Vose. The plaintiff also sent a statement of the loss to the 1st defendant company to which no objection was ever raised.

Counsel for defendants Nos. 2 and 3 argued that in order to prove that the transactions were put through in the New York market it was necessary for the plaintiff to have produced the contracts entered into between the New York brokers, or that they should have called Harriss & Vose and the other brokers here in Bombay, or that they should have got them examined on commission in New York. It was also argued that the mere sending of the wires, letters and confirmation notes did not prove the transactions, and that merely following the usual routine of business between the plaintiff and his New York friends on the one hand and the plaintiff and the 1st defendant company on the other was also not sufficient proof of the transactions. In my opinion the entire evidence and the course of conduct of the plaintiff must be considered together. The contracts he sent to the 1st defendant company were sent immediately after intimation was received from New York. It is stated in the contracts that the transactions were effected according to the rules, regulations and by-laws of the New York Cotton Exchange. By accepting the contracts the 1st defendant company confirmed to the plaintiff that the transactions were so effected in New York. What is more, Harris & Vose sent the statement of loss to the plaintiff in dollars, and the plaintiff's books of account which are kept in the regular course of business and were not challenged, and the memo. of the National City Bank of New York, all show that the plaintiff duly paid the loss to Harriss & Vose which he now seeks to recover from the 1st defendant company on his indemnity, and from the 2nd defendant company on their guarantee. As far back as 1869, in the case of Hodgson et. al. v. Rupchand Hazarimal,<sup>1</sup> which was a suit to recover the deficiency of a sale of cotton consigned by the defendant

"The law as to account-sales is, that where an account between merchants in different countries has been transmitted from one to the other, and no objection is made after several opportunities of writing have occurred, the account is deemed in a Court of Equity a stated account, only to be opened when some cause is shown for the interposition of the Court; and when the goods are consigned to be disposed of in a foreign market, I think it must be considered that the consignor impliedly agrees that the account-sales furnished by the correspondents abroad shall be taken as prima facie evidence of what the goods realised. It would cause great expense and inconvenience if the debtor, by merely objecting to the account, could compel the procuring of evidence from abroad; and, seeing that in practice merchants are satisfied with the truth of the account-sales, and ask for no further evidence, I think there is a good ground for considering that there is such an implied agreement."

In Mayen v. Alston<sup>1</sup> it was also held that account-sales were prima facie proof of the transactions to which they related. In that case the Appeal Court in Madras referred with approval to Hodgson et. al. v. Rupchand Hazarimal. It also referred to a dictum of Mr. Justice Blackburn in Smith v. Blakey<sup>2</sup> that account-sales are prima facie evidence, subject to the right on the other side to surcharge or falsify. At p. 246 Muttusami Ayyar J. observed "seeing that the procuring of the evidence of correspondence at the several foreign markets would occasion considerable delay and expense and tend to paralyze trade, I am of opinion that account-sales were properly admitted as prima facie proof." Both these cases were referred to in argument in Barlow v. Chuni Lall Neoghi<sup>3</sup>. In that case the defendants in Calcutta consigned mica through the plaintiffs for sale by the plaintiffs' London firm in London. The mica so consigned was sold at a loss. The plaintiffs thereupon instituted this suit in Calcutta to recover the loss, and desired to prove the amount of the loss on the London sales. They tendered the London account sales which their witnesses proved were received in the ordinary course of business in Calcutta from London together with the accounts-current. Press copies of the said account-sales had been previously sent to the defendants and not objected to by them. But none of the witnesses could prove the signature of the London brokers on the original account-sales. It was held by Stanley J. that account-sales are prima facie evidence of the amount realised in the foreign market by the sale of the goods and that if it were not so, it would be impossible to carry on mercantile transactions with merchants in distant parts. Similarly in this case the statement of loss on the transactions of the 600 bales was duly transmitted by the New York correspondents of the plaintiff to the plaintiff in Bombay. That statement has been put in as exhibit A-6. It shows that 300 bales were purchased on February 25, 200 on March 5, and 100 on March 6, 1935. It shows the price at which they were respectively purchased. It shows also that on March 12, 300 bales were sold at one price and 300 bales were sold at another price under the account numbered 40. It further shows that the amount of the loss in that account came to 5144.72 dollars. A further statement which is exhibit A-9 in respect of all the dealings between the plaintiff and Harriss & Vose was also sent to the plaintiff. That statement shows that in respect of the transaction of 600 bales for October delivery there was a debit to the plaintiff of 5144-72 dollars with Harriss & Vose on March 13, 1935. These statements are in my opinion prima facie proof of the amount of the loss, and the plaintiff sent his statement of account to the 1st defendant company accordingly. It was open to the company and defendant No. 3 who represented both companies to object to the statements from New York on which the plaintiff's statement of account was based, or to call for inspection of those statements after due inquiry, or to meet this prima facie evidence by better evidence than what was given; but no evidence was led on their side, nor any objections raised at any time. In addition plaintiff has produced his local ledger as well as his foreign ledger to show what was due in American dollars and what he had to pay in rupees to his New York friends. He also produced the memo. of the National City Bank of New York showing that the moneys were duly remitted. None of these has been challenged by the other side. It was argued that plaintiff might only have believed that Harriss & Vose had put through the transactions, though they might not have. It would be indeed strange for a man who had done business in Bombay for years if he made large payments merely on the belief that he had to pay.

There is one further point to be mentioned in this connection. Defendant No. 3 is the common director of the two companies. It has been held in In re Hampshire Land Company<sup>1</sup> that where one person is an officer of two companies, his personal knowledge is not necessarily the knowledge of both the companies, and that the knowledge which he has acquired as officer of the one company will not be imputed to the other company, unless he has some duty imposed upon him to communicate his knowledge to the company sought to be affected by the notice, and some duty imposed upon him by that company to receive the notice. If therefore the 2nd defendant company were in fact guarantors, it was clearly a duty imposed upon defendant No. 3 to communicate to that company his knowledge of the loss incurred in the transactions of the 1st defendant company of which he was a director, as he was not only a director but the owner of the managing agency firm of the 2nd defendant company. Defendant No. 3 was really the moving spirit of both the companies until the 1st defendant company went into liquidation. This case was cited with approval by our Appeal Court in Pratt (Bombay) Limited v. Sassoon & Co., Limited.<sup>2</sup> Apart from the fact that the 2nd defendant company knew or must have known the amount of the loss incurred by the 1st defendant company through defendant No. 3 as the common officer of the two companies, the plaintiff has, by producing all the necessary documents and the statements of loss that he received from New York, and the entries in his books showing payment, the memo. of the National City Bank of New York showing despatch of the moneys due to Harris & Vose, proved satisfactorily that the amount of loss incurred by the 1st defendant company was Rs. 7,229. All these documents are in my opinion sufficient to dispense with any further proof of the transactions by calling evidence from New York or taking evidence there on commission. It would indeed be a great hardship on a commission agent in Bombay whose claim is honest, and who has produced all the important and necessary documents, the genuineness of which has not been challenged, that he should have to go to New York for further evidence in proof of his claim. A belated application was made to me after the plaintiff's case was closed to call defendant No. 3 from Madura on the alleged ground that he was lying ill. That application was not in my opinion a bona fide application. A day after the hearing of this suit commenced counsel for defendant No. 3 intimated to the Court that if the case remained part-heard over the week end defendant No. 3 would be able to come to Bombay. For two days, namely, February 5 and 6, after the week end I was engaged in the Parsi Chief Matrimonial Court. It was on February 7 that this application was made, merely to gain time, when it was felt that the case of guarantee made out by the plaintiff stood uncontradicted on the record.

I have already dealt with the interview of February 25 at which the plaintiff and his witness Chhaganlal said that defendant No. 3 on behalf of the 2nd defendant company agreed to stand guarantee for the amount of the loss in the transactions of the 1st defendant company, namely the transactions in suit. The first question is whether in fact he gave such guarantee. I have also dealt with the correspondence up to the filing of the suit. It was argued by counsel that the guarantee was alleged for the first time in the letter of December 12, 1936, because the plaintiff by that time must have come to know that he had no chance of recovering anything from the 1st defendant company, and also because by that time the plaintiff also knew that Rs. 5,870 odd were due by him to the 2nd defendant company in respect of their separate business. It was argued that the case of guarantee was put forward in order to prevent the 2nd defendant company from recovering the amount of that loss from the plaintiff. This to my mind is not correct. Firstly, the moneys had become due by the plaintiff to defendant No. 2 by September, 1936. Secondly, repeated demands had been made from defendant No. 3 to pay the amount due by the 1st defendant company at the several interviews which I have referred to. Thirdly, in his letters of November 9, 1935, and October 22, 1936, plaintiff wrote that he had often spoken to defendant No. 3 that he wanted to file a suit against both defendants Nos. 1 and 2, but that his hands were stayed by defendant No. 3. Plaintiff could only sue both the companies if one was the principal debtor and the other was the guarantor. If it was merely an account of the one company in the name of the other, plaintiff would have to sue the 2nd defendant company only. Fourthly, this guarantee has not been denied, neither in correspondence, nor by any evidence in Court. Both the plaintiff and his witness Chhaganlal impressed me as honest and respectable witnesses, and I believe the plaintiff when he said that but for the guarantee of the 2nd defendant company he would never have agreed to do business for the newly formed 1st defendant company. Neither defendant No. 3 nor any one else has come to give any contrary evidence on behalf of the 2nd defendant company. I entirely believe the plaintiff's evidence and rely on it.

The next question is whether defendant No. 3 had authority to give the guarantee and whether his guarantee is binding on the 2nd defendant company.

Counsel argued that one limited company could not stand guarantee for the contracts of another limited company without an express power given to the company either in so many words or to be inferred from the general language used. The memorandum and some of the articles of association of the 2nd defendant company together with Schedule A containing the articles of the managing agency agreement have been put in collectively as exhibit A-18. Among the objects for which that company was established cl. III(14) of the memorandum of association provides that the company can enter into partnership or arrangements for sharing profits, amalgamation, etc., with any person, firm or company carrying on or about to carry on similar business, and to lend money to, guarantee the contracts of or otherwise assist any such other company. It was argued that on a proper construction of this clause the 2nd defendant company could only guarantee the contracts of another company, in this case the 1st defendant company, if it entered into a partnership or arrangements or amalgamation as stated in the first part of that clause. In my opinion that construction is not correct. If it was correct, it would mean, for instance, that the 2nd defendant company guaranteed the contracts of its partner the 1st defendant company, if it had to enter into such a partnership. No guarantee in such a case could be required, as one partner is the agent of the other for the purpose of the partnership business. I think that the words such company in the second part of the clause merely describe the company's business, namely, business similar to the business of the company that gave the guarantee. Plaintiff's counsel referred me to article 135 of the articles of association which describes the general powers of the managing agents, namely that they might exercise all such powers and do all such acts and things as might be exercised or done by the company and not thereby or by law expressly directed or required to be done by the directors. Counsel for the 2nd defendant company referred me to art. 127, sub-clauses 13 and 21. This article describes the express powers of the board of directors of the company but without prejudice to the rights and powers of the managing agents by virtue of certain articles, including art. 135, and by virtue of any agreement entered into with the company and without prejudice to the general powers of the directors conferred by art. 126. It is provided by art. 127(21) that the directors could inter alia enter into all such contracts as they consider expedient. But this power is subject to the general power of the managing agents who under their agency agreement have power to enter into contracts and make all necessary arrangements and vary the contracts on behalf of the company. Reading all these articles and the clause of the memorandum of association and the agency agreement together, I find that the words giving the authority to defendant No. 3 as the proprietor of his managing agency firm are sufficiently wide to enable him to enter into a contract of guarantee.

The alternative case that the transactions in suit were really, those of the 2nd defendant company but had been done benami or in the name of the 1st defendant company has not been substantiated, though in the beginning of the negotiations defendant No. 3 himself wrote that the accounts of the two companies were to be one and the same. It is true that the plaintiff in his evidence could not properly distinguish between an account of the

"I was really unwilling to transfer the account and contracts, but when he (meaning defendant No. 3) told me on behalf of the 2nd defendant company that 2nd defendants would guarantee payment of the losses for the business done in the name of the 1st defendant company, I agreed to do that business. I understood from the 3rd defendant that this business was to be of the 2nd defendant company and that the 2nd defendant company stood guarantee for the losses. I understood the two to mean the same thing."
 RATILAL
 TRIBHOVANDAS

Strictly speaking this is not correct, because the two companies are not the same. Even though there was a common management and a common director, the two are in law separate entities with different memoranda and articles of association. It is difficult to understand what exactly defendant No. 3 meant by calling the 1st defendant company "a sister concern" of the 2nd defendant company, but mere nomenclature of that kind cannot establish the identity of the two. The contracts were sent to the 1st defendant company, margin was demanded from the 1st defendant company, the loss was in the first instance demanded from the 1st defendant company, and all this clearly shows that the 1st defendant company was the principal debtor and that the 2nd defendant company were really the guarantors. In my opinion the case of guarantee has been established by the plaintiff, and he is entitled to succeed both against the 1st defendant company as his debtor and against the 2nd defendant company as guarantor. The suit against defendant No. 3 must be dismissed, because it was sought to hold him personally liable only for breach of warranty of authority to give the guarantee, if the guarantee was not proved.

I do not think that the plaintiff can ask in this suit to set-off the decretal amount payable by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 against the amount which is admitted due by him to defendant No. 2 alone. Moreover, the 2nd defendant company themselves do not want that set-off. There must therefore be a decree for the plaintiff against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and a counter-claim in favour of defendant No. 2 as against the plaintiff. It may be that in execution under O. XXI, r. 18(4), of the Civil Procedure Code, the two amounts may be set-off, the smaller against the larger, but the Court is not here concerned with the question of execution.

In the result there will be a decree for the plaintiff against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for Rs. 7,229 with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum from January 7, 1937, till judgment, costs and interest on judgment at six per cent. per annum till payment.

Suit against defendant No. 3 dismissed. I make no order as to his costs, as he is principally responsible for this litigation.

There will be a decree on the counter-claim in favour of the 2nd defendant company against the plaintiff for Rs. 5,870-3-6 with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum from December 18, 1936, till judgment, costs of and incidental to the counter-claim, but no costs to be allowed for any hearing of the counter-claim as the amount had been admitted. Interest will run on the amount of the counter-claim at six per cent. per annum from judgment till payment.

Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 appealed.

B. J. Wadia J.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice B. J. Wadia. The plaintiff, who is a broker in Bombay, sued the three defendants for the amount of losses incurred in dealings in cotton on the New York Exchange during the year 1935. He sued defendant No. 1 as the principal debtor, defendant No. 2 as a surety, and defendant No. 3 apparently as having entered into the contract of suretyship on behalf of defendant No. 2. Defendant No. 2 is a company, which has existed for some time, and defendant No. 3 is the sole proprietor of the firm of the managing agents of defendant No. 2. Defendant No. 1 is a company, which had been formed shortly before the date of the present transactions, and defendant No. 3 was one of its directors. In 1935 the plaintiff, who had previously known defendant No. 3 and had done business for defendant No. 2, was asked to transfer defendant No. 2's account to defendant No. 1, and that he declined to do. He was distrustful of a new company of which he knew nothing. However, the evidence is that in February, 1935, defendant No. 3 came down to Bombay and persuaded the plaintiff to do business for defendant No. 1, and it was at that interview that defendant No. 3 is said to have given a guarantee on behalf of defendant No. 2 of the liabilities incurred by defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff. Pursuant to the arrangements then made, the plaintiff, through his ordinary brokers in New York, put through transactions for the purchase of 600 bales of cotton for the October settlement at specified prices. Subsequently the market went down, and as the plaintiff had not sufficient margin, he closed the transactions by instructing his New York brokers to sell 600 bales for October. Evidence as to these transactions was given by the plaintiff. He stated in the witness-box that he had employed Messrs. Harriss & Vose, his usual agents in New York, to carry out these transactions. He produced copies of the telegrams he had sent and the telegrams and letters which he had received in reply, purporting to show that these transactions of purchase and sale had been carried out. The signature on the telegrams is naturally not proved. Harriss & Vose eventually sent a statement of account, which is exhibit A-6. There is a printed signature on it of Harriss & Vose, and it is initialled "Per J. D. F.," the initials being typewritten. That statement was sent on to defendant No. 1, who never disputed it. Defendant No. 2 must have known about the account, because defendant No. 3 is a director of defendant No. 1 and also the managing agent of defendant No. 2. It is, however, clear that there is no legal evidence of the transactions having taken place on the New York Exchange. The actual contracts entered into on the New York Exchange are not produced, and there is no evidence of the signature of Harriss & Vose. The 2nd defendant company, which is the principal appellant, contends that it was not bound by the evidence adduced by the plaintiff. Defendant No. 1 has gone into

O. C. J.: liquidation and has not challenged the amount claimed by the plaintiff. But 1940 defendant No. 2, in the first instance, disputes the fact of the guarantee having been given, and, in the second place, contends that if it did guarantee the debt, it is entitled to have the debt strictly proved as against it, and that it is not bound by any admission made by defendant No. 1.

Beaumont C.J.

With regard to the factum of the guarantee, we have the evidence of the plaintiff and of his clerk that defendant No. 3 in February, 1935, did guarantee on behalf of defendant No. 2 the liability of defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff. There is nothing in writing, and the plaintiff himself, who is a layman, frankly admitted that he did not really know the difference between obtaining a guarantee and a transaction being entered into by an agent. He was very anxious that the transactions, which he was to enter into on behalf of defendant No. 1, should be regarded in substance as transactions of defendant No. 2, and he did not mind whether that result was brought about by defendant No. 2 being regarded as a principal or a guarantor. His evidence as to the terms of the alleged guarantee cannot be regarded as very accurate. But his clerk Chhaganlal was called, and he is an LL.B., and, therefore, may be taken to know something about general principles of law. He says that he was present at the interview, and that defendant No. 3 said that it was the 2nd defendant company's business and the moneys were of the 2nd defendant company, but still if the plaintiff wanted a guarantee, he would stand guarantee on behalf of the 2nd defendant company, and if any moneys remained unpaid, the 2nd defendant company would pay. That is clear evidence of a guarantee having been given. Defendant No. 3 did not go into the witness-box and did not, therefore, deny the account of this interview given by the plaintiff and his clerk, and the learned Judge accepted the plaintiff's evidence. No doubt one would have expected a guarantee of this sort to be put into writing, and it is true that no reference was made to the guarantee until the plaintiff's letter of December 12, 1936; but still the learned Judge having accepted the evidence of these two witnesses, relying naturally on the fact that defendant No. 3 did not choose to go into the witness-box to deny the account of the interview, there is no reason, in my opinion, why we should differ from the learned Judge on that question. I, therefore, accept the finding that defendant No. 2 did guarantee payment of any moneys remaining unpaid by defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff.

The question, then, arises whether on the evidence adduced defendant No. 2 is liable on the guarantee. It is well established that a guarantor is prima facie entitled to have the debt proved as against him. The fact that the principal debtor has admitted the debt, or that a judgment or award has been given against him for the debt, does not bind the guarantor, unless he was a party to the proceedings in which the judgment or the award was given, or was party to the admission of the principal debtor (see Ex parte Young; In re Kitchen.<sup>1</sup>) But the way the learned Judge puts the case against defendant No. 2 is this. He says, first, that it was an implied term of the dealings between defendant No. 1 and the plaintiff that defendant No. 1 should accept the accounts submitted in the ordinary course of business by the New York brokers ; and, secondly, that the debt which defendant No. 2 guaranteed was the debt as proved in accordance with this implied agreement.

With regard to the first proposition of the learned Judge, namely, that defendant No. 1 must be taken to have agreed to accept as evidence of the transactions on the New York Exchange the accounts sent by the brokers, the learned Judge relied on cases, which are generally referred to as the account-sale cases. The learned Judge set out a passage from the judgment of Couch C. J. in Hodgson et. al. v. Rupchand Hazarimal<sup>1</sup> which is in these terms (p. 41) :—

"The law as to account-sales is, that where an account between merchants in different countries has been transmitted from one to the other, and no objection is made after several opportunities of writing have occurred, the account is deemed in a Court of Equity a stated account, only to be opened when some cause is shown for the interposition of the Court; and when the goods are consigned to be disposed of in a foreign market, I think it must be considered that the consignor impliedly agrees that the account-sales furnished by the correspondents abroad shall be taken as prima facie evidence of what the goods realized. It would cause great expense and inconvenience if the debtor, by merely objecting to the account, could compel the procuring of evidence from abroad ; and, seeing that in practice merchants are satisfied with the truth of the account-sales, and ask for no further evidence, I think there is a good ground for considering that there is such an implied agreement."

I certainly do not desire to challenge the principle there laid down, which was founded on a dictum in Smith v. Blakey<sup>2</sup> and has been followed in Mayen v. Alston<sup>3</sup> and in Barlow v. Chuni Lall Neoghi.<sup>4</sup> But so far as I know, the principle of those cases has never been extended to the case of forward contracts. In all the cases referred to actual goods had been consigned, and the actual sale of the goods in a foreign country was not disputed, and the Court held that the account sent in by the foreign agent must be treated as prima facie evidence, subject to the right of the client to surcharge and falsify. Mr. Coltman relied on an unreported decision of this Court in Shree Meenakshi Mills, Ltd. v. Maurice Stern,<sup>5</sup> in which the question which arose was to some extent the same as the question in this case. There were in that case other points which had to be determined, but the question as to the proof of contracts entered into on the Liverpool Market came up for decision, and it appears to have been admitted in that case that the evidence, which was similar to that tendered in this case, was not sufficient. However, these account-sale cases were not cited, and, therefore, I do not regard the decision in Shree Meenakshi Mills, Ltd. v. Maurice Stern as being an authority on the question whether the principle of those cases should be applied to contracts of the character with which we have to deal.

I am very doubtful myself whether we should be justified in extending the principle of those cases to forward contracts. It is much easier to check the sale of actual goods consigned, and to verify details of such a sale, than to check the mere making of contracts upon a foreign exchange. However, assuming that it can be said as against defendant No. 1 that there was an implied agreement to accept the accounts submitted by the New York brokers

5 (1935) O. C. J. Appeal No. 50 of 1934, decided by Beaumont C. J. and Blackwell J., on September 5, 1935, (Unrep.)

O. C. J. as accurate, although such an agreement is not pleaded, I cannot accept the 1940 second proposition of the learned Judge, and I am of opinion that it is impos-SREE must depend on the true construction of the guarantee which he has given.
 MEENAKSHI If the guarantor merely guarantees payment of the debt of the principal MILLS, LTD. debtor, then he is entitled to require the debt to be proved as against him
 v. in accordance with the ordinary law, that is in this case under the Indian RATILAL Evidence Act. If, on the other hand, the principal debtor has agreed that as TRIBHOVAN- against him the debt shall be proved in a particular way, and the guarantor DAS has guaranteed the debt so to be proved, then I apprehend that there can be ——— no doubt that the guarantor would be bound by the particular method of ——— proof agreed to by the principal debtor and accepted by himself.

The two cases cited by Mr. Coltman illustrate the distinction. In Ex parte Young : In re Kitchen (supra) an agreement had been entered into between a creditor and a principal debtor for the sale of certain wines, and the surety had guaranteed payment for the wines and had also guaranteed that all the terms of the agreement would be duly carried out. One of the terms of the agreement was that there should be an arbitration in respect of any dispute arising between the parties, and upon an arbitration, damages had been awarded as against the principal debtor, and the question which the Court had to determine was whether the surety was bound to pay the amount of those damages, or whether he could claim that the amount of damage suffered by the creditor must be proved strictly as against him. The Court there held that the real question was what was the true intent and meaning of the guarantee? James L. J. says (p. 671) :—

"There are a great number of things which by the agreement they [principal debtors] are bound to do; he [the surety] guarantees that they will do these things, and if they fail to do them, then he is liable in an action against him by Messrs. Cantor [the creditors] for any damages which can be shewn by legal evidence to have been caused to them by default. That is what he has agreed."

So that on the construction of the agreement in that case the Court held that the surety had merely agreed to discharge the debts and liabilities of the principal debtor, and that there was no agreement by him to accept anything less than legal proof.

In the other case referred to, which is an Irish case, Guardians, Abbeylax Union v. Sutcliffe<sup>1</sup>, a bond had been given to secure the due performance of the duties of a rent-collector, and the conditions of the bond executed by the rent-collector and the surety were inter alia that the collector should collect the whole of the rates lawfully recoverable and pay the amount of the rates so collected to the treasurer whenever the sum exceeded £50, and also that he should deliver to the person or persons authorized to require the same true and perfect accounts in writing under his hand of all moneys received by him as collector, and when required to do so should deliver up his books, and so forth. The rent-collector collected money and made default, and the question was whether his books, in which he had recorded the amount of his collections, could be used in evidence against the surety. The Court differed, the learned Chief Justice thinking that the entries in the books were inadmissible as evidence against the surety. Mr. Justice Gibson and Mr. Justice Holmes took the opposite view, and, as I understand it, the view they took was that in substance the surety had guaranteed the debt of the rent-collector to be proved by means of these books. Mr. Justice Gibson says (p. 336):—

“Dealing with the matter as depending on principle only, the reception of the evidence must be rested on one of three grounds :—“1. that the bond is joint bond ;” (that does not apply here ; ) “2. that the books are part of the res gestae, 3, that the contract, from its nature and effect, makes the books evidence.”

He decided it primarily on the third ground, that is to say, that the actual debt guaranteed was the debt shown in the books.

Now, here, what the learned Judge has really held is that what defendant No. 2 guaranteed is the debt of defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff to be proved under the implied agreement arising from the account-sale cases. Even if one accepts the implied agreement, it seems to me quite impossible to hold that the guarantor agreed to guarantee the debt to be proved by this special method. No such guarantee is pleaded ; there is no evidence whatever that such a guarantee was given. To stretch a verbal guarantee so as to cover methods of proof of debt which there is no reason for supposing were in the consideration of the parties when the guarantee was given, would not, I think, be right or fair. The plaintiff was very unwise in not having the guarantee put into writing, and it would be unfair to let him take advantage of his omission, and to hold that, having no very definite evidence as to the terms of the guarantee, it should be treated as extending to the method of proof of the debt guaranteed. I find it impossible on the evidence before the Court to say that the plaintiff agreed that he would guarantee a debt to be proved by something less than ordinary legal evidence, and on that ground I think the appeal of defendant No. 2 must succeed.

Defendant No. 3 has appealed against the only part of the judgment against him, namely that he was given no costs. The learned Judge thought that he was principally responsible for the litigation, and I do not think there is any ground on which we should differ from the discretion which the learned Judge exercised as to the costs of defendant No. 3. So his appeal fails.

KANIA J. The relevant facts and documents have been referred to in the judgment delivered by the learned Chief Justice.

The plaintiff filed this suit claiming to act as a commission agent in respect of the transactions he was instructed to put through for the 1st defendant company. In paragraph 4 of the plaint he alleged that in or about February, 1935, defendant No. 3 as the managing director of the 1st defendant company employed the plaintiff as a commission agent for and on behalf of the 1st defendant company to effect forward transactions in American Cotton for October, 1935 delivery, on the terms and conditions mentioned in the contract form, copy whereof is annexed and marked “A”, and in the correspondence. The last sentence in that paragraph deals with the guarantee and runs as follows :—

The plaintiff then goes on to recite that the plaintiff effected purchases of 300, 200 and 100 bales on receipt of instructions from the 1st defendant company, and as margin was not paid, those outstanding purchases were closed by a sale. In paragraph 12 he states :—

“The plaintiff became personally liable in respect of the said transactions in the market and paid the amount due in respect thereof. The plaintiff submits that he is entitled to be indemnified in respect of the liability incurred and the payments made by the plaintiff on behalf of and on account of the 1st defendant company in respect of the said transactions.”

His case, therefore, on his plaint is that he was an agent employed for and on behalf of the 1st defendant company by defendant No. 3 and, therefore, entitled to the agent's indemnity. The terms of employment as between him and the 1st defendant company are, according to paragraph 4 of the plaint, stated in the contract note sent by him to the 1st defendant company and the correspondence which is annexed. In respect of the guarantee, his allegation is that defendant No. 2 stood guarantee for the amount due in respect of the transactions effected through the plaintiff as aforesaid. The fact of guarantee rests on oral evidence. The learned trial Judge on hearing evidence found it in favour of the plaintiff, and for the reasons given in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice, I see no reason to differ from that conclusion.

That raises the question of the extent of the liability of defendant No. 2. The learned Judge in the trial Court has stated as follows :—

“But I do not think that an agent owes the same duty to the guarantor which he owes to the principal in the matter of proving the transactions. I do not, therefore, think that the agent is bound to prove the transactions to the guarantors, but he has got to prove the amount of the liability for which the surety stood guarantee.”

Stated as it is, I am afraid I cannot agree with the opinion of the learned trial Judge. The question in fact is whether, according to the terms of the guarantee, defendant No. 2 is liable. In the normal course, what has to be proved against the principal debtor has to be proved against the guarantor. He may ask for, if at all, a larger amount of proof. By the terms of his guarantee he may however give up his right. In the present case the question of proof of the transactions against defendant No. 1 has not become material, because no defence was put in on his behalf, and according to the rules of pleading the plaintiff's allegations contained in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of the plaint were deemed to be admitted by that company. Defendant No. 2 has filed a written statement, in which that company stated that it had no knowledge of the allegations contained in the aforesaid paras, and it did not admit its liability. The company further alleged that it was not given any intimation about the said transactions and the said demand of margin money. Reading paragraph 3 of defendant No. 2's written statement, I am unable to hold that there was any admission of the allegations found in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of the plaint.

“No act of the principal can enlarge the guarantee, and no admission or acknowledgment by him can fix the surety with an amount other than that which was really due and which alone the surety was liable to pay.” (p. 671).

Those observations in the judgment of James L. J. in Ex parte Young : In re Kitchen<sup>1</sup> are worthy to be borne in mind for deciding the liability of the 2nd defendant company. Those observations, read along with s. 133 of the Indian Contract Act, refute the contentions urged on behalf of the plaintiff, that if on receipt of intimation from New York and conveying the same to the 1st defendant company, they did not challenge the transaction, it was not open to the surety thereafter to challenge the same. The question, therefore, resolves itself here into finding what guarantee was given by the 2nd defendant company. Nowhere in the pleading it was suggested that the statements or communications received from New York were to be considered as evidence, much less conclusive evidence, of the facts stated therein as against the 1st defendant company itself. As I have pointed out, the allegation in the plaint is that the terms of employment are contained in the contract note sent to the 1st defendant company and in the correspondence which is on record. Nowhere throughout those documents such a term is mentioned, nor suggested. The guarantee, according to paragraph 4 of the plaint, is for losses arising in respect of transactions effected through the plaintiff as aforesaid. I believe it means in accordance with the terms mentioned before. If so, on the pleading itself the case now put forward is not suggested and, in my opinion, is not warranted by the evidence on record.

An argument was based on what are compendiously described as account-sale cases, namely, Hodgson et al. v. Rupchand Hazarimal,<sup>1</sup> Mayen v. Alston<sup>2</sup> and Barlow v. Chuni Lall Neoghi.<sup>3</sup> Those were cases of actual sales of goods. The facts noticed in the reports do not show that the party disputed the sale itself. The disputes were in respect of what was realised, and whether the sale proceeds were properly accounted for. The wisdom of extending that principle to forward contracts may be disputed. The point is not here before us, in this appeal, and, therefore, I do not propose to discuss the question whether the principles underlying those cases should be extended and made applicable to forward contracts. But, as I have pointed out, the liability of the guarantor must be judged by his contract of guarantee and not by a contract between the principal debtor and the creditor. It would be importing a dangerous principle of law to widen the terms of the guarantee, when on the pleadings and on the evidence no justification can be found for including a term alleged in the course of argument. I, therefore, think that in the present case the terms of guarantee, as pleaded, and, as established, do not cover the stipulation that the 2nd defendant company as guarantor would be bound to accept even as prima facie evidence documents received from New York by the plaintiff. On that ground I think the appeal of defendant No. 2 should be allowed.

PER CURIAM. We dismiss the suit against defendant No. 2 and direct the plaintiff to pay three-fourths of his costs of the suit in the Court below, where he failed on the issue as to the fact of guarantee, and the whole of his costs of the appeal. We think there were no costs on the hearing of the counter-claim. One counsel in this Court allowed. Appeal of defendant No. 3 is dismissed with costs.

CHITNIS & KANGA

v.

September 25.

WAMANRAO S. MANTRI.*

Rules of the Bombay High Court, 1936, rr. 534 and 895†—Ex parte order for taxation of bill of costs passed by Prothonotary—Order included work done by attorneys on appellate side and in mofussil—Validity of such order—Jurisdiction of Court to pass such order—Power of Taxing Master to tax bills for work done in mofussil.

Under r. 534 of the Rules of the High Court of Bombay, 1936, an order for taxation on the original side cannot be made in respect of costs incurred on the appellate side of the High Court. A Judge has discretion under that rule to direct attorney's bills to be so taxed in any other case.

The taxation of a bill of costs does not determine the liability of the client to pay, and he is entitled to challenge his liability on a summons under r. 895 after taxation has taken place.

Since the power of a Judge to direct taxation under r. 534 is discretionary, when an application is made ex parte for a common form order for taxation under that rule, the Court may direct the solicitor to issue a summons, and may hear what the client has to say in the matter. If the Court thinks that there is a serious dispute as to the fact or terms of employment of the solicitor, the Court may refuse to make an order for taxation and leave the attorney to file a suit; and in that suit the solicitor's right to recover can be first determined, and the amount to be recovered can be determined subsequently by taxation.

The Taxing Master of the High Court has power to tax the bill of costs of an attorney on the original side scale in relation to work done in the mofussil.

TAXATION of bill of costs.

The appellants, Chitnis & Kanga, solicitors, obtained from the Prothonotary and Senior Master of the High Court an ex parte order, under r. 534 of the Rules of the High Court, 1936, directing the Taxing Master of the High Court to tax their bill of costs relating to (1) suit No. 1447 of 1929 filed on the original side of the High Court, (2) a petition for probate in the District Court at Satara, (3) an appeal in the High Court on its appellate side, and (4) certain miscellaneous work done in the mofussil.

* O. C. J. Appeal No. 16 of 1940.

† The rules run as under:—

534. The Taxing Master shall tax the bills of costs on every side of the Court (except the Appellate Side) and in the Insolvency Court. All other bills of costs of Attorneys shall also be taxed by him when he is directed to do so by a Judge's order.

895. An Attorney, when he has taxed his bill of costs against his client, may apply in Chambers on Summons for an order against his client or the legal representatives of such client, for payment of the sum allowed on taxation on such sum as may then remain due. The Judge on hearing the summons may make such order or refer the parties to a suit. Such order if made may be executed under Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure as a decree for money.

The respondent, Wamanrao S. Mantri, for whom the above work was done, contended before the Taxing Master that the order passed by the Prothonotary was ultra vires and not binding upon him so far as it related to items Nos. (2), (3), and (4).

The Taxing Master took the view that so long as the ex parte order stood he was bound to tax the costs relating to the work mentioned in that order, and directed the respondent to obtain an order from the Court if he wanted the Taxing Master not to proceed with items Nos. (2), (3) and (4).

The respondent thereupon took out a chamber summons submitting—

"It is not competent to the said attorneys to take advantage of the procedure that applies to taxation of solicitors' costs on the Original Side of this Hon'ble Court in respect of costs in the mofussil and on the Appellate Side of this Hon'ble Court. I further submit the matter is governed by the Bombay Pleaders Act 17 of 1920. I further submit the ex parte order made without notice to me and without giving me an opportunity of being heard is of no effect and is in any event against equity, justice and good conscience and that I am entitled to have the same set aside."

Somjee J., before whom the chamber summons was argued on March 11, 1940, set aside the ex parte order of the Prothonotary and Senior Master.

Chitnis & Kanga appealed.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga and N. H. C. Coyajee, for the appellants.

F. J. Coltman, for the respondent.

V. F. Taraporewala, (with leave of the Court), for the Law Society.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Somjee setting aside an order made by the Prothonotary for taxation. The learned Judge gave no judgment and therefore we do not know on what view his decision was based.

The order made by the Prothonotary was the common form order for taxation of a bill of costs of Messrs. Chitnis & Kanga in relation to certain matters, one of which was an appeal on the appellate side of the High Court. An order for taxation on the original side cannot be made in respect of costs incurred on the appellate side of the High Court, and as to this item, admittedly the order to tax was wrong.

The solicitors' case is that they were employed by the client and his father in connection with probate proceedings in the Satara District Court, and in those proceedings they filed a formal retainer. They did a certain amount of work in that case partly as attorneys and partly as pleaders, although a pleader was employed to argue the case. They also allege that they did miscellaneous work in the mofussil. The order made by the Prothonotary was under r. 534 which provides that—

"the Taxing Master shall tax the bills of costs on every side of the Court (except the Appellate Side) and in the Insolvency Court. All other bills of costs of attorneys shall also be taxed by him when he is directed to do so by a Judge's order."

So that a Judge has discretion to direct attorneys' bills to be taxed in any case, and where a bill is taxed, the attorney can apply by summary process for payment under r. 895.

It is argued by Mr. Coltman in the first place that the fact of employment of the solicitors, and the terms of employment are disputed, and it is unreasonable to put parties to the expense of taxing a bill when ultimately nothing may be payable. The taxation of a bill does not determine the liability of the client to pay, and he is entitled to challenge his liability on a summons under r. 895 after taxation has taken place. As I have pointed out the power of a Judge to direct taxation under r. 534 is discretionary. When an application is made ex parte for a common form order for taxation, the Court may direct the solicitor to issue a summons, and may hear what the client has to say in the matter. If the Court thinks that there is a serious dispute as to the fact or terms of employment of the solicitor, the Court may refuse to make an order for taxation and leave the attorney to file a suit; and in that suit the solicitor's right to recover can be first determined, and the amount to be recovered can be determined subsequently by taxation. In the present case, on the affidavits, I do not think there is such serious doubt as to the client's liability to pay as to justify us in refusing to make an order for taxation.

Then it is said that the costs of proceedings in the mofussil cannot be taxed by the Taxing Master of the High Court, who will tax the bill on the ordinary original side scale. With regard to that there is a direct authority in the decision of this Court in Nowroji v. Kanga and Sayani,<sup>1</sup> where the Court of Appeal held that an attorney of this Court was entitled to have his bill taxed on the original side although it related to work done in the mofussil. That case, as is noted in the judgment, related to costs incurred before the Pleaders Act of 1920 came into operation, but in my view that Act has no effect on the present question. The Act provides in s. 17, which has been replaced by s. 3 of the Legal Practitioners' Fees Act of 1926, that a legal practitioner (which includes an attorney) may enter into a special agreement as to the terms of his remuneration. But there is no question of special remuneration here. Section 18, which was also relied upon, deals merely with the amount of pleader's fees which can be recovered against the opposing party. That again has nothing to do with the present matter. In my opinion we are bound by the decision in Nowroji v. Kanga and Sayani to hold that the Taxing Master is entitled to tax the bill in relation to work done in the mofussil. In my opinion therefore the appeal must be allowed with costs.

KANIA J. The jurisdiction of the Court to make the order for taxation under r. 534 in connection with matters sought to be taxed here (excluding the work done on the appellate side) cannot be disputed. Rule 534 in terms is applicable. It is therefore improper to contend that the order made by the Prothonotary was ultra vires. Such orders are ordinarily made ex parte, and on the footing that the attorney is employed as such. The client's liability to pay the taxed costs can be disputed when the attorney takes out a summons for payment under r. 895. Even before that it does not appear to be out of place for a client to take out a summons to set aside the ex parte order, and on the hearing of that summons the Court may direct either that the enquiry sought to be made in connection with the employment of the attorney by the client may be made at that stage, or having regard to the disputes raised by the client the attorneys should be referred to a separate suit. If however there is prima facie evidence or the Court is satisfied on the affidavits that no such order revoking the previous order should be made, the taxation under the order obtained ex parte may proceed and the client can still, when an order is sought for enforcing payment, raise the contentions permitted to him. In the present case it appears that the learned Judge set aside the ex parte order passed by the Prothonotary on the footing that it was ultra vires. I am led to this conclusion from the statement found in the affidavit of the respondent. The learned Judge does not appear to have decided that there was no employment of the appellants by the respondent or his father or that there was no satisfactory evidence to lead to that conclusion and therefore left the appellants to their ordinary remedy of filing the suit. On that footing I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), Sec. 17—Minor—Custody—Child of tender years—Natural mother preferable to father as guardian—Interest of minor.

In the matter of the custody of a minor child, the paramount consideration is the interest of the child rather than the rights of the parents. In the case of a minor child of tender years, the proper person to whom the custody of the child should be given is the natural mother and she should be preferred to the father, as it is impossible to find any adequate substitute for the love and care of the natural mother.

All orders made as to the custody of a child are of a temporary nature, and those interested in the minor are always at liberty to apply to the Court for a change in the custody.

CUSTODY of minor.

The petitioner Shripad was married to the respondent Saraswatibai on February 8, 1936, according to Hindu rites. On October 24, 1938, the respondent gave birth to a son, Vinodchandra.

Soon afterwards it was discovered that the respondent was suffering from tuberculosis. The child was therefore kept with the father in Bombay, and the respondent went first to Kirkee on November 13, 1938, for treatment and change. Next, she went to the Miraj Hospital for treatment on December 4, 1938. She was discharged from the Miraj Hospital as cured on July 30, 1939. She then went to Poona first and Khandala afterwards for change. Ultimately she returned to Bombay by the end of May, 1940.

The petition was heard by Kania J.

On September 12, 1940, his Lordship passed an order entrusting the custody of the child to the father, and delivered the following judgment.

KANIA J. This is a petition for obtaining the custody of the minor son of the petitioner from his wife the respondent. They were married in February, 1936, and the minor was born to them on October 24, 1938. Ten days after the birth the child was taken to the petitioner's house and remained in the care of the petitioner till about the end of May, 1940. The respondent was suffering from T.B. and was advised to go out of Bombay. She first went to Kirkee in November, 1938, and from there to Miraj. Some operations were performed on her and she was discharged from the Miraj Hospital at the end of July, 1939. According to her she was advised to go to some hill station to recoup her health, and accordingly she went to Poona and Khandala. She returned to Bombay towards the end of May, 1940. On May 29, 1940, the minor was sent out with a servant to Chowpatty for an airing and did not return to the petitioner's house. On May 31, 1940, the petitioner's attorneys addressed a letter to the respondent alleging that the minor was wrongfully removed, at the instance of the respondent, to her parents' house. The petition was filed on July 16, 1940.

It is not disputed that in law the father is the natural guardian of the minor and as such is entitled to the custody of the minor. The only ground urged on behalf of the respondent is that having regard to the tender age of the minor he should have the benefit of the maternal care of the respondent which he is not likely to get in the house of the petitioner. The petitioner has married another wife and it is contended that in the house of the petitioner the minor will not get the same care as he will have if he is permitted to stay with the respondent. Two decisions of this Court have been relied on to show that the welfare of the minor is considered an important factor to decide the question of custody. The facts of each case led to the particular decision in those cases and the facts there were distinctly different as in those cases the minor was permitted to stay with the mother and a third party for several years before the petition was made. In the present case since the birth of the child the minor has stayed with the petitioner. There is some force in the contention of the petitioner that the minor was removed without his knowledge. The point however is not material. The respondent's health from the time of the birth of the minor was not good and there appears to be no reason why a change in the normal life of this minor, which he lived till May, 1940, is required. The respondent is not driven away from the house of the petitioner. She has chosen to stay away from her husband, and I do not think that the interest of the society justifies the petitioner from being deprived of the custody of the minor on the vague ground of the welfare of the minor under the circumstances of this case. In my opinion, the respondent is not justified in retaining the child, and the interest of the minor does not require that he should under the circumstances of this case be kept with the respondent. Nothing is proved against the petitioner personally, and in my opinion the petitioner is entitled to the custody of the minor. I accordingly order that the respondent do return the minor abovenamed to the custody of the petitioner. In default the order may be executed by the minor being taken charge of and delivered over to the custody of the petitioner. Having regard to the relationship between the parties I make no order as to costs.

Kania J.

The wife appealed.

K. M. Munshi, for the appellant.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga, for the respondent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kania on a petition presented by the father of a minor, under s. 25 of the Guardians and Wards Act. Under that section the Court can return the custody of the minor to his father, who is his natural guardian, if it is of opinion that to do so will be for the welfare of the minor ward.

The parents of the minor were married in February, 1936, and the minor, a boy, was born in October, 1938. After the birth the mother unfortunately contracted tuberculosis, and she had to go away for treatment, and the child was taken by the father and kept at his mother's house. The mother of the minor was discharged from the sanatorium at the end of July, 1939, but she was advised to remain at hill stations for a time in order to complete her cure, and she came back to Bombay, considering herself to be cured, at the end of May, 1940. On May 29 the child was out with a servant in attendance, and was taken round to the house of the mother and her parents, and it has been retained by the mother ever since. The circumstances in which the child was taken by the mother are in dispute. The father says that it was virtually kidnapped by an uncle of the wife. The uncle, however, has put in an affidavit denying that he kidnapped the child, and saying that it was taken by the servant to the mother's house. As the servant, in charge of the child when it is alleged to have been kidnapped, has not put in an affidavit, it is probable that the mother's story is true. However, that is not very material. The fact is that from the end of May, 1940, the child has been in the custody of the mother, and the father now asks to have it returned to him. As I have said, under the Act we have to consider what will be in the best interests of the minor.

I think the law on questions of this sort is the same in this country as in England, though, of course, social habits may be different. The modern view of Judges in England is that it is impossible, in the case of a young child, to find any adequate substitute for the love and care of the natural mother. If the natural mother is a suitable person, the Courts in England will as a general rule hand over the custody of a child of tender years to the mother. The mother's position is regarded as of much more importance in modern times than it was in former days, when a wife was regarded as little more than the chattel of her husband. The view of society in India as to the position of women may not have advanced so far or so fast as in

O. C. J. 1940 England, but at the same time the right of the mother to the custody of her young children is undoubtedly recognized in this country, see for example Bai Tara v. Mohanlal.<sup>1</sup> However the paramount consideration is the interest of the child, rather than the rights of the parents. Human nature is much the same all the world over, and in my opinion if the mother is a suitable person to take charge of the child, it is quite impossible to find an adequate substitute for her for the custody of a child of tender years.

Beaumont C.J.

It is suggested here that the mother's health has not recovered. It might be dangerous to send a child to live in the custody of a woman suffering from tuberculosis. But the evidence before the Court is that the mother has recovered. She was discharged from the sanatorium about a year and a half ago, and the doctor says in his letter, exhibit No. 1, that she was discharged as an arrested case. The subsequent examination of her sputum has not shown any change, and Dr. Billimoria in exhibit No. 3 reported on June 13, 1940, that no T. B. was detected. On the evidence before the Court there is no reason for supposing that the health of the child will suffer if its custody is handed over to the mother. Orders as to the custody of a child are always of a temporary nature. Those interested in the minor are at liberty to apply to the Court. In this case the father can apply to the Court at any time; and if he thinks that the health of his child is suffering, he can ask the Court to appoint a doctor to examine the child. I do not think that on the evidence before us there is at the moment any necessity to appoint a doctor to examine the state of the mother's health, but if at any time there is any reason for supposing that her ailment has returned, the father can apply to the Court to get her examined by an independent doctor, and submission to such an examination could be made a condition to her retention of the custody of the child.

There is no question here of removing the child from the guardianship of the father. The father is the natural guardian, and there is no application to remove him from that position. He remains the natural guardian, but in the interests of the child itself we are satisfied that its custody ought, for the present, to be with the mother.

The parents unfortunately are not living together, and probably will not live together, because the father has contracted marriage with another woman. That under Hindu law he is entitled to do, but it is difficult to suppose that a step-mother, whose age we are told is about seventeen, is likely to be a good substitute for the natural mother; whilst the father himself will have other occupations and will have to entrust the actual upbringing and charge of a child of this age to somebody else. In my opinion, there is not the slightest doubt that the natural mother is the proper person to have the custody of the child, and there is no evidence before the Court to justify us in thinking that she is not a proper person to have that custody. Her parents appear to have adequate means to maintain her and the child. The father is, of course, entitled to access to his child. Probably there will be no difficulty in arranging that. If there is, he will have to apply to the Court to arrange the circumstances in which he can see his child.

I think the learned Judge in the Court below went wrong in the exercise of his discretion, because he did not recognise that the paramount consideration in a case of this sort is the interest of the minor. He refers to the interest of the minor as being a vague ground for exercising his discretion. That is the paramount ground, and prima facie it is in the interest of the child that it should be brought up by the mother. We, therefore, direct that the custody of the child, until further order, be with the mother. The appeal is allowed.

B. J. WADIA J. I agree with the order proposed by the learned Chief Justice.

No doubt it is laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Basant v. Narayaniah,<sup>1</sup> that among Hindus, as in England, the father is the natural guardian of his children during their minorities and that the guardianship is in the nature of a sacred trust. That natural right of the father has received statutory recognition in s. 19 (b) of the Guardians and Wards Act, VIII of 1890. But s. 19 is in my opinion controlled by s. 17 of the same Act, according to which the paramount consideration is the welfare of the minor.

The father of the minor has married again. That in itself may not be a ground for depriving him of the custody of his minor child. But the Court has got to consider all the circumstances of the case, and taking human nature as the same here as elsewhere, a step-mother cannot be expected to be very much interested in the welfare of a minor step-son, nor likely to give him the attention, love and sympathy which the child naturally requires. It is not the welfare of the father, nor the welfare of the mother, that is the paramount consideration for the Court. It is the welfare of the minor and of the minor alone which is the paramount consideration; and I agree with Shah J. in Bai Tara v. Mohanlal<sup>2</sup> where he observed as follows (p. 782):—

In that case the boy was seven years old. In this case the boy is just about two years of age, and what was urged in Bai Tara v. Mohanlal can be applied with even greater force to the case of a boy who is two years old.

Taking all these circumstances into consideration, I think that at present the custody of the child should be with the mother. But that will not, as has been pointed out by the learned Chief Justice, prevent the father from making a further application to the Court at any later date, under the liberty reserved to him to apply, when he may be able to satisfy the Court that it will then be in the interest and for the welfare of the minor child on account of the mother's health or the child's health, or on account of want of means for maintenance, or on any other just and reasonable ground, that it should leave the mother's custody and instead live with the father.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed, and I agree with the order proposed.

PER CURIAM. As the wife is not asking for costs, there will be no order as to costs throughout. The notice of motion is discharged. The mother

A tax on income accruing or arising or received in British India by a person resident outside British India is legislation relating to something i.e. certain income in British India and it falls within the words of s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1919.

The Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926, applies wherever a Government of the nature specified in the Act carries on a business anywhere, and is not confined to business carried on in British India.

Where a Dominion Government, as specified in the Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926, is carrying on a business anywhere, it is liable to British Indian income-tax in respect of the income, profits and gains of that business which accrue or arise or are received in British India, as though such Government were a company.

The definition of "company" in s. 2(6) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, includes a Dominion Government deemed to be a company under the Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926.

the business of the bank received in British India, and as such liable to be assessed to income-tax, by the combined operation of s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926, and the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

A property, situate within British India, taken over by an Indian State Bank from its debtor, a subject of the Indian State, in part satisfaction of the loan advanced to him, is not property occupied in British India for the purposes of the business, but the income derived from such business is income arising in connection with such business and is liable to be assessed to income-tax under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

The profits made by an Indian State Bank on the sale of investments made by it in the Government of India securities—such profits being the excess realised over the cost price of the investments, if not appropriated as accretions to capital, are assessable to income-tax under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

PATIALA
STATE BANK.

REFERENCE under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

The Patiala State Bank (assessee) was owned wholly by the Patiala State and carried on banking business. It was not a separate legal entity but was only a department of the Patiala State Government. The Bank had its head office at Patiala and had several branches in the State, but had no branches outside it. In British India it collected interest on Government securities held by it through the Imperial Bank of India and the Central Bank of India, and at times through brokers.

The Bank was assessed by the Income-tax Officer, Bombay, on a total income of Rs. 1,26,026 which had accrued to it in British India for the financial year 1935-36 ended on March 31, 1936. This income was mainly derived from interest on Government of India securities. The Bank submitted a return of its income but claimed exemption from tax on the ground that the income was that of an Indian State.

The Income-tax Officer, however, disallowed the claim and made the assessment. The Bank appealed to the Assistant Commissioner, but the appeal was dismissed as it was out of time. The Bank then applied to the Commissioner in revision under s. 33 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and claimed deductions on its income from Government securities. The Commissioner rejected the Bank's contentions and on the materials before him altered the figure of assessment to Rs. 1,18,813. The Bank thereupon applied to the Commissioner to refer the case to the High Court under s. 66(2) of the Act.

The Commissioner referred the following questions for the opinion of the High Court :—

(1) Whether the Government Trading Taxation Act (III of 1926) is applicable to the Patiala State Bank rendering it liable to taxation under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922?

(2) Whether the investment by the Patiala State Bank of a part of its surplus funds in the Government of India Securities constitutes trading or business in British India within the meaning of s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act?

(3) Whether the property situate at Mussoorie taken over by the Patiala State Bank from its debtor, a subject of the Patiala State, in part satisfaction of a loan advanced to him, is property occupied in British India for the purposes of its trade or business in British India within the meaning of s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act and whether all income arising from such property is liable to assessment by virtue of the provisions of the said Act?

PATIALA STATE BANK
- (4) Whether the sum of Rs. 66,720 received by the Patiala State Bank on the sale of its investments during the year 1934-35 being the excess realized by it over the cost price of such investments, which has been included under the heading of profits in the relative profit and loss accounts and balance sheet, is assessable to Income-tax?
- (5) Whether the income received by the Patiala State Bank from its investments in British India constitutes income arising in connection with a trade or business carried on in British India within the meaning of s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act and is therefore liable to assessment to income-tax?
- (6) Whether if the Patiala State Bank is assessable under s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act to income-tax under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the said Bank is entitled to be allowed a proportionate part of its expenses of the nature mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922) incurred by it in carrying on the business and for earning their profits or gains before their profits or gains assessable to tax are computed?
- (7) Whether the assessment to Income-tax and Super-tax for the year 1935-36 on the Patiala State Bank is a legal and valid assessment?

“From the above section [s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926], it will be clear that when an Indian State carries on a trade or business of any kind it (the State) is liable to tax in respect of the trade or business and of all operations connected therewith and all property occupied in British India and all goods owned in British India for the purposes thereof and all income arising in connection therewith are to be taxed to income-tax and super-tax to the same extent and in the same manner as a company would be taxed. In this case, the finding of fact is that the Patiala State is doing banking business through the Patiala State Bank. This cannot be disputed and the contents of the printed Profit and Loss accounts and Balance Sheets which it issues, (exhibit A), are convincing evidence of this fact. All the investments made in British India by the Bank are undoubtedly in connection with its banking business. Hence under the aforesaid s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act, the State is to be held liable to the extent a company doing such business would be liable. The liability of a company would be to the extent defined in s. 4 of the Act viz., on all income accruing, arising or received in British India or deemed to accrue, arise or to have been received in British India in connection with the said business and all property occupied for its purposes and all goods owned in connection therewith.

As to the question (1) it is respectfully submitted that the answer should be in the affirmative as the Patiala State is an Indian State doing banking business. As regards question (2), it does not state the facts correctly when it refers to investments of “a part of its surplus funds”. The finding of fact is that the investments in British India are made out of the total money held by the Bank for its banking business and not only from surplus funds. Section 2 of Act III of 1926 does not refer to “trade or business in British India” but to “the trade or business” viz. the trade or business carried on by the State and to “all operations connected therewith.” The answer to the question should therefore be that the investment in British India in Government securities of a part of the money held for the purposes of the banking business constitutes an operation connected with the banking business carried on by the State within the meaning of s. 2 of the said Act.

As regards question (3), it does not properly arise as no income from any such property is included in the assessment. However, it is submitted that the answer to this question should also be in the affirmative for the following reasons :—

The Government Trading Taxation Act does not require that the State should carry on business in British India. If the State carries on a business anywhere then all income arising in connection with that business shall be liable under the Indian

Income-tax Act in the same manner and to the same extent as in the like case a company would be liable. The State acquired this property in the course of its business operations and holds it as part of its assets. The income from the property arises therefore in connection with the business and as it arises in British India it is taxable in the same way as other property income in British India.

As regards question (4), the item in question will be liable to tax if it is an item of profit made in the course of the banking business. Whether it is an item of such profit or otherwise is a question of fact and the finding of fact being that it is so, the answer to the question must be in the affirmative. In its printed Profit and Loss accounts for the year 1934-35 (exhibit A), the item is described by the Bank itself as "profit on the sale of investments" and "difference on sale of investments" under the head "Income" and is included in the gross receipts along with income from interest, exchange, commission etc. The same has been done as regards the two succeeding years. Thus in the Profit and Loss account for the half year ended March 31, 1935 (exhibit A) on the Credit Side, under the head "Income" are mentioned,

Rs. as. ps.

| "Interest, Exchange, Commission, profit on sale of investmentsand other Miscellaneous earnings | 2,96,842-4-10 |

This had been done year after year and leads to the inference that the Bank was regularly dealing in investments with a view to earn profit. Also as noted in the order under s. 33 (exhibit D) the transactions which resulted in this profit were of sufficient frequency to lead to the inference that they were part of the business of the Bank.

In this connection, I would refer to the case of the Westminster Bank, 17 Tax Cases 381, and in particular, to the opening sentences of Lord Buckmaster's judgment at page 401.

As regards question (5), the answer must, it is submitted, be in the affirmative in view of the answer suggested to question (2) above.

Question (6) has been withdrawn as the claim has since been allowed and the net income reduced accordingly (exhibit E).

As regards question (7), the answer has it is submitted to be in the affirmative in view of answers to questions (1) to (5) above."

This reference was heard with Reference No. 2 of 1940, in which the assessee was the same and the same questions were involved, but the year of assessment was 1936-37.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga, for the assessee. The Patiala State Bank is a department of the Patiala State. The Bank has no branch in British India and does not carry on business in British India. In British India the Bank merely holds investments in Government securities of the Government of India and Treasury Bills. The Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, does not apply. The Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926, which is sought to be applied, is ultra vires the Government of India. Section 65 of the Government of India Act, 1919, provides: "The Indian Legislature has power to make laws for all persons, for all courts, and for all places and things, within British India". A foreign state is not a person and there can be no legislation in respect of a foreign state. Income-tax law is personal and is not in respect of a thing. Patiala State is not a dominion within the scope of the Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926. It is a vassal State with treaty obligations with the British Government, but is not created by Parliament: Aitchison's "Treaties, Agreements and Sanads", Vol. I, p. 160.  STATE BANK M. C. Setalvad, Advocate General, with G. N. Joshi, for the Commissioner.
 — The Government Trading Taxation Act, 1926, is not in respect of a person outside British India but of things in British India. The former Act extends the definition of "company" to include foreign Governments of the character mentioned in s. 2 of the Act. Income-tax is a tax on income which is within the territory. Income may be profits of business or dividends on shares or interest on securities. Merely because taxation involves an assessee, it is not therefore in respect of a person. The tax is on something within the realm.
 The Act is against a person outside the territory for a thing inside the territory :
Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners<sup>2</sup>. The taxing Act attaches itself to "income profits and gains". "Income profits and gains" are the subject-matter of legislation. Assessment in respect of income in British India is legislation in respect of income in British India and if a non-resident foreigner is liable for income accruing or arising in British India, the tax is still on a thing and not a person. The Bank is therefore liable to tax. The effect of Act III of 1926 is to bring foreign governments carrying on business within the operation of the Income-tax Act of 1922, as a company. Public property of a foreign state is not liable to taxation under International law. Act III of 1926 was passed to make this property liable and enables the public property of the State to be taxed in British India when it carries on business. The Act of 1926 has to be read with the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. It extends the definition of company contained in the latter Act. The Income-tax Act not only relates to income in British India but it is directed to get at income accruing in British India. The income-tax levy is territorial : Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 8th ed., p. 126. The Act of 1926 is also based on this principle. The absence of machinery to tax does not affect the liability to tax. The absence of such machinery is irrelevant as the liability to tax

1 (2), 2 (2), (6), 3, 4, 6, 18 (7), 19 and 51 of the Indian Income-tax Act. Both the Acts are personal Acts i.e. Acts dealing with a person. The Act of 1926 converts a person into a company and it is suggested that the tax in respect of it is on a thing. If the Act of 1926 is intra vires, its effect must be that the trading must be in British India though the Act is in very wide terms. The treaty between the Patiala State and the British Government is a treaty of mutual help. This is not a case of protection.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is a reference made by the Income-tax Commissioner under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and the substantial question, which arises, is whether the Patiala State Bank is liable to be assessed to income-tax under the Government Trading Taxation Act (III of 1926).

The facts found are that the Patiala State Bank is owned wholly by the Patiala State and carries on banking business. It has no separate entity, and I take it that when the Commissioner says "it is owned wholly by the Patiala State," he means that it is owned and controlled by the Ruler of the Patiala State, that is the Maharaja, who constitutes the government of the State. The questions raised relate to the assessments for two years, 1935-36 and 1936-37, and in respect of each of those years I gather that a notice was sent to the principal officer of the Patiala State Bank, and he made a return on which the assessments are based. We are not, therefore, concerned to consider whether the Patiala State Bank was bound to comply with the notices, and to make the required returns, nor are we concerned to consider what would have happened, if the Patiala State Bank had adopted a different course. It is possible that in that event the machinery for taxing a foreign company through its agent would have been applicable, but that is not a matter which calls for our decision.

The principal point, which has been argued, and the only question of substance is whether the Government Trading Taxation Act of 1926 is a valid Act. The argument of the assessee is that it is ultra vires the Government of India. Before determining whether or not it is ultra vires the Government of India, it is necessary to consider what the Act actually means and purports to effect. The title is :

"An Act to determine the liability of certain Governments to taxation in British India in respect of trading operations."

Then the preamble is :

"Whereas it is expedient to determine the liability to taxation for the time being in force in British India of the Government of any part of His Majesty's Dominions, exclusive of British India, in respect of any trade or business carried on by or on behalf of such Government."

Then in s. 2 it is enacted as follows :

"(1) Where a trade or business of any kind is carried on by or on behalf of the Government of any part of His Majesty's Dominions, exclusive of British India, that Government shall, in respect of the trade or business and of all operations connected therewith, all property occupied in British India and all goods owned in British India for the purposes thereof, and all income arising in connection therewith, be liable

(a) to taxation under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the like case a company would be liable."

O. C. J. Sub-section (2) provides :

PATIALA

Beaumont C.J.

(2) "For the purposes of the levy and collection of income-tax under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (1), any Government to which that sub-section applies shall be deemed to be a company within the meaning of that Act, and the provisions of that Act shall apply accordingly."

Then sub-s. (3) enacts that the expression "His Majesty's Dominions" includes any territory which is under His Majesty's protection. Having regard to the Sanads, to which we have been referred, of 1815, 1847 and 1860, I feel no doubt that the Patiala State is a State under His Majesty's protection, and, therefore, comes within the expression "His Majesty's Dominions" in Act III of 1926.

It is to be noticed that the Act applies wherever a Government of the nature specified in the Act, which for simplicity I will refer to as "Dominion Government," carries on a business anywhere. I can see no justification for the view, which appears to have prevailed in the only case to which we have been referred in which this Act has been considered by a High Court in India, namely, In the matter of Ram Prasad,<sup>1</sup> that the Act is confined to business carried on in British India. It seems to me that the title, the preamble and the operative part of s. 2 make it perfectly clear that it applies to every case in which the Dominion Government is carrying on a business, and when that happens, the Dominion Government is liable to Indian income-tax, as though it were a company.

Turning to the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922, which is the Act applicable in this case, "company" is defined in s. 2(6) as meaning a company as defined in the Indian Companies Act, 1913, or formed in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or of Royal Charter or Letters Patent, or of an Act of the Legislature of a British possession, and includes any foreign association carrying on business in British India, and which is certified as therein mentioned. I think the effect of Act III of 1926 is to add to that definition so as to include a Dominion Government deemed to be a company under Act III of 1926. The effect of the charging sections, ss. 3 and 4, is to render the income, profits and gains of a company liable to British Indian Income-tax Act, if such income, profits and gains accrue or arise or are received in British India. So that Act III of 1926 comes to this : that where a Dominion Government is carrying on a business anywhere, it is liable to British Indian Income-tax Act in respect of the income, profits and gains of that business which accrue or arise or are received in British India. The Act was, I understand, passed in pursuance of reciprocal arrangements with Great Britain and Dominion Governments, and it is to be noticed that it is in very similar terms to s. 25 of the Finance Act of 1925, which applies to Great Britain.

The contention of the assessee is that this Act is ultra vires the Indian Legislature, since it does not fall within the legislative powers conferred by s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1919. That section, so far as material, provides : "The Indian legislature has power to make laws for all persons, for all courts, and for all places and things, within British India." The words are expressed in the most general terms, and in effect enact that the power of the Indian Legislature is to be territorial and is to extend to all persons and things within British India. Now, the argument is that income-tax is a tax imposed on persons, and that the Ruler of the Patiala State cannot be regarded as a person within British India. The latter proposition is, no doubt, correct, and up to a point I agree with the contention of the assessee on the first proposition. I think that, properly considered, income-tax is a tax on a person in relation to his income. The tax is not imposed on income generally; it is imposed on the income of a person, natural or artificial, as defined in s. 3. The assessment has to be made against a person, and the tax has to be collected from the assessee. The tax is not made a charge on the income upon which it is levied, and I think, broadly speaking, it is accurate to say that income-tax is a tax imposed upon a person in relation to his income. But, in my opinion, that does not mean that legislation as to income-tax can never be regarded as legislation as to a thing in British India within the meaning of s. 65 of the Government of India Act. In my opinion, a tax on income accruing or arising or received in British India by a person resident outside British India is legislation relating to something, i.e. certain income, in British India, and, therefore, to my mind, it falls within the very wide and general words of s. 65. In my judgment, therefore, Act III of 1926 is intra vires the Government of India. That was so held in In the matter of Ram Prasad (supra), to which I have referred, though, as I have indicated, I think that the learned Judges in that case were incorrect in treating this Act of 1926 as being confined to a business carried on in British India. If the Act is intra vires, that disposes of the principal question raised by the Commissioner, which is question (1) :

The answer must be in the affirmative.

Question (2) is :

"Whether investment by the Patiala State Bank of a part of its surplus funds in the Government of India Securities constitute trading or business in British India within the meaning of s. 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act?"

This question is inaccurately expressed. Section 2 does not mention trading or business in British India. We can only answer the question by saying that the income from the investments are profits from the business of the bank received in British India, and as such taxable.

Question (3) is :

"Whether the property situate at Mussoorie taken over by the Patiala State Bank from its debtor, a subject of the Patiala State, in part satisfaction of a loan advanced to him, is property occupied in British India for the purposes of its trade or business in British India within the meaning of section 2 of the Government Trading Taxation Act and whether all income arising from such property is liable to assessment by virtue of the provisions of the said Act?"

Substantially I think the answer to this question must be in the affirmative, but I think that the property, which has been taken over in respect of a bad debt of the banking business, is not property occupied in British India for the purposes of the business, but the income derived from such payments is

Then question (4) is :

In re
Beaumont C.J.

"Whether the sum of Rs. 66,720 received by the Patiala State Bank on the sale of its investments during the year 1934-35 being the excess realised by it over the cost price of such investments, which has been included under the heading of profits in the relative profit and loss accounts and balance sheet, is assessable to Income-tax?"

That seems to be really a question of fact, and we must answer it in accordance with the facts found by the Commissioner. He has found that these profits on the sale of investments are part of the income of the Bank. It might be suggested that they are accretions to capital, but the Commissioner having found from the accounts of the Bank that they are profits of the Bank, I think we must answer the question in the affirmative.

Question (5) seems to be covered by the answer to question (2). Question (6) does not arise. The answer to question (7) must be answered in the affirmative.

We answer the questions accordingly and direct the assessee to pay costs. Costs to be recovered from the assets of the Patiala State Bank.

KANIA J. The relevant facts and sections of Acts of the Indian Legislature have been referred to in the judgment just delivered by the learned Chief Justice.

The important question argued before us is in respect of the validity of Act III of 1926 described as "an Act to determine the liability of certain Governments to taxation in British India in respect of trading operations." It was argued on behalf of the assessee that the Act was ultra vires the Government of India, whose powers to legislate were limited by s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1919. It was secondly argued that the Patiala State was not one of His Majesty's Dominions, as stated in s. 2(3) of Act III of 1926, and, therefore, it was not covered by the Act. It was next argued that the machinery to assess the State under s. 42 and / or s. 43 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, was not adopted. It was lastly contended that as the State is owned by the Ruler, it was not competent for the Government of India to legislate in respect of the Ruler.

The question, whether the Act was ultra vires the Government of India or not, was raised and decided in In the matter of Ram Prasad<sup>1</sup> and the learned Judges there rejected the contention that it was ultra vires. The argument in substance is that Act III of 1926 makes a Dominion Government in respect of its trade or business, wherever carried on, liable to be taxed as a company. The words "in British India" are not used in connection with trade or business or income arising in connection therewith. Where the Legislature wanted to use those words in connection with property occupied in British India, and goods owned in British India, they expressly said so. From the omission of those words in connection with trade or business or income arising in connection therewith, it was contended that the legislative power of the Government of India had been exceeded. In my opinion, that contention is unsound. The only object of the Act of 1926, in my opinion, was to legislate in respect of a particular use of the public property of a Dominion Government. Under International Law the legislature of a country does not enact laws which affect the public property of another country. By Act III of 1926 therefore the attempt was not to legislate generally in respect of the public property of a Dominion Government but in respect of its trading operations only. It appears that a mutual arrangement was made between the different Dominions of His Majesty by consent, and by s. 2(3) the Act was made applicable equally to territories which were under His Majesty's protection or over which a mandate was being exercised by His Majesty's Government. If such a Dominion Government carried on trade or business, the Government of India enacted that it should be liable to tax under the Indian Income-tax Act in the same manner and to the same extent as in the like case a company would be liable. In other words, the legislation was to state that a Dominion Government carrying on trade would, for the purpose of the Indian Income-tax Act, be treated as a company in like circumstances. If the State carried on business within British India, its liability would be as defined by the Indian Income-tax Act. If it carried on business wholly outside British India, it would not be affected by the Indian Income-tax Act, because that Act only was in respect of income within British India, either actually accruing or deemed to accrue as defined by that Act. This piece of legislation is covered by the words of s. 65 of the Government of India Act, which permit the Government of India to legislate for all persons, for all Courts, and for all places and things, within British India. While it cannot be disputed that the liability to pay income-tax is on the individual, it is a tax on the income. In so far, therefore, as the liability of a Dominion Government was stated by Act III of 1926 to be in respect of its income covered by the Indian Income-tax Act, there appears no reason to consider it ultra vires. With respect, I am unable to agree with the line of reasoning adopted in In the matter of Ram Prasad where the words "in British India" were attempted to be read as connected with "trade" in s. 2 of Act III of 1926. The words "in British India" have to be read in connection with income by reason of the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act. But Act III of 1926 does not in terms state that the word "trade" or "business" or "income arising in connection therewith" have to be in British India. I find no justification for including those words in s. 2 of Act III of 1926 in connection with "trade" business or income arising in connection therewith. As I have pointed out, by reason of sub-s. (3) of s. 2 however the result is the same, namely that the liability of the Dominion will be as if it were a company working under like circumstances under the Indian Income-tax Act.

The second contention, that the Patiala State was not under the protection of His Majesty, cannot be upheld in view of Sanads III and IV of 1815, which are found printed in Aitchison's "Treaties, Engagements and Sanads" Vol. I, at pages 158-159. It is there clearly provided that the Raja had the right of protection from the British Government. The Patiala State is, therefore, a Dominion under the protection of His Majesty.

The third contention that the liability to tax has to be worked out under ss. 42 and 43, and there was no other method by which the State Bank could be assessed, discloses some misunderstanding. In Whitney v. Inland Revenue

O. C. J.

O. C. J. Commissioners<sup>1</sup> Lord Dunedin pointed out that there are three stages in the imposition of a tax as follows (p. 52):—

Kania J.

"... there is the declaration of liability, that is the part of the statute which determines what persons in respect of what property are liable. Next, there is the assessment. Liability does not depend upon assessment. That, ex hypothesi, has already been fixed. But assessment particularizes the exact sum which a person liable has to pay. Lastly, come the methods of recovery, if the person taxed does not voluntarily pay."

The question of how the person whose liability to tax is determined has to be assessed is a matter of machinery. It is admitted here that the Patiala State Bank (assessee) when called upon sent a return* to the Income-tax Officer. We are not, therefore, at this stage concerned with the question what would have happened, if the assessee had refused to send a return. I do not propose to anticipate an argument on that point nor to express any opinion on it.

The last question, whether the Ruler is liable to be assessed, also does not directly arise. The assessee in the case is the Patiala State Bank. On the facts mentioned in the reference, it is a department of the State. There is a difference between the private property of the Ruler of the State and the property of the State itself. In holding that it was competent to the Government of India to legislate in respect of trading operations of the State, I think it is also held that the State as such, and to the extent it is covered by s. 2(1) of Act III of 1926, is liable to assessment. Statham v. Statham and the Gaekwar of Baroda,<sup>2</sup> which was relied upon in this connection, has in the circumstances no application.

I, therefore, agree that the answer to questions (1) and (7) should be in the affirmative. As regards the other questions, they are questions of fact, and I agree that the answers should be in the affirmative also.

Indian Sale of Goods Act (III of 1930), Secs. 21, 23—Sale of unascertained goods—Contract complete as soon as goods sold are ascertained and appropriated—Payment of price does not affect such completion—Liquor—Sale of liquor—Bottling of liquor after completion of sale—Delivery of sold liquor at customer's house does not affect completion of contract—Bombay Abkari Act (Bom. V of 1878), Sec. 45 (c)—License to sell country liquor—Breach of condition of license.

The expression 'specific goods' as used in s. 21 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930, necessarily means goods capable of being ascertained with certainty—certum est quod certum reddi potest. A sale of some specified quantity of liquor out of a store-house or cask is not capable of ascertainment until it is removed or separated. The words 'specific goods' will, according to their natural interpretation, mean goods the delivery of which can be demanded in specie.

The accused was a vendor of country liquor under a license, condition No. 2 of which prohibited him from selling liquor at any place other than the licensed premises. The accused sent round his servants to tout for customers and canvass orders. The servants secured orders and carried them to the accused's shop, where liquor was measured out in fulfilment of the orders, and it was supplied to the customers at their respective places of residence and the price of liquor sold was recovered there. The accused was prosecuted for an offence punishable under s. 45(c) of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, for a breach of a condition of his license for selling liquor outside the licensed premises:—

Held, applying the provisions of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930, (1) that the contract to sell some liquor out of a big cask containing much larger quantity, the required quantity not being separated or bottled, was not a contract of sale of specific goods within the meaning of s. 21 of the Act;

(2) that a contract of sale of a small quantity of liquor stored in bulk could more properly be regarded as a contract for sale of unascertained goods, and, under s. 23(1) of the Act, the ownership would not pass till the quantity ordered by the purchaser was ascertained and appropriated, which might be done by the bottling of the liquor;

(3) that in view of the provisions of s. 23 (2) it was immaterial that the delivery of the goods took place at the house of the purchasers;

(4) that in the present case the servant of the seller could very well be treated as a bailee for the purpose of the transmission to the buyer, and delivery to such servant, which admittedly took place in the licensed premises, would be effective delivery to the buyer himself;

(5) that it was not material for the purpose of the charge to ascertain whether the price of the liquor was paid in the shop, for the completion of the sale did not depend upon payment of the price of the goods sold;

(6) that therefore the sales in question were completed within the licensed premises and the accused was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged.

OFFENCE under s. 45 (c) of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878.

The accused was a licensed vendor of country liquor at Surat. One of the conditions of his license prohibited him from selling liquor at any place except the licensed premises.

The accused used to send out his servants to canvass customers for liquor. The servants canvassed orders for liquor from such customers, got the quantities so canvassed measured off at the shop from casks of liquor either by the accused or his servants, and carried the quantities to the respective houses of customers. The prices were either paid on delivery or sometimes afterwards.

Between April 1 and June 11, 1938, the accused secured, through his servant Soma, three orders for liquor measuring half a gallon, one gallon, and half a gallon respectively for three customers, Makan Naran, Hiralal Jamnadas, and Chhagan Jekison. The quantities sold were measured off at the shop of the accused and delivered by Soma at the respective houses of the customers. Soma stated :—

"I was a servant of the accused. I was given Rs. 20 as pay. I had to go to customers for taking orders regarding liquor. I would then go and inform the accused about the orders given to me and the accused would then himself give the liquor, and if he is not present, his servant would fill up the bottles. Then I would give the liquor to the customers' houses and would recover the money and give it over to the accused."

Thakordas, another employee of the accused, stated :—

"There were two authorised servants besides myself and five to seven unauthorised servants. They had to bring orders for liquor by moving about in the city and then to get a note made by me or the accused. The accused then would fill up the bottles and then the servant would take the bottles to the customers and bring money from them and pay it to the accused and if anybody had not paid, his name would be noted on the debit side."

On these facts, the accused was charged with an offence punishable under s. 45(c) of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, for committing a breach of condition No. 2 of his license, in selling liquor by sending it to his customers' places instead of selling it at his shop.

The accused was tried by the First Class City Magistrate at Surat, who convicted him of the offence charged and fined him in a sum of Rs. 200.

On appeal, the Sessions Judge reversed the conviction and sentence and acquitted the accused, because Soma being an accomplice was not reliable in absence of corroboration by independent evidence, and remarked :

"We do not know whether the understanding was that the accused was to see that the liquor reached Makan, Hiralal and Chhagan at their houses or whether it was to the effect that the liquor was to be given to Soma who was to carry it to the houses of Makan, Hiralal and Chhagan and give it to them there. If the understanding was of the former kind, the handing over of the liquor at the houses would amount to delivery at the houses, but if the understanding was of the latter kind, then the handing over of the liquor by the accused to his servant Soma in the shop would amount to a 'delivery' to Soma as the agent for Makan, Hiralal and Chhagan. In other words, it would amount to delivery to Makan, Hiralal and Chhagan themselves. In that view of the matter the sales would be deemed to have been concluded at the shop itself. The subsequent act of Soma of mere handing over the liquor to Makan, Hiralal and Chhagan at their houses would make no difference to that position. . . In this particular case as we do not know the exact nature of the understanding that was arrived at in the accused's shop between the purchasers of the liquor and the accused himself, the benefit of that lacuna must be extended to the accused and he must be acquitted."

R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, for the Government of Bombay.

H. R. Pardiwala, with Pochaji Jamshedji, for the accused.

WASSOODEW J. This is an appeal by the Government of Bombay against the order of acquittal passed by the Sessions Judge of Surat in an appeal by the accused. The latter, who is a licensed vendor of country liquor, was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 200 under s. 45(c) of the Bombay Abkari Act (Bom. V of 1878) by the First Class City Magistrate of Surat for contravening a term of his license.

It was alleged by the prosecution that the accused sold a quantity of country liquor outside the building or shop mentioned in the license to three different persons, according to the orders placed by each of them, between April 1 and June 11, 1938, in contravention of cl. (2) of the license. That clause provides as follows :—

"Under this license the license-holder will be entitled to keep or sell country liquor in the building or premises mentioned hereunder...that is to say, in the building or premises known as...and situate on...Road and numbered as...And he will not be entitled to keep or sell the same at any place except the aforesaid place. This building or premises is henceforth regarded as the place of license."

The prosecution led evidence of the servants of the accused to show that they were asked to tout for customers and canvass orders, and that they went round the place, obtained orders and carried them to the shop, delivered the liquor to the customers at their respective places of residence and recovered there the price of the liquor sold. One of the servants examined by name Soma (exhibit 3) stated as follows :—

"I would go and inform the accused about the orders given to me and then the accused would himself give the liquor, and if he was not present, his servant would fill up the bottles. Then I would give the liquor to the customers' houses and would recover the money and give it over to the accused."

The prosecution maintained that that evidence if believed would inevitably lead to the inference that the sale took place outside the licensed place and therefore in violation of cl. (2) of the license. The learned Magistrate accepted the evidence of the accused's servants as true and convicted the accused. The learned Sessions Judge in appeal took a contrary view of the facts and acquitted the accused holding that the statement of the servants that the price of liquor was not paid at the shop could not be acted upon without independent and reliable corroboration, as the servants were no better than accomplices, and the memoranda of the supposed orders received by the accused could not be regarded as sufficient corroboration.

It is unnecessary in the view we take of the legal position, which was not properly appreciated in the Courts below, to examine that evidence of the prosecution. The question is whether upon the allegation in the complaint the sale could be said to have been completed outside the place of license.

The learned Government Pleader has argued that the sale was completed upon delivery of liquor at the buyers' houses and not before, and upon notice given to them that the liquor was bottled from the casks and put into a deliverable state. He says that this case would be governed by the provisions of s. 21 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act (III of 1930). That section provides that :—

“Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods and the seller is bound to do something to the goods for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until such thing is done and the buyer has notice thereof.”

The argument of the learned Government Pleader assumes that a contract of sale of a quantity of liquor out of a large cask or cistern is a contract of sale of specific goods. I find the greatest difficulty in holding that a contract to sell some liquor out of a big cask containing much larger quantity, the required quantity not being separated or bottled, would be a contract of sale of specific goods within the meaning of s. 21. The expression ‘specific goods’ necessarily means goods capable of being ascertained with certainty—certum est quod certum reddi potest. A sale of some specified quantity of liquor out of a store-house or cask would not be capable of ascertainment until it was removed or separated. The words ‘specific goods’ would according to their natural interpretation mean goods whose delivery can be demanded in specie. Consequently in my opinion s. 21 would be inapplicable.

The appropriate section applicable to the facts alleged in this case would be s. 23 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act. Sub-section (1) of that section provides as follows :—

“Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained... goods by description and goods of that description and in a deliverable state are unconditionally appropriated to the contract, either by the seller with the assent of the buyer or by the buyer with the assent of the seller, the property in the goods thereupon passes to the buyer. Such assent may be express or implied, and may be given either before or after the appropriation is made.”

In my opinion a contract of sale of a small quantity of liquor stored in bulk could more properly be regarded as a contract for sale of unascertained goods. The ownership will not pass till the quantity ordered by the purchaser is ascertained and appropriated. The bottling of the liquor would be an act of ascertainment and appropriation. That is what the evidence suggests. It is argued that it could not be said that the goods are ascertained until the appropriation by one party is assented to by the other, that there is no evidence that the purchaser had assented to the appropriation, and that such assent could not be implied till the liquor was delivered to the purchaser into his house or place named. The section itself provides that the assent may be express or implied, and may be given either before or after the appropriation is made. The question whether the assent was implied must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each case. In this particular case it appears that the customer had assented that the goods should be delivered to the shop's servants for delivery to him. That is what Soma has suggested. If the prosecution intended to prove that the contract was different, it was open to them, and in fact necessary, to call the best evidence on the point, namely, that of the customer, who could say what the terms of the contract were. That has not been done in this case.

In view of the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 23 of the Act it is immaterial whether the delivery of the goods took place at the house of the purchaser. Sub-section (2) of s. 23 provides that :—

“Where, in pursuance of the contract, the seller delivers the goods to the buyer or to a carrier or other bailee (whether named by the buyer or not) for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, and does not reserve the right of disposal, he is deemed to have unconditionally appropriated the goods to the contract.”

The servant of the seller in the circumstances could very well be treated as a bailee for the purpose of transmission to the buyer; and delivery to such servant, which admittedly took place in the licensed place, would be effective delivery to the buyer himself. Nor would it be material for the purpose of the charge to ascertain whether the price of the liquor was paid in the shop, for the completion of sale does not depend upon payment of the price of the goods sold. It seems, according to the statement of Soma, that upon delivery of the liquor to the customers at their houses money was paid to him and he delivered the same to the accused in his shop, and that in some cases money was recovered later on. It has been pointed out to us that under cl. (10) of the license sale on credit of country liquor is prohibited. That is so provided in that clause. But assuming that there has been a transgression of that term of the license, the accused has not been charged with breach of it. All that he is charged with is that he has offended against cl. (2) of the license which relates to the sale outside the premises. In the view we take, the sales in question were completed within the premises and therefore the accused could not be convicted of the offence with which he was charged. We therefore dismiss the appeal.

except by an electrical contractor licensed by the Provincial Government and under the direct supervision of a person holding a certificate of competency issued by the Provincial Government, but reserved to the Provincial Government power to exempt any work or specified class of consumers or owners from the operation of the rule. Accordingly by a notification issued on November 15, 1934, the Provincial Government exempted from the operation of the rule all electric supply companies in so far as "their own works" were concerned. Rule 40A was superseded by the Indian Electricity Rules, 1937, on March 27, 1937, but the corresponding new r. 48 did not come into force till March 22, 1938.

The accused, who was a licensee and proprietor of an electric supply company at Ilkal, and who held a certificate of competency issued by the Provincial Government but not an electrical contractor's license, carried out, in February and early in March, 1938, small installation works on the premises of half a dozen inhabitants of Ilkal, at the expense of the supply company, the light points, switches etc. remaining the property of the company, for which he was charged with a breach of r. 48 of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1937 :—

Held, acquitting the accused, (1) that he had committed no breach of r. 48 of the Indian Electricity Rules of 1937, for it was not in force at the time the offences were alleged to have been committed ;

(2) that the old r. 40A could not be deemed to have remained in force till the new r. 48 was promulgated under s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, because the notification by which the new rules of 1937 were introduced expressly stated that they were in supersession of the rules of 1922 ;

(3) that s. 24 of the General Clauses Act came into operation only where a Central Act or Regulation had been repealed and re-enacted, and neither the Act or Regulation included a rule made under an Act ;

(4) that, even assuming that r. 40A applied, the accused was protected by the notification of 1934, inasmuch as he was one of the "Electric Supply Companies" doing "their own works" ;

(5) that the words "their own works" in the notification did not mean "such works when carried out on their own premises" ;

(6) that by the word "works" was meant the kind of works referred to in the rule and not the kind of works referred to in the definition of the term as given in s. 2(n) of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910 ;

(7) that the words "their own works" meant works carried out by the exempted bodies themselves, or perhaps works belonging to them ;

(8) that since the notification applied to installation works the works carried out by the accused were fairly included in the expression "their own works."

It is usually a sound rule of construction to give the same meaning to words used in rules made under an Act as the words have in the Act itself.

PROSECUTION under r. 48 of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1937.

The accused was a licensee and proprietor of an electric supply company at Ilkal. He held a certificate of competency issued by the Bombay Government, but he had not an electrical contractor's license.

Between February and March, 1938, the accused carried out small installation works at the shops of half a dozen merchants of Ilkal. The works consisted of putting in one light point with switches and cut-outs. The works were done at the expense of the supply company, and the light points, switches etc. remained the property of the company.

Under the provisions of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, the Government of India promulgated the Indian Electricity Rules of 1922, r. 40A of which made it compulsory that installation works should be carried out upon the premises or on behalf of any consumer or owner for the purposes of the supply of energy to such consumer or owner only "by an electrical contractor licensed by the Provincial Government in this behalf and under the direct supervision of a person holding a certificate of competency issued by the Provincial Government". There was a proviso to the rule which enabled the Provincial Government to exempt by notification "any such description of works."

Accordingly, on November 15, 1934, the Bombay Government issued a notification, exempting among other bodies "all electric supply companies... in so far as their own works are concerned."

On March 27, 1937, the Government of India issued new Indian Electricity Rules of 1937 in supersession of the Indian Electricity Rules of 1922. It was on March 22, 1938, that r. 48 in the rules of 1937, which was in the same terms as r. 40A in the rules of 1922, came into force.

The accused was tried for a breach of r. 48 of the rules of 1937.

The trying Magistrate acquitted the accused of the offence charged, observing as follows :—

"The object of r. 40A was to prevent wiring works of private individuals in a manner endangering human life or property. Under r. 46 the condition comes into operation only when a supply company does contractor's work. In other words, the supply company requires a contractor's license only when it does wiring and installation works for a consumer. If the supply company does such works as their own the exemptions referred to above apply. It appears that the ownership of the works makes all the difference. If the work belonged to the consumer or owner, these rr. 48, 123 are applicable as well as r. 46 of the rules and conditions. If they are the works of the supply company the exemptions above referred to apply. The works referred to in the exemptions should mean the works of the nature specified in the notification and not others. In the case of first six bodies premises are not mentioned whereas in the case of the remaining bodies the works should be on their own premises. The supply companies come in the first category. The omission of mentioning the premises in the case of the first set of bodies appears to be intentional. If the supply companies were to be forbidden to do their works in private premises, then they should have been included in the second set of bodies."

BROOMFIELD J. These are appeals by the Government of Bombay in two connected cases in which one Raghunath Ramchandra Karlekar, licensee and proprietor of an electric supply company at Ilkal in the Bijapur District, was prosecuted for an alleged breach of r. 48 of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1937, and was acquitted by the Magistrate.

There is no dispute about the facts of the case. In the months of February and March, 1938, the accused carried out certain small installation works on the premises of some half a dozen inhabitants of Ilkal. The installation works consisted of putting in in each case one light point with switches and cut-outs. Three of these works were made the subject of one case and three of the other. The work was admittedly done at the expense of the supply

"Precautions to be adopted by consumers and owners, electrical contractors and electrical workmen.—(1) No electrical installation work, including additions, alterations, repairs, and adjustments to existing installations, except such replacement of lamps, fans, fuses, switches and other component parts of the installation as in no way alters its capacity or character, shall be carried out upon the premises or on behalf of any consumer or owner for the purposes of the supply of energy to such consumer or owner, except by an electrical contractor licensed by the provincial Government in this behalf and under the direct supervision of a person holding a certificate of competency issued by the provincial Government."

Provided that, the provincial Government may by notification in the Official Gazette exempt on such conditions as it may impose any such description of work either generally or in the case of any specified class of consumers or owners from so much of this sub-rule as requires such work to be carried out by an electrical contractor licensed by the provincial Government in this behalf :

Provided further that this rule shall not apply to any work carried out by or on behalf of the Government of India unless the Government of India so direct.

(2) This rule shall come into force in any province or part thereof on such date as the provincial Government may by notification in the Official Gazette appoint."

The accused in this case holds a certificate of competency issued by the Provincial Government, and it is not disputed that the works in question were carried out under his supervision. But the accused has not an electrical contractor's license. It is by reason of the want of this license that the prosecution alleges the rule has been infringed.

The first difficulty in the way of the prosecution is that r. 48 under which the accused was charged did not come into force until March 22, 1938. That was the date fixed in the notification issued under part (2) of the rule. It is common ground that the installation works in question were carried out by the accused in February and March, 1938, before March 22, 1938. But under the Indian Electricity Rules of 1922 there was a r. 40A, which was in precisely the same terms as the present r. 48. It is suggested, therefore, that the reference to r. 48 of the rules of 1937 was a mere slip, that the charge should have been under r. 40A of the rules of 1922, but that this mistake has not in any way prejudiced the accused, the wording of the two rules being precisely the same. That, however, does not get rid of the difficulty. The rules of 1937 were introduced by a notification dated March 27, 1937, which was as follows :—

"In exercise of the powers conferred by s. 37 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910 (IX of 1910), and in supersession of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1922, the Governor-General in Council is pleased after previous publication to make the following rules applicable to the whole of British India."

Therefore, the old r. 40A was superseded prima facie when the new rules were made applicable on March 27, 1937. As I have said, the corresponding new r. 48 did not come into force until March 22, 1938, and, according to the contention of the learned advocate for the accused, in February and the first part of March, 1938, when he carried out these installation works, there was no rule corresponding to the present r. 48 in force.

The learned Government Pleader attempts to get over this difficulty by relying on s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, X of 1897. That provides, so far as is material, that where any Central Act or Regulation is repealed and re-enacted with or without modification, then, unless it is otherwise expressly provided, any rule made under the repealed Act or Regulation, shall, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted, continue in force, and be deemed to have been made under the provisions so re-enacted, unless and until it is superseded by any rule made under the provisions so re-enacted. The learned Government Pleader's argument is that the old r. 40A cannot be considered to have been superseded by the Electricity Rules of 1937 when they were made applicable on March 27, 1937, and was only superseded when the new r. 48 came into force in consequence of the notification issued under part (2) thereof. However, the notification by which the new rules were introduced expressly stated that they were in supersession of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1922, and it is a little difficult to see how an exception is to be made in the case of r. 48. Another point is that s. 24 only comes into operation where a Central Act or Regulation has been repealed and re-enacted. According to the definitions in the General Clauses Act, neither Central Act nor Regulation would include a rule made under an Act, unless by some straining of language it is possible to say that the rule can be regarded as part of the Act, because it is provided that it is to have the same effect as though it were part of the Act.

Assuming, however, for the sake of argument that the old r. 40A can be regarded as having been in force at the time when the accused was prosecuted, we are not satisfied that a breach of the rule has in fact occurred. The accused has relied for his defence on the terms of a notification (No. 640/27-II) which was issued by the Bombay Government on November 15, 1934, (p. 2566, Part I). It was as follows :—

"In exercise of the powers conferred by the Proviso to sub-r. (1) of r. 40A of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1922, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the following Administrations, Institutions and Bodies shall be exempted from the operation of the said sub-r. (1) of r. 40A in so far as their own works are concerned, namely :—

1. The Electrical Branch of the Public Works Department, Bombay.
2. The State Railways.
3. The Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute, Bombay.
4. The College of Engineering, Poona.
5. The N. E. D. Civil Engineering College, Karachi.
6. All Electric Supply Companies.
7. All factories within the meaning of the Indian Factories Act, 1911 (XII of 1911).
8. The Royal Indian Navy Dockyard, Bombay.
9. Railways other than State Railways.

Provided that in the case of bodies referred to at items 7, 8 and 9 above, a person holding a Certificate of Competency is employed for Supervising such works on their own premises."

The accused relies on the words "their own works" in this notification and contends that as the installation works in question were carried out by the company itself, and after being carried out remained the property of the company, they are the company's own works, and therefore the exemption given by this notification in the case of electric supply companies is applicable to him. The case depends therefore on the interpretation of this notification and in particular of the words "their own works". The learned Government Pleader says that what is meant is works carried out on the premises of the various bodies referred to. There seems to be no very good reason, however, why the words "on their own premises" should be implied. It would have been very easy to say "works carried out by them on their own premises." Moreover, at the end of the notification there is a proviso that in the case of certain bodies "such works" (which would naturally mean their own works), when carried out on their own premises, are not exempted unless a person holding a certificate of competency is employed for supervising them. If the words "their own works" in themselves meant works on the premises of the body concerned, the addition of the words "on their own premises" in this last proviso would have been unnecessary. This interpretation of the words therefore seems to be unacceptable.

The learned Government Pleader has argued with more force that the word "works" should be interpreted with reference to the definition contained in the Act. According to that definition "works" includes electric supply-lines and any buildings, machinery or apparatus required to supply energy and to carry into effect the objects of a license granted under Part II, which deals with the supply of energy. The definition is not exhaustive. Nevertheless a reference to other provisions in the Act does seem to indicate that when the expression "works" is used it usually means works connected with the supply of energy, and not lighting installations of the kind with which we are concerned which have nothing to do with the supply of energy. It is usually a sound rule of construction to give the same meaning to words used in rules made under an Act as the words have in the Act itself. We were therefore at first somewhat impressed by the argument put forward on behalf of Government in this respect. But when we look at the language of r. 48 or 40A, it becomes extremely difficult, if not impossible, to suppose that the word "works" in the notification has the meaning ascribed to it in the definition in the Act. The section begins by referring to "installation works" and the description of the work there given clearly covers the kind of work which was carried out by the accused in this case and in respect of which he has been prosecuted. The work referred to there is quite obviously not work connected merely with the supply of energy. Then the notification goes on to say that the Provincial Government may by notification exempt any such description of work either generally or in the case of any specified class of consumers or owners from the requirement that a licensed electrical contractor must be employed. So that the kind of work referred to in the rule is not work connected with the supply of energy but electrical installation work, and, that being so, when we find the notification issued under the rule stating that certain bodies shall be exempted in so far as their own works are concerned, it seems reasonable to hold that by "works" is meant the kind of works referred to in the rule and not the kind of works referred to in the definition.

The words "their own works" would naturally mean works carried out by the exempted bodies themselves, or perhaps works belonging to them. In the present case the works were not only carried out by the electric supply company but were carried out at their own expense and remained their own property. Since it seems to be clear that the notification applies to the installation works, we find it impossible to say that the works carried out by the accused in this case are not such as can be fairly included in the expression "their own works" in this notification. If Government intended that the exemption was only to apply in the case of works carried out by the various bodies on their own premises, that intention has not been made sufficiently clear.

On behalf of Government reliance was also placed on r. 46 of the rules issued on November 15, 1932, in connection with the issue of certificates of competency under r. 40A of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1922. That rule is as follows : —

"Supply companies to obtain contractor's licenses.—No electrical contracting work shall be carried out by any electric supply company unless they have obtained an Electrical Contractor's License and employed a separate staff of supervisors and wiremen, in compliance with these rules."

It is not clear, however, that the work carried out by the accused in this case can be described as electrical contracting work within the meaning of this rule. In any case, if he is exempted under the provisions of the notification from the operation of r. 40A, he could not be convicted of a breach of that rule, and it is a breach of that rule which is the subject of the charge.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the learned Magistrate was right in acquitting the accused in this case, and we dismiss the appeals.

The words "outside the office or place where the business is carried on" in s. 73(a) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, do not mean outside the premises. The section has nothing to do with advertising the whereabouts of a company or affording facilities to members of the public in finding its place of business. The requirements of the section will be satisfied if a company affixes a board of the necessary conspicuousness and legibility outside the office room though it be inside the building.

Hence, where the office of a company is situated in a building within a compound, it is not necessary that the name of the company should be painted or affixed outside the compound as well as the building. It is sufficient for the EMPEROR PROSECUTION under the Indian Companies Act, 1913.

v. Dr. H. L. Batliwalla Sons & Co., Limited, (accused No. 1), hereinafter BATLIWALLA called the company, was registered as a private company under the Indian SONS & CO., Companies Act, 1913. Kaikobad and his father Cawashaw (accused Nos 2 LTD. and 3) were directors of the company. The complainant Jehangir was a brother of accused No. 3. There was no love lost between the complainant and accused Nos. 2 and 3.

The company was formed for the manufacture and sale of the Batliwalla Ague Mixture.

The registered office of the company was in a bungalow named Saklat
Villa, which was situated at Cleveland Hill at Worli in Bombay. The bungalow was situated within a compound, which had two gates, one facing the north and the other towards the south. On the southern entrance, which was the principal one, a board bearing the words "Saklat Villa" was affixed. The whole building was owned by the accused. On the other gate there was found a board bearing the words "Dr. H. L. Batliwalla Sons & Co., Ltd., Worli, Bombay". The largest capital letters were one inch in size and the others were three-fourths of an inch in size. The office room was located on the first storey of the bungalow. On the wall opposite the landing there was another small board bearing the letters "Dr. H. L. Batliwalla Sons & Co., Ltd." This board was fixed in such a manner as that it would be visible to any one who got up the staircase, though it would not be visible from the road. The board was two feet by one foot in size, and the largest capital letters were two and a half inches in height, and the others about one inch in size.

The complaint in the case was that on September 1 to 3, 1937, there was no name board of the company affixed on the southern gate of the compound, and that as there was no outside board bearing the name of the company affixed either to the compound wall or the building the accused had committed the offence punishable under s. 74 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913.

The trying Magistrate came to the conclusion that "the company's board was not kept affixed outside its premises on those three days (viz. September 1 to 3), as required by the law". The Magistrate gave accused No. 3 the benefit of doubt and acquitted him. He convicted accused Nos. 1 and 2 of an offence under s. 74 of the Indian Companies Act, and fined accused No. 1, the company, in a sum of Rs. 50 for each of the three days, September 1, 2 and 3, 1937, on which its board was not conspicuously kept affixed outside its premises, and fined accused No. 2 in a sum of Rs. 25. He directed that out of the fine, if recovered, a sum of Rs. 150 should be paid for the costs of the proceedings, under s. 279 of the Act. The Magistrate observed :—

"I may add that the fact that there has been a board inside on the first floor landing does not help the defence. The whole bungalow and the compound was the company's premises, and the board should be kept affixed outside the premises for the purpose of the requirements of s. 73 of the Indian Companies Act. The board on the first floor landing was not visible from the road outside, and the compound was not such an open space as that anybody could walk in, go up the first floor, and satisfy for himself whether the company's office was there or not; in fact as the evidence shows the compound used to be kept closed and a Pathan posted with instructions not to admit any stranger inside."

Accused Nos. 1 and 2 applied to the High Court in revision.

LTD.

BROOMFIELD J. This revision application involves a question of the construction of s. 73(a) of the Indian Companies Act. The applicants are (1) Dr. H. L. Batliwalla Sons & Co., a limited company, which manufactures and sells a patent medicine called Batliwalla Ague Mixture, and (2) Kaikobad Cawashaw Batliwalla, who is one of the directors of this company. They have been prosecuted for an alleged contravention of s. 73(a) of the Indian Companies Act which requires that every limited company shall paint or affix, and keep painted or affixed, its name on the outside of every office or place in which its business is carried on, in a conspicuous position, in letters easily legible and in English characters. The complaint was that on the first three days of September, 1937, this company had not got its name painted or affixed outside its office or place of business as required by the section, and the learned Presidency Magistrate has found this proved as a fact and has convicted the applicants under s. 74(1) of the Act, which makes the contravention of s. 73 penal, and imposed sentences of fine.

The firm in question is a family firm. The complainant in the case is a member of the family. It appears that he has had disputes with the directors of the company for some time, and so far as the facts of the case are concerned, it is a purely private quarrel of no general importance. The point of law involved is however of some importance to companies generally.

The office of the company is situated in a bungalow at Worli which is surrounded by a compound. The office is on the first floor. There are two entrance gates to the compound. At one of these gates there is a board bearing the name of the bungalow "Saklat Villa" but no board bearing the name of the company. It was disputed whether there was a board bearing the company's name at the other gate of the compound, which was on the north. The accused alleged that there was such a board and called evidence to prove it. The learned Magistrate, while apparently prepared to accept the view that there normally was a board at that gate, has found that on these particular days in September, 1937, there was no board there. On behalf of the complainant it is now contended that the evidence showed that there was no board anywhere on these three particular days. The learned Magistrate in the course of his judgment says that he visited the premises on December 14, 1939. He was then shown a board on one of the pillars of the north gate of the compound, i.e. the board which, as I say, he has found was not in existence at that place on the relevant dates. He also says that he was taken upstairs to the landing of the upper storey of the bungalow where the office room is located and on the wall opposite the landing he found a small board, as he describes it, with the words "Dr. H. L. Batliwalla Sons & Co., Ltd." This board was fixed in such a manner that it would be visible to anyone

A. Cr. J. who goes up the staircase but would not be visible from the road. The board 1940 was two feet by one foot and the largest capital letters were two and a half — inches, the others about one inch.
 EMPEROR
 v. A perusal of the very long and careful judgment of the learned Magistrate BÄTLIWALLA points to the conclusion that the question between the parties was as to the SONS & CO., existence of the board at the northern gate of the compound and as to whether
 • LTD. it was necessary that there should be a board at one of the compound gates • Broomfield J. in order to comply with the terms of s. 73. Elsewhere in the judgment the — learned Magistrate says: "I may add that the fact that there has been a board inside on the first floor landing does not help the defence." The reason he gives for this finding is that the whole bungalow and the compound constitute the company's premises, and on the view he took of the construction of
 s. 73, it was necessary that there should be a board outside the premises and not merely outside the office room situated in a bungalow in the compound.
 There is nothing in the whole of the judgment to suggest, as far as we can see, that it was seriously argued before him, or at any rate that he found as a fact, that the board, the nature of which I have described, was not in existence on the relevant dates outside the office room. The question for our consideration therefore is whether this board was a sufficient compliance with s. 73 or whether that section requires that the company should have maintained a board with its name outside one or other of the compound gates. In the view we take the requirements of the section are satisfied by the board outside the office room.

The learned Magistrate's view is that "Outside the office" in s. 73(a) means outside the premises. But that is not what the section says. According to the literal meaning of the words used there has been no contravention of the section. It is a penal provision and has to be construed strictly, and therefore the burden is very strongly on the prosecution, i.e. the opponents in this application, to show that there really has been an infringement of the law and that in circumstances such as those existing in this case a meaning must be given to the section which is not the literal one. The learned Magistrate's reason for holding that the words "outside the office or place where the business is carried on" mean outside the premises or in this particular case outside the compound seems to be that in the absence of a board outside there would be a difficulty or might be a difficulty in finding one's way to the office. That is to say, he takes the object of this provision to be to require that companies should advertise their whereabouts and assist members of the public to find their way to the office of the company. There does not however appear to be anything in the Act to suggest that that is the object, and no authority of any kind has been cited in that connection. On the other hand in Palmer's Company Law (at p. 261 of the fifteenth edition) the learned commentator in dealing with the corresponding sections of the English Company Act gives the object of this provision as something quite different. He says:—

• "Why this solicitude on the part of the legislature as to publication of a com• pany's name? The answer is, that the legislature, whilst allowing limited liability,
 • desired by this means to make the company itself continually bring to the notice • of those who dealt or might deal with it the fact that it was limited. This policy it has fortified by pecuniary penalties."

According to that view at any rate—and in our opinion that is at least as likely to be the correct view as that now put forward on behalf of the prosecution—s. 73 has nothing to do with advertising the whereabouts of a company or affording facilities to members of the public in finding its place of business. It is well-known that in most cities there are large buildings which contain a considerable number of offices of companies and it might be extremely inconvenient if the law required that boards bearing the names of these various companies should be affixed or that the names should be painted outside the building. We think that in such a case clearly the requirements of the Act would be satisfied by a board of the necessary conspicuousness and legibility outside the office room inside the building. No doubt in the present case the company owns the whole of the premises, but we do not consider that that makes any difference in principle, and we are not prepared to hold that when an office is situated within a compound the law requires the name of the company to be painted or affixed outside the compound as well as outside the office.

Our attention was drawn to evidence that was given in the case to show that certain persons who desired to enter the compound were prevented from doing so or obstructed in doing so by a watchman maintained by the company. We do not consider, however, that this fact has anything to do with the construction of s. 73(a).

The learned Magistrate has not found and we do not think that it could have been found that the board outside the office room did not comply with the section in respect of conspicuousness and legibility. It was not a large board nor were the letters on it very large. But the Magistrate said that it would be visible to anyone who gets up to the landing where the office is situated. The letters were obviously large enough to be read with ease and the board seems to have been sufficiently conspicuous. In our opinion the law does not require anything more than this.

This being our view of the construction of s. 73(a), we are of opinion that the conviction under s. 74 cannot be sustained. We, therefore, make the rule absolute, set aside the convictions and direct that the fines be refunded.

Rule made absolute.

CHAMPAKLAL CHUNILAL BANKER.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 234—Joinder of charges—Irregularity—Consent of pleader—Practice—Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Sec. 159†—Offensive liquid, running out of, into street or open space—Liability of secretary of textile mill—Consolidation of criminal cases.

Criminal cases cannot like civil suits be consolidated and tried together on the same evidence except within the limits as to joinder of charges laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code. Such illegality is not cured by the fact that the accused's pleader has consented to the procedure adopted.

Under s. 159 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, it must be proved, firstly, that the accused is a person who has the building or land under his control, secondly, that he allowed the water to run upon any street, land or space, and, thirdly, that the water was or was likely to become offensive.

The secretary of a textile mill cannot, in absence of evidence, be made liable as such for an offence under s. 159 as being in control of the mill premises.

FIFTEEN cases were instituted against the same accused, nine of which were for an offence under s. 159 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and the remaining six were with reference to an offence under s. 160 of the Act. The accused pleaded not guilty in all the cases, and contended that he was not the secretary of the New Manekchowk Mills, with reference to which premises the offences were alleged to have been committed.

The Magistrate recorded evidence only in one of the cases, rejected the plea of the accused, found him guilty under s. 159 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, and sentenced him to pay a fine of Rs. 10.

Next, the Magistrate, without recording evidence in any of the remaining fourteen cases, proceeded to pass an order of conviction either under s. 159 or s. 160 as the case might be and imposed a similar fine of Rs. 10 in each of those cases.

When the trying Magistrate was asked to justify the procedure adopted by him, he stated :—

"In all fifteen cases against the Secretary of the New Manekchowk Mills were kept for hearing on November 29, 1939. On the day of hearing, the defence pleader * Criminal References Nos 98 to 112 of 1940, made by G. S. Rajadhya-ksha, Sessions Judge, Ahmedabad.

† The section runs as under :—

159. Whoever causes or allows the water of any sink or sewer or any other liquid or other matter which is or which is likely to become offensive, from any building or land under his control, to run, drain, or be thrown or put upon any street or open space, or to soak through any external wall, or causes or allows any offensive matter from any sewer or privy to run, drain or be thrown into a surface drain in any street, without the permission in writing of the Chief Officer or who fails to comply with any condition prescribed in such permission, shall be punished with fine which may extend to twenty-five rupees.

Mr. Bhatt informed the Court that all the cases were of the same nature and so one case should be heard fully as a test case and that the decision of that case will hold good in other cases.

The evidence was recorded in one case only and as the fact, nature of the offence and the party, viz., the accused v. The Municipality was the same; the same evidence was taken in the remaining other cases. The copying clerk however has copied the evidence of one case in all the cases, while making copies from the summary register. This he has done through mistake. Fresh copies of these cases from the summary register are submitted."

The Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad made references to the High Court in all fifteen cases as he was of opinion that the procedure adopted by the Magistrate in the remaining fourteen cases was illegal and that the conviction in the test case was contrary to law. He observed as follows :—

"It would appear from the report that all the fifteen cases were tried separately. The evidence was recorded only in one case. The learned Magistrate observes : 'The same evidence was taken in the remaining other cases.' He presumably means thereby that the evidence recorded in the test case was considered in deciding the other cases also. The procedure adopted by the learned Magistrate is manifestly illegal....

As regards the test case, under s. 159 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act it has got to be proved (1) that the accused is a person who has the building or land under his control, (2) that he allowed the water to run upon any street land or space, and (3) that the water was or was likely to become offensive. The judgment of the learned Magistrate merely concerns itself with the question whether the accused is the Secretary of the New Manekchowk Mills or not. On that there is a finding that the accused is the Secretary of the mills. But it has still to be proved that as Secretary he had the control of the mills; that he allowed the water to flow upon any street or open space, and that the water so allowed to run was or was likely to become offensive. On none of these points there is any finding of the learned Magistrate. The accused having pleaded not guilty to the charge and having added that he was not even the Secretary as alleged, it was incumbent on the prosecution to prove all these points and for the Magistrate to give findings thereon. Ordinarily the Secretary is not a person who has the control of the building or lands of a mill. Under s. 2 (9) of the Indian Companies Act it is the manager who has the management of the whole affairs of the company. Under s. 2 (11) the term 'officer' includes a Secretary but no authority has been shown to me to prove that a Secretary has the control of the buildings or lands."

The reference was heard.

BROOMFIELD J. These are references from the Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad in fifteen cases in which the Additional Stipendiary First Class Magistrate, Ahmedabad, convicted one C. C. Banker, said to be the Secretary of the New Manekchowk Mill at Ahmedabad, of offences under ss. 159 and 160 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925). In nine cases the prosecution was under s. 159 which renders punishable the act of causing or allowing the water of any sink or sewer or any other liquid or other matter which is or which is likely to become offensive, from any building or land under the control of the accused, to run, drain, or be thrown or put upon any street or open space. In the other six cases the charge was under s. 160 which makes it an offence for the owner or occupier of any building or land to keep or allow to be kept for more than twenty-four hours, or otherwise than in some proper receptacle, any dirt, dung, bones, ashes, night-soil, etc., in or upon such building or land.

It appears that at the suggestion of the defence pleader the learned Magistrate recorded evidence in one of the cases only, which is the subject of the first of these criminal references, No. 98. Having convicted and imposed sentence in that case the Magistrate then passed orders in the other cases without recording any further evidence. As the learned Sessions Judge says, this procedure is not contemplated by the Criminal Procedure Code and is clearly illegal. We had to deal with the same kind of illegality in another case (Emperor v. Panubhai Laljibhai<sup>1</sup>) from the Ahmedabad District not very long ago, and as it appears that the Ahmedabad Magistrates are under a serious misapprehension as to their powers in this respect, it is desirable to repeat what was said in the judgment in that case, which applies exactly to the present case :—

“We agree with the learned Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad that when you have a series of complaints of an offence alleged to have been committed on fourteen different occasions it is not permissible to do as the Magistrate in this case did viz., to hear the evidence and write a judgment in one of the cases and then proceed to pass merely consequential orders in the other cases. Criminal cases cannot like civil suits be consolidated and tried together on the same evidence except within the limits as to the joinder of charges laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code. It would have been permissible for the Magistrate to try the charges in groups of three, and I may say incidentally that I should have thought it quite sufficient for all practical purposes if the Municipality had restricted themselves to lodging three or at the most six complaints. However that may be, the Magistrate's procedure is plainly illegal and the illegality is not cured by the fact that the accused's pleader appears to have consented to the procedure adopted.”

In the present case it appears that the defence pleader suggested the adoption of this procedure. That makes no difference. It is plain therefore that the conviction of the accused in all the cases in which no evidence was recorded, that is, the cases which are the subject of references Nos. 99 to 112 of 1940, must be set aside and the fines and process fees ordered to be paid must be refunded to the accused.

The learned Sessions Judge has also recommended that the conviction in the first case (No. 98), in which evidence was recorded, should also be set aside. He points out quite correctly that under s. 159 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act it has got to be proved, firstly, that the accused is a person who has the building or land under his control, secondly, that he allowed the water to run upon any street, land or space, and, thirdly, that the water was or was likely to become offensive. He says in his letter of reference that there is no finding of the Magistrate on any of these points. The accused denied that he was the Secretary of the Mill; evidence was given to show that he was; the Magistrate held that he was; and on the strength of that finding, according to the learned Sessions Judge, he convicted the accused.

Mr. J. C. Shah, who appears for the Municipality which was the complainant in these cases, disputes the statement of the learned Sessions Judge that there is no finding of the Magistrate on points 2 and 3. He says that the first sentence of the order shows that the accused was charged with having discharged waste water of the Bleaching and Dyeing Departments on the street land and thus committed an offence punishable under s. 159, and that further on in the judgment the Magistrate said :—

"Here the offence has been committed as supported by the prosecution evidence."

It is by no means clear, I think, that the particulars of the charge have been stated sufficiently clearly to make it to appear that the learned Magistrate had applied his mind to the necessary ingredients of the offence. 'Waste water' would not necessarily be offensive or likely to become offensive; which is what the section requires, and the Magistrate's statement that the prosecution evidence justifies a conclusion that the offence had been committed hardly enables one to say that the necessary evidence as to the offensive character of the waste water had been produced. However, it is not necessary to deal with the matter on points 2 and 3.

It is quite clear from the learned Magistrate's judgment that he did not apply his mind to the question whether the accused was a person who had the building or land of the mill under his control. Mr. Shah has not suggested that there was any evidence produced to show that he had such control. He says that the secretary is an officer of the company and that the Magistrate may have assumed that as secretary he was liable to be convicted. It may well be that the Magistrate did make this assumption, but if he did, it was a wrong assumption. It was recently pointed out by this Court in Emperor v. Jagannath P. Thakar<sup>1</sup> that the secretary of a mill was not as such liable to be convicted under s. 159 as being in control of the premises. The learned Chief Justice said in that case :—

"Prima facie, the Secretary of a Mill would be a person to attend to the office and clerical work, but he would certainly not be a person to control the working of the mill or to see in what manner the waste water is to be discharged. That would be for the Manager. If the Secretary in the case of this Mill has control of the Mill, there ought to be evidence to that effect."

In the present case also there is no presumption that the accused as secretary was in control of the premises, and, as far as we can see, no evidence to that effect was produced. In this case also therefore we agree with the learned Sessions Judge that the conviction cannot stand. In the case which is the subject of reference No. 98 of 1940 the conviction is set aside and the fine and process fees must be refunded to the accused.

AMBABAI BHAICHAND GUJAR

v.

KESHAV BANDOCHAND GUJAR.*

Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act (II of 1929)—Applicability of Act to Hindus and Jains, as also to Mitakshara and Mayukha systems of law—Succession—Sister's son—Father's sister—Priority between.

The Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act, 1929, applies to Hindus, including Jains, and to all persons governed by the Mitakshara law, including those governed by the Mitakshara law as modified by the Mayukha.

Hence, among the Jains who have migrated from Gujarat and settled in the Belgaum district, a sister's son is entitled to succeed in preference to the father's sister of the propositus.

The rise and growth of the Mitakshara and the Mayukha systems of law discussed.

SUIT to recover possession of lands.

The lands in dispute belonged originally to one Sakharam, to whom the parties were related as shown in the following genealogical tree :—

The parties were Jains. They hailed from Gujarat and settled in the Belgaum district.

Bapuchand died on October 9, 1892, leaving him surviving his son Sakharam and a daughter Ambabai (defendant No. 1). Sakharam died in 1897 leaving behind him his widow Diwalbai. On October 9, 1900, Diwalbai adopted Rajaram, who was the son of her daughter Chandrabai. Diwalbai died on October 13, 1900. Chandrabai died on March 24, 1905, leaving her husband Bandu and her son Keshav (plaintiff). Bandu died on April 16, 1923.

On Rajaram's death on June 10, 1932, his property was claimed by Keshav, who was his natural brother but who became the sister's son when Rajaram was adopted by Diwalbai. The claim was contested by Ambabai, the father's sister of Rajaram. The suit was filed on July 10, 1935.

Defendant No. 1 contended inter alia that she was the preferential heir of Rajaram.

The trial Court held that the parties were governed by the Mitakshara modified by the Mayukha, that the Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act, II of 1929, applied to Jains, and that therefore the plaintiff was the preferential heir. The suit was therefore decreed, for the following, among other, reasons :—

"Confining ourselves to Gujarat it follows that the law applicable is Mitakshara, but Mayukha is the 'overruling authority' in the 'few points in which it differs from Mitakshara.' Where therefore the legislature makes use of the words 'only to persons...subject to the law of Mitakshara' in the Act of 1929, I think it meant all the 'subdivisions' of the Mitakshara school, subject of course to any 'overruling authorities' in particular provinces...Now a sister's son is a bandhu...It is not shown to me that the Mayukha gave him any higher place than that given him by the Mitakshara. On the other hand, as regards the succession of bandhus there is no difference between the Mitakshara and Mayukha. The Act of 1929 has lifted him up still higher in the category of gotraja sapindas and since in this respect there is no conflict between the Mitakshara and Mayukha, I think in the present case plaintiff is the preferential heir to defendant and must succeed."

Defendant No. 1 appealed to the High Court.

A. G. Desai, with S. A. Kher and B. M. Gujar, for the appellant.

R. A. Jahagirdar, for the respondent.

DIVATIA J. The decree against which this appeal is preferred by defendant No. 1 was passed in favour of the plaintiff who sued to recover possession of certain property on the ground that he was a preferential heir of one Rajaram. The plaintiff was the natural brother of Rajaram, but the latter was adopted by his maternal grandfather and he therefore became his sister's son. Rajaram died on June 10, 1932, without leaving a widow or any issue, and the dispute arose about his property which was claimed by the plaintiff against defendant No. 1, who is the sister of Rajaram's adoptive father. The contest is thus between sister's son and father's sister. It is common ground between the parties, who are Jains, that their ancestors migrated from Gujarat and settled in the Belgaum District. It was agreed during the hearing of the suit that Rajaram's adoption was proved and was valid, as a daughter's son could be adopted among the Jains. The plaintiff claimed to be the preferential heir under the Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act (II of 1929), s. 2 of which provides that "a son's daughter, daughter's daughter, sister, and sister's son shall, in the order so specified, be entitled to rank in the order of succession next after a father's father and before a father's brother." His case was that defendant No. 1 being the father's sister was a remote gotraja sapinda, and therefore not entitled to priority over him.

It is clear that if the Act of 1929 applies, the plaintiff is a preferential heir. Before the passing of this Act a sister's son was only a bandhu, while a father's sister was held to be a gotraja sapinda in cases governed by the Mayukha, and, therefore, came before the bandhus; but under the new Act the sister's son is taken much higher up and placed even before a father's

- brother. Defendant No. 1, however, contended—and that was her main defence to the suit—that the case was not governed by the Act, firstly, because it applies only to Hindus and not to Jains; and, secondly, because it applies only to persons who are subject to the law of Mitakshara, while the parties' ancestors, having migrated from Gujarat, were subject to the law of Mayukha. The first two issues were, therefore, framed to cover this contention. The first issue was whether Mayukha or Mitakshara was applicable to the parties, and the second was whether the Act was applicable to Jains. The learned Judge below held that the parties were governed by Mitakshara subject to Mayukha, and that the Act was applicable to Jains. He, therefore, decreed the suit.

Mr. Desai on behalf of the appellant-defendant No. 1 has raised the same two points before us. Taking the second point first, he has urged that Jains are not Hindus and the Legislature has not expressly included them in this Act as it did in another Act passed in the same year, namely, the Indian Succession (Amendment) Act (XVIII of 1929), by which s. 57 of the Indian Succession Act of 1925 was enlarged by the addition of the new clause making it applicable to all wills and codicils made by any Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain after January 1, 1927. It is not necessary to dwell at length on the question whether Jains are Hindus for the purpose of the law of succession, as the point has been concluded by authority : vide Chotay Lall v. Chunno Lall<sup>1</sup> and Ambabai v. Govind.<sup>2</sup> Even in the matter of adoption, although it has a secular and not a religious origin with Jains, it has been held by our Court in a series of decisions beginning from Bhagwandas Tejmal v. Rajmal,<sup>3</sup> and ending with the recent decision in Hinachand v. Rowji Sojpal,<sup>4</sup> that the Hindu law of adoption applies to Jains, and the burden of proving any custom to the contrary lies on the party alleging it. Mr. Desai relies upon certain observations of Kumaraswami Sastri, Acting C. J., in Gettappa v. Eramma,<sup>5</sup> to the effect that Jains were not Hindu dissenters and that the onus should be thrown on those who assert that in any particular they had adopted Hindu law and custom and had not followed the law as laid down by their own law-givers. Those observations, however, were his personal opinion, and he was constrained to hold that the matter was concluded by authority, and a series of decisions extending over several years had held that the presumption was that Jains were governed by ordinary Hindu law unless it was shown that by custom a different law prevailed among them. It is not necessary to discuss the origin of Jainism, because whatever its origin, it is clear that the Jains have adopted the Hindu law of succession from very ancient times. But Mr. Desai argues that although the Hindu law of succession might apply, the Act of 1929 does not apply to them as it does not specifically say that it is applicable to Jains. The preamble to the Act speaks of altering the order in which certain heirs of a Hindu male succeed to his estate. As the Jains have been judicially recognized as governed by the Hindu law of succession, a legislative alteration in that law would presumably apply to them also unless it was specifically stated that it was not to apply to them. It is true that the Indian Succession (Amendment) Act of 1929 speaks of Jains as well as Hindus and ss. 4 and 57 of the Indian Succession Act of 1925 also do the same. At the same time it must be noted that s. 331 of the Indian Succession Act of 1865, which is replaced by s. 4 of the Indian Succession Act of 1925, did not make any separate mention of Jains but used the expression "Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist", and it has been held in Bachebi v. Makhan Lal<sup>1</sup> that the term "Hindu" in s. 331 included Jains. The Hindu Wills Act of 1870, which applied to the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and the cities of Bombay and Madras, no doubt mentioned Jains as well as Hindus as being governed by certain sections of the Succession Act of 1865, but the Indian Succession Act of 1925 was a consolidating Act which repealed the previous Act of 1865 as well as the Hindu Wills Act of 1870. It was, therefore, probably thought necessary ex majore cautela to separately mention the Jains in the consolidating measure. In all the other recent enactments affecting the Hindu law there is no separate mention of Jains along with the Hindus. I am, therefore, of opinion that Jains are also governed by the Act of 1929, and the learned Judge was right in his finding on the second issue.

The second point urged by Mr. Desai is more important. The Act applies to all persons who, but for the passing of the Act, would have been subject to the law of Mitakshara in respect of the provisions therein enacted. The parties are governed by the law of succession prevailing in Gujarat where Mayukha is said to be of paramount authority. It is contended that the law propounded by Mayukha is different from the law of Mitakshara and cannot be said to be included in it; Mayukha being the overriding authority in Gujarat and North Konkan, it has superseded in those parts of the Bombay Province the Mitakshara law which applies to all other parts of the province, and the Legislature has confined the operation of the Act to those places which are subject only to the law of Mitakshara. This argument is based upon the assumption that Mitakshara and Mayukha are two schools of Hindu law exclusive of each other and based upon different foundations. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the correctness of this assumption. As is well known, Vijnyaneshwar's Mitakshara is a standard commentary on the Yajnyavalkya Smriti. Vijnyaneshwar flourished towards the end of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth century. His commentaries mark a departure from the prevalent notion of the right of succession to property being based on the capacity to confer spiritual benefit on the deceased owner. He placed the right of succession on a new system based on sapinda in the sense of blood relationship and thus brought many near relations as heirs who would be excluded under the theory of spiritual benefit. His views having found favour with a large majority of public opinion, the authority of his work was soon established in the Deccan where it was compiled, and it gradually extended to the whole of India except in Bengal. Even in the latter province the authority of Mitakshara was at one time supreme till it was ousted by the renowned work of Jimutavahana, the Dayabhaga, in the thirteenth century. The Dayabhaga was in some respects conservative and in other respects advanced. In matters of succession it stuck to the old theory of right to property being based on the capacity to offer pindas, meaning thereby the funeral cakes, while Vijnyaneshwar had revolutionized the old theory by interpreting the word "pinda" as the body, and therefore, "sapinda" as blood relationship. In other respects the Dayabhaga went beyond the Mitakshara doctrine of rights in the joint family being acquired by birth and by survivorship which was substituted by the new doctrine of a family consisting of co-tenants. It is sufficient to note for our purpose that in the midst of a large number of other commentaries of various Smritis and numerous digests, these two standard works, the Mitakshara and the Dayabhaga, hold the field for the last seven centuries and have been recognized as the two main schools of Hindu law. Subsequent writers have propounded various divergent interpretations of the original texts, but they all based their views on the subject of succession either on the theory of propinquity as propounded by the Mitakshara or the theory of religious efficacy as propounded by the Dayabhaga. One such prominent author was Nilkantha at the beginning of the seventeenth century who compiled among other works the Vyavahara Mayukha which is a digest of legal principles and procedure. He was a Deccani Brahmin whose ancestors had migrated to Northern India. It soon attracted the attention of Deccani Shastris as it embodied in a lucid manner the popular views of that age. The prevalent law in the Maharashtra at that time was based on the Mitakshara, but thereafter the Mayukha also came to be consulted by the Shastris on points on which they could not get sufficient light from the Mitakshara. As observed by Colebrooke in his preface to the translation of the Mitakshara, the Mayukha had concurrently with the Mitakshara considerable weight among the Marathas and among those works which "agree in generally deferring to the authority of the Mitakshara, in frequently appealing to the text, and in rarely and at the same time modestly dissenting from its doctrines on particular questions." So also Borradaile observes in his preface to the translation of the Vyavahara Mayukha that in all the schools of Hindu law except in Bengal "the Mitakshara, one of the earliest of these compilations, is received with respect as the chief general authority, though in each some more modern local work is allowed to compete with it on a few points. The most remarkable of those are the Mayukha for the Maharashtra and the west, the Smriti Chandrika for the south of India, the Ratnakar and Chintamani for Mithila. Bengal proper alone denies authority to the Mitakshara having established for itself a totally different school, of which Jimutavahana is the head." The later development of how the Mayukha came to be regarded as the principal authority in Gujarat and the city of Bombay is well described by West J. in the full bench decision in Bhagirthibai v. Kahnajirav.<sup>1</sup> He says (p. 294) :—

"The special and almost paramount authority which the Vyavahara Mayukha has gained in Gujarat and in the city of Bombay is not recognized in other parts of this Presidency. Yet it must not be supposed that the Vyavahara Mayukha presents a development of the Hindu law connected in any peculiar way with the religious or social system of the Gujaratis. Before the Maratha conquest of Gujarat in the middle of the last century it had long been under Mahomedan rule. The customary law of the Hindus had almost dwindled away into mere rude caste usages, and the Brahminical influence had almost perished. The Vyavahara Mayukha was one of the latest products of the Maratha school, and had gained the eminent position which it has retained in the Deccan. The Maratha Brahmins, following the Maratha Chiefs into the newly conquered country, naturally took their law books with them. And of these, the Vyavahara Mayukha was the most comprehensive and characteristic. In Gujarat it had virtually no rival; and, as a Hindu polity was revived there, it took a place analogous to that of the Roman law in the mediæval Europe, with the Maratha Brahmins as its expositors. Hence arose the somewhat strange consequence that the Maratha doctrines of the Mayukha gained a more undivided sway over Gujarat than amongst the Marathas themselves, who had men of wide learning and copious sources of information at hand."

And he concludes (p. 295) :—

"It follows, from what has been said, that, without in any way assailing the position of the Mitakshara as the principal authority in the Maratha country, we may properly construe it in doubtful cases by the light of the Vyavahara Mayukha."

A number of decided cases have emphasized the intimate relation between the doctrines of the Mitakshara and those of the Mayukha. The decisions in Krishnaji Vyanktesh v. Pandurang,<sup>1</sup> Gojabai v. Shrimant Shahajirao Maloji Raje Bhosle,<sup>2</sup> Bai Kesserbai v. Hunsraj Motarji<sup>3</sup> and Bhagwan v. Warubai<sup>4</sup> are relevant on this point. The gist of these decisions is summarized in Mayne's Hindu Law, at p. 47, 10th edn., as follows :—

"In Gujarat, in the island of Bombay and also in the North Konkan, its authority [of Mitakshara] is controlled by the Mayukha on the very few points on which they differ, the general principle however being to construe the Mitakshara and the Mayukha so as to harmonise them as far as it is reasonably possible."

It would be clear from this discussion that there are only two fundamental schools of Hindu law, the Mitakshara and the Dayabhaga, and Mayukha, in spite of its different interpretation of the ancient texts on some points, belongs to the Mitakshara school of Hindu law. The phrase "the law of Mitakshara" used in s. 1 of the Act of 1929 includes all sub-divisions of the Mitakshara law and excludes the law of Dayabhaga. In fact, there is some indication in the Act itself to show that it recognizes the existence of different schools or sub-divisions of the general Mitakshara law and is applicable to them all. Section 3, cl. (b), provides that the three female heirs elevated higher up in the order of succession shall have no estate larger than, or different in kind from, that possessed by a female in property inherited by her from a male according to the school of Mitakshara law by which the male was governed. The word "school" here evidently refers to the Bombay school on the one hand and the Benares and the Madras schools on the other. In the former, these heirs take the property absolutely while in the latter they take a limited estate. The Bombay school would include the Mayukha under which also they take an absolute estate. The Act could not have been applied to Bengal without shaking the foundation of the Dayabhaga law based upon the capacity to confer spiritual benefit by the offering of funeral cake which was not possessed by females except the five specified ones mentioned in the Dayabhaga.

The object of the Act appears to bring the heirs mentioned therein higher up in the order of succession on the ground of their being nearer in blood to the deceased than many of the heirs who formerly preceded them. The Act was, therefore, meant to apply to all the branches of the main school of the Mitakshara law which based succession on the principle of propinquity and the Mayukha is undoubtedly based on that principle. In the latest edition of Mayne's Hindu Law the opinion is expressed to the effect that the Act would apply to the Mitakshara law in Bombay or even where the Mayukha is supreme. That seems to me to be the correct interpretation of the intention of the Legislature.

The conclusion, therefore, is that Act II of 1929 applies to Hindus, including Jains, and to all persons governed by the Mitakshara law, including those governed by the Mitakshara law as modified by the Mayukha.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the appellant that even if the Act applies, the position of the father's sister is saved by the provisions of s. 3, cl. (a), of the Act, according to which the Act is not to affect any special family or local custom having the force of law. It is urged that under the Mayukha a paternal aunt is a gotraja sapinda and comes in before the bandhus, that that position is assigned to her by reason of a local custom recognized by a judicial decision in absence of a special text; a sister's son, being a bandhu, is, therefore, postponed to the paternal aunt. Reliance is placed on the decision in Shidramappa Nilappa v. Neelawabai,<sup>1</sup> where in holding that a sister in the Bombay Province retains her place immediately after the father's mother and before the father's father, even after the enactment of Act II of 1929 Rangnekar J. expressed an obiter dictum that if necessary he would be prepared to hold that a sister in Bombay was assigned a fixed place on the ground of a local custom having the force of law, and the cases such as Mulji Purshotum v. Cursondas Natha<sup>2</sup> and Rudrapa v. Irava<sup>3</sup> show that it was on the ground of usage that the right of a sister was based. It is argued on the analogy of this reasoning that a paternal aunt's place is also similarly fixed and her case is also saved under the Act, but the decision in Ganesh v. Wagh,<sup>4</sup> which is relied upon in support of this argument, does not put the right of the paternal aunt on the ground of usage. In that case it was held that the grandson of a paternal great-grandfather was entitled to succeed in preference to a paternal aunt, and it is observed in the course of the judgment that it was previously held by our Court in an unreported decision in Second Appeal No. 158 of 1870 that a paternal aunt even in Gujarat was not entitled to come in at the head of the gotraja sapindas but was postponed to distant male gotraja sapindas. There is nothing to show that the decision was based upon proof of any usage, and there is also no evidence of usage in the present case which might attract the application of the opinion expressed in Shidramappa Nilappa v. Neelawabai.<sup>5</sup> The present case is, therefore, not saved by the proviso in s. 3 (a) of the Act.

BROOMFIELD J. The question for decision is whether among Jains from Gujarat governed by the Mayukha a sister's son or a father's sister is a preferential heir to a deceased male. Prior to the Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act of 1929, the sister's son was a bandhu, whereas the father's sister came in the order of succession after the most remote gotraja sapindas but before the bandhus. Section 2 of this Act places the sister's son before the father's brother, i.e. quite high up among the gotraja sapindas. Therefore, if this section applies to Jains, the plaintiff, who is a sister's son, will succeed. If it does not apply, defendant No. 1, who is a father's sister, will succeed.

v
Divatia J.

Mr. Desai who appears for the appellant has argued, firstly, that the Act does not apply because its operation is limited to Hindus and the Jains are not strictly speaking Hindus. But there was no need to mention Jains separately because it is well settled that the Hindu law of inheritance applies to Jains in the absence of proof of a special custom or usage varying that law : Sheo Singh Rai v. Mussumut Dakho<sup>1</sup>; Chotay Lall v. Chuno Lall<sup>2</sup> and Ambabai v. Govind.<sup>3</sup>

A more weighty argument is that the Act does not apply to Jains because it applies only to "persons who, but for the passing of the Act, would have been subject to the law of Mitakshara in respect of the provisions herein enacted." But, as my learned brother says, the most reasonable view seems to be that the Mitakshara is mentioned as one of the two main schools of Hindu law, in contradistinction to the Dayabhaga but not in contradistinction to the Mayukha, which is only a sub-division of the Mitakshara school. The reference in s. 3(b) to the school of Mitakshara law by which the male was governed shows that the "Mitakshara law" in the Act was intended to include its sub-divisions.

It is true that in Gujarat the Mayukha overrides the Mitakshara in the very few points in which there is a difference between them. But it is difficult to say that there was any difference between them before the Act as to the relative positions of the sister's son and the father's sister. The former was a mere bandhu according to both. According to the Mitakshara the position of the father's sister was, and still is, rather obscure. But in Ganesh v. Wagh<sup>4</sup> this High Court was prepared to concede that she might come in as a gotraja sapinda after all other gotraja sapindas were exhausted, that is to say, in accordance with the rule settled by the Courts in cases governed by the Mayukha. That means that prior to the Act the sister's son would have been postponed to the father's sister both under the Mitakshara and the Mayukha. But if the sister's son had been a gotraja sapinda, even the most remote in degree, the father's sister would have been postponed to him whether the Mayukha or the Mitakshara applied to the case. Now that the sister's son has been brought in high up among the gotraja sapindas, I can see no reason why he should not be a preferential heir even under the Mayukha law.

Broomfield J.

It is not as if the Mayukha had a specific text about the father's sister. She is nowhere mentioned. In Ganesh v. Wagh, the case to which I have referred just now, the argument was put forward that the reasons given in the Mayukha for treating a sister as a gotraja sapinda might apply equally to a father's sister. But the decision of the Court was based on the principle of stare decisis, and the father's sister was given a place after distant male gotraja sapindas because it had been so decided in a case of 1870. It is clear from Sir Lawrence Jenkin's judgment in that case that no custom justifying the inclusion of the father's sister among gotraja sapindas was found to exist comparable to the custom by which, according to some decisions, the sister had come to be treated as gotraja sapinda in Bombay. So far as I am aware, no such custom in the case of the father's sister has ever been alleged, and there is no evidence of it in the present case. That being so, it is impossible to accept Mr. Desai's argument that the position of the father's sister as a gotraja sapinda, and therefore as a preferential heir to all persons who are or ever had been bandhus is saved by s. 3(a) of the Act, which provides that it is not to affect any special family or local custom having the force of law. Whether or not Mayne (10 edn., p. 682) is right in saying that the custom referred to in the Act must be one in derogation of the law of the school governing the parties, it is, at any rate, clear that judicial decisions based either on inferences drawn from the texts or on the principle of stare decisis cannot constitute a custom within the meaning of the Act.

I agree with my learned brother that the decision of the lower Court should be confirmed.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Sec. 70—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 386—Fine, recovery of, by sale of immoveable property of offender—Warrant issued for recovery of fine—Darkhast filed after six years from date of sentence—Limitation.

Section 70 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, is not controlled by s. 386, sub-ss. (1) (b) and (3), of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898. Section 386 of the Criminal Procedure Code deals only with procedure for levying fine imposed under the Indian Penal Code.

The warrant issued by a Court passing a sentence, under s. 386, Criminal Procedure Code, to recover fine from an offender is to be deemed as a decree for certain purposes only, and is executed according to the mode laid down in the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, but s. 48, Civil Procedure Code, does not apply to such a warrant.

The period during which such a warrant could be executed is governed by s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code and not by the Indian Limitation Act. A darkhast filed after six years to recover fine by sale of immoveable property of the offender is, therefore, time-barred under s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code.

EXECUTION proceedings.

On January 12, 1929, the opponent, Ochhavlal Bhikhalal, was convicted of the offence of cheating by the Sessions Judge of Broach, and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 15,000, and in default of payment of the fine to further rigorous imprisonment for nine months.

As the opponent failed to pay the amount of fine, the Sessions Judge sent a letter to the Collector of Broach, on May 10, 1929, authorising him under s. 386 (1) (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, to realise the amount of fine by attachment and sale of the immoveable property of the opponent.

The Collector filed a darkhast in 1929 and another in 1930 to realise the amount of the fine and a sum of Rs. 4,227 was realised in execution.

In 1933 he filed a third darkhast and the undivided interest of the opponent in certain immoveable property was ordered to be sold.

On June 19, 1935, an auction for sale took place, but as there were no bidders the property could not be sold, and the darkhast was disposed of.

On February 8, 1938, the Collector filed a fourth darkhast to recover the balance of the fine out of the interest of the opponent in certain immoveable property.

The opponent contended that as he had undergone further imprisonment in default of payment of the fine his property was not liable to the payment of the arrears of the fine; and that under s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code the amount of fine could not be recovered after six years from the date of the sentence.

The First Class Subordinate Judge held that the opponent's liability to pay the fine imposed on him remained although he had undergone imprisonment in default of payment of the fine; that under s. 386 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, the warrant issued by the Collector did not become a decree of a civil Court, and s. 48 of the Civil Procedure Code did not apply; that the provisions of s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code were not affected by s. 386 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the darkhast was therefore time-barred.

The Collector of Broach appealed to the High Court.

R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, for the appellant.

M. R. Vidyarthi, P. M. Kapadia and B. Moropanth, for the respondent.

DIVATIA J. This appeal arises in execution of a darkhast to recover a certain amount by the appellant who is the Collector of Broach and Panch Mahals against the respondent. The latter had been convicted on January 12, 1929, of the offence of cheating and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs. 15,000, and rigorous imprisonment for nine months in default of payment of fine. On May 10 of that year a letter was sent by the Sessions Judge to the Collector under s. 386(1) (b) of the Criminal Procedure

Code authorising him to realise the amount of the fine by execution according to civil process against the immovable property of the defaulter. This letter was sent because the opponent had not paid the amount of fine although he subsequently suffered the period of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine.

Two darkhasts were filed by the Collector in 1929 and 1930 to realise the amount of the fine and a sum of Rs. 4,227 was realised in execution. The third darkhast was filed in 1933 and the undivided interest of the opponent in certain immovable property was ordered to be sold. The sale took place on June 19, 1935, but as there were no bidders the property was not sold and the darkhast was therefore disposed of. Thereafter on February 8, 1938, the present darkhast was filed to recover the balance of the fine out of the interest of the opponent in certain immovable property.

The opponent contended in the course of that darkhast that as he had suffered rigorous imprisonment in default of payment of the fine, his property was no longer liable to the payment of the fine. His second contention was that under s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code the fine imposed upon him should have been recovered only within six years from the date of the sentence, and the present darkhast, which was filed in February, 1938, after the period of six years was over, was therefore time-barred.

The learned First Class Subordinate Judge rightly held on the first point that the claim of the darkhastdar was legal even if the opponent had undergone imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. That is clear from the provisions of the Indian Penal Code.

On the second point the learned Judge was of the opinion that under the provisions of s. 386 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code the warrant issued by the Collector did not become a decree of a civil Court for all purposes and that the provisions of s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code were not affected by s. 386 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, which was added for the first time in 1923. He therefore held that the darkhast was time-barred and accordingly dismissed it.

This appeal is presented against that order, and it is contended on behalf of the Collector that s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code is controlled by the provisions of s. 386, sub-ss. (1) (b) and (3), of the Criminal Procedure Code. Now it is clear that under s. 70 the fine, or any part thereof which may remain unpaid, may be levied at any time within six years after the passing of the sentence. This means that the fine could not be levied after the period of six years is over except in the circumstances mentioned in that section i.e. where the person is imprisoned for a longer period than six years. Under s. 386, Criminal Procedure Code, as it stood before the amendment of 1923, whenever an offender was sentenced to pay a fine, the Court passing the sentence may issue a warrant for the levy of the amount by distress and sale of any moveable property belonging to the offender. By the amendment the power to issue a warrant has been given to the criminal Court so as to proceed against the moveable as well as the immovable property of the defaulter. It is provided therein that the Court might issue a warrant for the levy of the amount by attachment and sale of any moveable property belonging to the offender and it may also issue a warrant to the Collector authorising him to realise the amount by execution according to civil process against the moveable or immoveable property, or both, of the defaulter. Then sub-s. (3) provides that where the Court issues a warrant to the Collector under sub-s. (1), cl. (b), such warrant shall be deemed to be a decree, and the Collector to be the decree-holder, within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the nearest civil Court by which any decree for a like amount could be executed shall, for the purposes of the said Code, be deemed to be the Court which passed the decree. It is lastly provided that all the provisions of that Code as to execution of decrees shall apply accordingly.

OF BROACH
v.
OCHHAVLAL
Divatia J.

Relying on this new provision it is contended by the learned Government Pleader that all provisions relating to execution in the Civil Procedure could be applied to this warrant, which is to be regarded as a decree of a civil Court, and that s. 48 of the Civil Procedure Code would therefore apply to such a warrant. Under that section where an application to execute a decree not being a decree granting an injunction has been made, no order for the execution of the same decree shall be made upon any fresh application presented after the expiration of twelve years from certain dates mentioned therein. Now in the first place it is important to realise that s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code is substantive law as to the payment of fine while s. 386 of the Criminal Procedure Code relates to the procedure of its recovery. It is true that in certain matters such as the prevention of offences and maintenance of wives and children the Criminal Procedure Code provides for certain substantive rules, but it is quite clear that s. 386 deals only with procedure of levying the fine imposed under the substantive law of crimes. It is a general rule relating to the construction of statutes that in absence of an express provision, an adjective law cannot control the provisions of substantive law. It must be presumed that the legislature had the provisions of s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code in mind at the time when this new provision was introduced for the first time in 1923, and if no change was made in that section, it must be for the reason that the warrant issued under s. 386 (1)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Code was to be deemed to be a decree for certain purposes only and not for all purposes. For the purpose of limitation, therefore, the substantive law contained in s. 70 was not to be affected.

The warrant which was to be deemed to be a decree was to be executed according to the mode laid down in the Civil Procedure. That is the only effect of sub-s. (3). But the learned Government Pleader says that under that subsection all the provisions of that Code as to execution shall apply, and that would include the application of s. 48 of the Civil Procedure Code. But that section only says that no order for the execution of the same decree shall be made upon any fresh application presented after the expiration of twelve years from certain dates. It does not prescribe any period of limitation for taking out execution. That is provided for in the Indian Limitation Act, and, if it was the intention of the legislature that the provisions of the Indian Limitation Act were to apply, it would have expressly stated that the warrant, which was deemed to be a decree, was to be governed for the purpose of execution by the Indian Limitation Act. But the fact that it does not say so, and the further fact that there has been no amendment or alteration in s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code, mean that so far as limitation i.e. the period during which the fine was to be realised was concerned, it did not contemplate any change. All that it intended to do was that over and above the moveable property of the offender the immoveable property could also be proceeded with by means of execution of the warrant which was to be treated for that purpose as if it were a decree, but the levy of the fine as against moveable as well as immoveable property was subject to the control of the provisions of s. 70, viz., that it was to be levied within the period of six years. We think, therefore, the lower Court was right in holding that the darkhast which was presented after the period of six years from the date of the sentence is barred under s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code.

The order of the lower Court is therefore confirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

DIVATIA J. This appeal has been preferred against the judgment of Mr. Justice Lokur confirming the decree of the lower Court. The appellants are some of the original defendants in a suit by the plaintiffs for partition of certain lands and for a declaration that they were entitled to the management of the devasthan called Peer Mahi Taj and its property as mujawars thereof. The property consists of two fields, survey Nos. 773 and 590. With regard to the first field the question was whether it was the private property of the mujawars or it belonged to the Peer. Both the lower Courts came to the conclusion on evidence that it belonged to the Peer and was not the private property of the mujawars. Mr. Justice Lokur agreed with that finding. There is no question of law involved in that finding.

With regard to survey No. 590, it is contended on behalf of the appellants that the plaintiffs were not receiving the income thereof for a very long time, and the defendants, therefore, who performed the service as mujawars, and who, it is admitted, devoted the income of that field for the shrine, were entitled to hold it to the exclusion of the plaintiffs. There was no plea of adverse possession in the lower Courts, and therefore, there was no issue upon it. The only issue framed was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction in respect of this survey number. The finding of the lower Court was that the plaintiffs were entitled in their turn to perform the duties as mujawars and as such they were entitled to spend the income of this field for the purposes of the institution. The defendants admit that the income could not be appropriated by the mujawars as their private property. That being so, no question of adverse possession arises. The plaintiffs are held entitled to do service as mujawars by rotation, and they are entitled to realise the income and spend it for the purposes of the institution. It is clear, therefore, that Mr. Justice Lokur was right in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought by them.

The suit from which this appeal arises was instituted by the plaintiffs-respondents for a declaration that as heirs of one Dada Saheb Shaikh Mire they were entitled to the property in dispute which was assigned for service as mujawars of the shrine Peer Mahi Taj at Wai in the Satara District. Dada Saheb had a daughter named Bedar Begum who was married to one Kazi Kutubuddin. After Dada Saheb's death, his widow gifted the suit field to her son-in-law Kazi Kutubuddin. Later on Bedar Begum as well as Kutubuddin

A. C. J. died. Plaintiff No. 1 was the son of Kutubuddin by his first wife, plaintiff 1940 No. 2 is his daughter by Bedar Begum, and plaintiff No. 3 is the husband of plaintiff No. 2. Their claim was resisted by the defendants mainly on the ground that the plaintiffs, who claim through females, were not entitled to muja<sup>h</sup>warki rights as no female could officiate as a mujawar. The material issue was whether the defendants proved the alleged custom of exclusion of females.

 HUSSAINBI
 v.
 KHAIRUDDIN

 Divatia J.

The trial Court as well as the appellate Court found that Dada Saheb was entitled to one-third share in the field and that the alleged custom had not been proved. They, therefore, gave a decree in favour of plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2, and plaintiff No. 3 was not held to be an heir.

In second appeal, this decision was confirmed by Mr. Justice Lokur who held, following the decision in Shahar Banoo v. Aga Mahomed Jaffer Bindaneem<sup>1</sup> and Mumtazaru Begam Sahibu v. Mir Mahapalli Sahib,<sup>2</sup> that the duties which a mujawar had to perform in this particular shrine could be and were at one time performed by a female. He, therefore, dismissed the appeal. The defendants have now preferred this further appeal under the Letters Patent.

It has been found on evidence that the duties of a mujawar in this case consist of sweeping and cleaning the place, reading the Fatiha, offering prayers and incense, and looking after the general management of the shrine. The appellants contend that reading the Fatiha and offering prayers and incense are duties of a religious nature which, under the Mahomedan law, could not be performed by females. Mr. Desai, who appears for the appellants, has not been able to cite any provision of the Mahomedan law that a female has no legal right to perform any duty whatever of a religious kind. On the other hand, Ameer Ali in his Mahomedan Law bases the incapacity of females to perform certain religious duties attached to an institution on the ground of custom and not any rule of Mahomedan theology or canonical law. Macnaghten in his work on Mahomedan law also bases it on the usage of the country. He considers the case of sajjadanashin who is in charge of the spiritual affairs of an endowment. In his opinion, although the office of a trustee could be held by a woman and its duties be discharged by proxy, the office of a superior such as that of sajjadanashin required peculiar personal qualifications.
 He says further on :

"Females are not competent to assume the office of superior of an endowment ; and such an act is at variance with the usages of the country, because it is the duty of the superior to instruct and guide his disciples, to teach his scholars, and to keep their company continually, in private and in public, and this cannot be done with propriety by a woman, whose duty it is to live retired and secluded."

These remarks are made not in reference to the position of a mujawar but to those religious or priestly offices which require certain special qualifications.
 The usage would, therefore, depend on the particular kind of duties and not on any abstract notion of a religious duty. A mujawar is described in Wilson's Glossary as "a servant or sweeper of a Mahomedan temple or shrine." His position is different from that of a mutawalli or a sajjadanashin. The former is a manager or a trustee of a wakf and the latter holds the position of a spiritual preceptor. So also an imam who holds the prayers at a congregation, and a mulla who officiates at religious services, like marriages, funerals, etc., are religious officials unlike a mujawar whose main duty is to take care of a shrine.

Mr. Desai relies upon two decisions in support of his case that a female cannot act as a mujawar. The first decision is in Murzamalli v. Hidayatbi<sup>1</sup> in which the plaintiffs claimed the right to perform certain services in a mosque to the exclusion of females and deputies of females by virtue of a sanad granted to their ancestors. The plaintiffs there were not mujawars, but were grantees of land for the purpose of specified ceremonies, viz., imamat (preaching by being a priest), moujani (calling to prayer), and khitabat (reading the Koran at the mosque). The sanad expressly stated that they were to perform those duties from generation to generation in the male line and according to custom. It was held that females were excluded under the terms of the sanad as well as the usage of the country from performing duties of a purely spiritual nature. Moreover, the duties of preaching and calling to prayer as well as reading the Koran are distinguishable from merely reading Fatihas, i.e. certain suras from the Koran, and offering prayers and incense. The former kind of duties require special personal qualifications which are not necessary for the latter type. That decision, therefore, does not support the appellants' case.

The next case relied on is Mujawar Ibrambibi v. Mujawar Hussain Sheriff.<sup>2</sup> It was held there that the plaintiff, who was a woman, was not entitled to perform the duties of a mujawar of a durga which were not of a secular nature. The duties in that case were reading the Fatiha, offering prayers and incense, etc. It is urged that those are the duties in the present case also and that that decision is, therefore, a direct authority in favour of the appellants. But this is not correct. The decision was also based on the evidence that the office was never held by a female in that durga, and that there was a previous decision in respect of the same endowment in Hussain Beebee v. Hussain Sherif,<sup>3</sup> where a claim advanced by the widow of a deceased mujawar was negatived. In the present case, however, it has been found on evidence that defendant No. 1, who is herself a female, used to manage the shrine and defendant No. 5 has admitted that if any of them died without a male issue, his widow, daughter and sisters were entitled to get a share in the land of the Peer. It is also found that the mujawars of the Peer in the present case are not required to teach any doctrine or to come in contact with strangers whom women may not approach having regard to custom or usage. The Madras High Court itself has, in a later decision in Munnavaru Begam Sahibu v. Mir Mahapalli Sahib,<sup>4</sup> discussed this case and held that it was a decision on its own facts and that the learned Judges did not intend to lay down any general proposition of Mahomedan law that the Fatiha could not be said or that prayers and incense could not be offered by a woman. The case of Munnavaru Begam Sahibu v. Mir Mahapalli Sahib was that of a mujawar, and Abdur Rahim J., a distinguished Mahomedan Judge, was of the opinion that a religious office can be held by a woman under the Mahomedan law unless the duties were of such a religious nature which she cannot perform in person or by a deputy, that the burden of establishing that a woman was precluded from holding a particular office was on those who pleaded the exclusion, and that in the absence of anything in the rules by the founder, the usages of the institution were to govern the case. He followed the decision in Shahar Banoo v. Aga Mahomed Jaffer Bmdaneem,<sup>1</sup> where it was held that under the Mahomedan law there was no legal prohibition against a woman holding a mutawalliship when the trust by its nature involved no spiritual duties which a woman could not properly discharge in person or by a deputy. There is a clear distinction between merely reading the Fatiha, i.e. certain suras in the Koran, or offering prayers and incense on the one hand and preaching before a congregation or officiating at religious services on the other. The decisions in Shekh Karimodin v. Nawab Mir Sayad Alamkhan<sup>2</sup> and Kaniz Zohra v. Saiyid Muztaba Hussain,<sup>3</sup> on the position of a sajjadanashin, and Biyyamma v. Ahmadsaheb,<sup>4</sup> relating to mullagiri rights, do not apply to the case of a mujawar whose case is governed by the observations of Abdur Rahim J. in Munnawaru Begam Sahibu v. Mir Mahapalli Sahib.<sup>5</sup>

It must be stated, moreover, that it has been held in Shekh Karimodin v. Nawab Mir Sayad Alamkhan that even in the case of a sajjadanashin although females may be excluded, it would not follow that males, who establish their descent from the propositus through females should also be excluded. Even assuming, therefore, that females would be excluded from mujawarship, the same remarks would apply to the position of a male person who claims descent from a female. In any case, therefore, plaintiff No. 1 would come under this class. But, as I have observed above, the exclusion of females is not proved in the case of mujawarship.

In the present case, therefore, plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 are entitled to the reliefs granted to them on the ground that the Mahomedan law is not against the plaintiffs and the usage is admittedly in their favour.

The decision of Mr. Justice Lokur is, therefore, correct, and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

BROOMFIELD J. I have nothing to add to what my learned brother has said with regard to Letters Patent Appeal No. 20 of 1939.

In the other appeal the first question is whether females are competent to perform the duties of a mujawar, which consist, according to the finding of the Assistant Judge, in reading the Fatiha, offering prayers and incense and looking after the general management of the shrine. Mr. Justice Lokur has held that they are competent to perform these duties and to succeed to the office in due course of inheritance. Several cases have been cited in the argument. In some of these references have been made to Macnaghten's Precedents and Baillie's Digest of Mahomedan Law. We have examined these passages and we find that wherever it is stated in these authorities that females are incompetent to perform the duties of a religious office, that is said in connection with the office of a sajjadanashin, i.e. the spiritual head of an institution. It seems that there may be a considerable variety in the functions which may be performed by mujawars. Having regard to the literal meaning of the word these functions may be purely ministerial or menial. But some religious or quasi religious functions may be combined with the ministerial duties. Whether a female is or is not competent to hold the office must depend on the nature of these religious or quasi religious duties, that is to say, must depend on the evidence in each particular case.

There is no Bombay authority which is inconsistent with the view taken by Mr. Justice Lokur. Mirzamalli v. Hidayatbi<sup>1</sup> was not a case of mujawars. Some of the duties which had to be performed in accordance with the terms of the sanad were quite obviously religious duties of a kind which custom would not allow to be performed by females, for instance, imamat, which was translated in the report of that case as "preaching by being a priest", and kitabat, i.e. "reading the Koran at the mosque." Moreover, the Court in that case took the view that the terms of the sanad itself excluded females from inheritance quite apart from the nature of the duties to be performed. In Biyamma v. Ahmadsaheb<sup>2</sup> I held that lands assigned for the remuneration of a village mulla cannot be inherited by a female heir, because the duties of a mulla, which are of a religious nature, cannot, according to Mahomedan law, be performed by a female. As appears from my judgment, it was admitted there that the female plaintiff was not capable of performing the duties. The only question for decision was whether those duties could be performed by proxy.

Mr. Justice Lokur has relied, to some extent, on the decision of the Privy Council in Shahar Banoo v. Aga Mahomed Jaffer Bindaneem.<sup>3</sup> I am not sure that that case helps very much because there their Lordships were dealing with the office of mutawalli, which is essentially a secular office, and mutawallis and mujawars would not necessarily be on the same footing. At the same time, there is certainly nothing in the Privy Council case which lends any support to the appellants' argument. Mr. Desai has relied on two Madras cases, Hussain Beebee v. Hussain Sherif<sup>4</sup> and Mujavar Ibrambibi v. Mujavar Hussain Sherif.<sup>5</sup> The former case dealt with mujawars, but the mujawars there were priests, and different, therefore, from those with whom we are concerned. Mujavar Ibrambibi v. Mujavar Hussain Sherif followed that case. There the facts were no doubt similar to those of the present case in respect of the duties to be performed by the mujawar, but the Court partly relied on evidence as to usage, and the decision might not have been the same if the evidence as to usage had been the same as in our case. Moreover, this case is dissented from, or at any rate explained away, in Munnawaru Begam Sahibu v. Mir Mahapalli Sahib.<sup>6</sup> There we have the opinion of an eminent Mahomedan Judge which, I think, Mr. Justice Lokur was fully entitled to follow.

As my learned brother has pointed out, whatever the decision had been as to plaintiff No. 2, plaintiff No. 1, at any rate, would not be disqualified, as it was held in Sheikh Karimodin v. Nawab Mir Sayad Alamkhan that males claiming through females may succeed even to the office of sajjadanashin.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE BANK OF CHETTINAD, LIMITED

v.

June 2.

THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, MADRAS.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 42 (1), and 43—'Agent,' meaning of—Bank in Indian State having business connection with bank in British India—Income on loans advanced to bank in British India by bank in Indian State, whether liable to income-tax—Principle of fiscal legislation.

A large money lending business with many branches was being carried on by A and his three sons. They formed a bank at a town K in British India and another at P in an Indian State out of British India. Their business was transferred to these two banks as well as to a limited company registered in the Indian State. All the shares of the two banks were held by A and the members of his family and the banks were controlled by them. The P bank advanced several loans through one of its branches to a branch of the K bank. Six of these loans were used in the Rangoon business of the K bank. The income arising from those loans was assessed for the purpose of income-tax. The K bank objecting to the assessment, the Commissioner made a reference to the High Court of Madras under s. 66 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, in which he stated that in substance those loans represented money lent by the P bank to the K bank, but the transactions had been unnecessarily complicated by resorting to a series of entries which were as superfluous as they were confusing. He submitted that the income from those loans accrued and arose to the P bank directly or indirectly through or from a business connection in British India, within the meaning of s. 42 (1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, between the K bank and the P bank. The High Court decided that the submission of the Commissioner was right. On appeal to His Majesty in Council :—

Held, (1) that the suggestion that in revenue cases the substance of the matter might be regarded as distinguished from the strict legal position was wrong ;

(2) that the terms of s. 42 of the Indian Income-Tax Act were wide enough to cover profits or gains which could be said to accrue or arise to the P bank directly or indirectly through or from any business connection which might exist between the P bank and the K bank in British India ;

(3) that the income-tax authorities were acting within the power conferred upon them by s. 43 of the Income-tax Act in treating the K bank as the agent of the P bank for the purposes of the Act ; and

(4) that the income from the loans was chargeable to income-tax in the name of K bank :

In taxation cases the subject is not to be taxed merely because, in accordance with a Court's view of what it considers the substance of the transaction, the Court thinks that the case falls within the contemplation or spirit of the statute. He is not taxable by inference or by analogy, but only by the plain words of a statute applicable to the facts and circumstances of his case. The principle of all fiscal legislation is that if the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be.

SIR LANCELOT SANDERSON. This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Madras dated November 17, 1938, which was given upon a reference of a question of law made to the High Court by the Commissioner of Income-tax under s. 66 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, XI of 1922.

The question was as follows :—

"Whether on the facts of this case the Income-tax authorities were entitled to hold that the income from the first six items of loans referred to in paragraph 21 of the Income-tax Officer's assessment order accrued and arose to the Pudukottai Bank directly or indirectly through or from a business connection in British India within the meaning of section 42 (1) of the Indian Income-tax Act between the Kanadukathan Bank and the Pudukottai Bank."

The Commissioner of Income-tax submitted that this question should be answered in the affirmative. The High Court (consisting of Sir Lionel Leach C. J., Madhavan Nair and Varadachariar JJ.), decided that the submission of the Commissioner was right and answered the question in the affirmative.

From this decision the appellant, the Bank of Chettinad, Ltd., has appealed to His Majesty in Council.

The reference arose out of the assessment of the Bank of Chettinad, Ltd., Kanadukathan (hereinafter for the sake of brevity referred to as the "Kanadukathan Bank") as agent of the Chettinad Bank, Ltd., Pudukottai (hereinafter referred to as the "Pudukottai Bank"), for the assessment year 1933-34.

The assessment proceeded on the basis that certain profits or gains accrued to the Pudukottai Bank, resident out of British India, directly or indirectly through or from a business connection in British India, and that under s. 42(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922 such profits or gains were chargeable to income-tax in the name of the Kanadukathan Bank, resident in British India, which was treated as the agent of the Pudukottai Bank under s. 43 for all the purposes of the Act.

Sir Lancelot

Raja Sir Annamalai Chettiar of Chettinad with his three sons had a large money lending business with many branches in Burma, Ceylon, the Federated Malay States and French Cochin China. In 1929 they formed the Kanadukathan Bank which has its headquarters at Kanadukathan in British India. Kanadukathan lies about two miles from the border of the State of Pudukottai and eighteen miles from the town of Pudukottai, the capital of the State. In 1930 they formed the Pudukottai Bank and also registered in Pudukottai a company called the Chettinad Corporation, Limited, both of which have their registered offices at Pudukottai. The business carried on by the Raja and his sons were wound up and all the assets and liabilities transferred to the three companies. The assets and liabilities of the branches in Burma (which until April 1, 1937, was a part of British India), were transferred entirely to the Kanadukathan Bank. The assets and liabilities of the branches in the Federated Malay States were mostly transferred to the Pudukottai Bank. The assets and liabilities of the branches in Ceylon were transferred partly to the Colombo branch of the Kanadukathan Bank and partly to the Branches of the Pudukottai Corporation, Limited, in Ceylon. Part of the value of the excess over liabilities was adjusted against the paid-up capital of the three companies. The balance was apportioned and the sums treated as being deposits of the Raja and other members of his family with these companies.

The nominal capital of the Kanadukathan Bank is Rs. 3,00,00,000 and the paid-up capital Rs. 1,00,00,000, divided into 20,000 shares of Rs. 500 each. All the shares of the company are held by the Raja and members of his family. The directors are the Raja, his wife and two outsiders, neither of whom holds any shares : one is an employee and the other the agent of the Raja.

The nominal capital of the Pudukottai Bank is Rs. 2,00,00,000, and its paid-up capital is Rs. 1,70,00,000, divided into 20,000 shares, of which 10,000 are Rs. 700 each paid up and 10,000 of Rs. 1,000 each fully paid up.

All these shares, except three, are held by the Raja and the members of his family. The directors are the Raja, his wife and his son, and two outsiders, each of whom holds one share. There is no doubt that the two companies are controlled by the same people.

The Kanadukathan Bank has twenty-two branches, twenty in Burma, of which one is at Rangoon, and one at Bentong, in the Federated Malay States and one at Colombo.

The Pudukottai Bank carries on no money lending business at Pudukottai, but it has a branch at Kuala Lumpur, situated about thirty miles from Bentong in the Federated Malay States.

It appears that between September, 1930, and February 1933, loans amounting to Rs. 1,32,86,888 were made by the Pudukottai Bank to the Kanadukathan Bank. The loans were carried out through the Kuala Lumpur branch of the Pudukottai Bank and the Bentong branch of the Kanadukathan Bank.

They fall under the following nine heads, as stated in the reference made by the Commissioner of Income-tax :—

|       |         | " Rs.         | P. C.                     |

The Bentong branch of the Kanadukathan Bank did no money-lending business and the only duties of the officer in charge of that branch appear to have been to receive hundies from the Kuala Lumpur branch of the Pudukottai Bank and to pass them on to the Rangoon branch after making the relevant entries in the books.

The first six of the above-mentioned items represent monies used in the Rangoon business of the Kanadukathan Bank in accordance with the procedure hereinbefore indicated : They are the six items mentioned in the reference to the High Court, and the income arising from the said loans is the subject matter of the assessment, which is now in question.

The Commissioner of Income-tax in his reference stated that "in substance these loans represent money lent by the Pudukottai Bank to the Kanadukathan Bank, but the transactions have been unnecessarily complicated by resorting to a series of entries which are as superfluous as they are confusing."

Their Lordships think it necessary once more to protest against the suggestion that in revenue cases "the substance of the matter" may be regarded as distinguished from the strict legal position.

In the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Westminster (Duke)<sup>1</sup> disapproval of this doctrine was expressed in the opinions of Lord Tomlin and Lord Russell of Killowen.

A passage from the opinion of Lord Russell of Killowen at page 24 may usefully be cited. It is as follows :—

"I confess that I view with disfavour the doctrine that in taxation cases the subject is to be taxed if, in accordance with a Court's view of what it considers the substance of the transaction, the Court thinks that the case falls within the contemplation or spirit of the statute. The subject is not taxable by inference or by analogy, but only by the plain words of a statute applicable to the facts and circumstances of his case. As Lord Cairns said many years ago in Partridge v. Attorney-General<sup>2</sup> : 'as I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation it is this : If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be.'"

The question on this part of the case is not whether "in substance" the loans represented money lent by the Pudukottai Bank to the Kanadukathan Bank,

P.C. but it is whether in fact the Pudukottai Bank lent the said money to the 1940 Kanadukathan Bank.

BANK OF Their Lordships have no doubt that on the facts of the case the said six CHETTINAD items did represent loans made by the Pudukottai Bank to the Kanadukathan Bank, and that the money was used in the branch of the Kanadukathan Bank at Rangoon, which was then in British India.

COMMIS- The fact that the transactions were negotiated through the branches of SIONER OF the banks does not affect this question : the branches were not separate entities, INCOME-TAX, but were parts of the two respective banks, and it is obvious that the business
MADRAS
— 90 transacted by the two branches was the business of the two banks.

*Sir Lancelot
Sanderson*

The questions to be considered are whether on the facts of this case the Pudukottai Bank had a business connection in British India and whether the profits in question accrued or arose to the Pudukottai Bank directly or indirectly through or from such business connection within the meaning of s. 42 (1) of the Act.

It was argued on behalf of the appellant bank that in order to bring the case within the section it must be shown by the income-tax authorities that the Pudukottai Bank, non-resident in British India, had a business connection in British India in relation to the actual transactions in question, that a business connection arises out of business transactions and that the transactions in this case, namely, the above-mentioned loans, were made not in British India but in the Malay States and were to be repaid in the Malay States in the Malay States currency. Consequently it was argued that although the profits of such transactions did accrue to the Pudukottai Bank, they did not accrue through a business connection in British India.

In the case of any person residing out of British India, all profits or gains accruing or arising, to such person, whether directly or indirectly, through or from any business connection or property in British India, shall be deemed to be income accruing or arising within British India, and shall be chargeable to income-tax in the name of the agent of any such person, and such agent shall be deemed to be, for all the purposes of this Act, the assessee in respect of such income-tax :

The terms of the section are very wide, and their Lordships are not prepared to place upon them the limitation for which the appellant contends. The words are wide enough to cover profits or gains which can be said to accrue or arise to the Pudukottai Bank directly or indirectly through or from any business connection which may exist between the Pudukottai Bank and the Kanadukathan Bank in British India.

That the Pudukottai Bank had a business connection with the Kanadukathan Bank in British India cannot on the facts be doubted, and the transactions in question could not have been carried out but for the existence of the Kanadukathan Bank which was in British India, and the business connection between that bank and the Pudukottai Bank.

It has already been shown that the two banks are controlled by the same people, viz., the Raja and his family. It further appears that the main function of the Pudukottai Bank was to finance the Kanadukathan bank, that the loans advanced by the Pudukottai Bank to the Kanadukathan Bank represented a large part of the capital of the Pudukottai Bank, that the flow of business between the two banks was secured by the complete control exercised by the Raja and his family over the business of both banks, so that the loans could be safely made without security and for indefinite periods. In view of these facts their Lordships are of opinion that the High Court was right in holding that the Pudukottai Bank had a business connection with the Kanadukathan Bank in British India during the year of assessment, and they are further of opinion that the profits and gains, the subject matter of the assessment, accrued to the Pudukottai Bank directly or indirectly through such business connection in British India.

There remains the question whether the Income-tax Commissioner was correct in treating the Kanadukathan Bank as the agent of the Pudukottai Bank within the meaning of s. 43 of the Act.

It is to be noted that the agent contemplated by the section is so to speak an artificial creation, for it is provided that any person having a business connection with a person residing out of British India, upon whom the Income-tax Officer has served a notice of his intention of treating him as agent of the non-resident person, is to be deemed to be such agent.

In view of the above-mentioned conclusions it is clear that the Income-tax Officer was acting within the power conferred upon him by s. 43 in treating the Kanadukathan Bank as the agent of the Pudukottai Bank for the purposes of the Act.

Several cases were cited to their Lordships, but, with one exception, they were not of much assistance, for the facts in the cited cases were different from those of the present appeal, and the decision in each case must of course depend upon its own facts. The exception is Income-tax Commissioner v. Remington Typewriter Co. (Bombay), Ltd.<sup>1</sup> The headnote of that case is as follows :—

"A company incorporated in the U. S. A., and hereinafter called 'the American company', carried on business in New York, and there manufactured and sold typewriter machines. The respondent company had been incorporated under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, and had purchased from the American company for shares the goodwill of that company in the Bombay Presidency and adjoining territory; the American company held all its shares except three issued to that company's nominees. Two other companies had been incorporated in India, each being in substance in the same position towards the American company as the Bombay company; their respective business territory covered the rest of India."

It was held that there was a business connection within the meaning of s. 43 and s. 42, sub-s. (1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, between the American company and each of the Indian companies, and consequently under s. 43 the respondent company could be deemed for the purposes of the Act to be the agent of the American company, and as its agent could be charged to tax under s. 42, sub-s. (1), in respect of profits made by the American company upon machines exported to British India.

The question whether the necessary business connection existed was argued before the Board, although no appeal had been lodged by the respondents and their Lordships had no doubt that the necessary business connection did exist. It was stated in the judgment that (p. 48) :—

"The Bombay company was formed for the express purpose of acquiring from the American company and carrying on in a particular area the American company's business of selling the American company's manufactures. Although no contractual obligation exists by which the Bombay company is compelled to purchase any of the manufactures of the American company, the flow of business between the two companies is secured by the fact that the ultimate and complete control of the Bombay company is vested in the American company, which owns all its shares."

It was further held that the profits and gains in question accrued or arose to the American Company directly or indirectly through or from a business connection in British India.

This case is material, because in their Lordships' opinion, if the appellant's contention in this appeal were correct, viz., that the business connection existed only in respect of actual business which was transacted by the branches of the two banks outside British India, the above cited case should have been decided the other way in so far as it related to the matter now under consideration.

For the above-mentioned reasons their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed and that the appellant should pay the respondent's costs of this appeal. They will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 66—Property purchased at Court sale—Sale certificate solely in name of auction purchaser—Plaintiff claiming property on ground that it was purchased by certified purchaser on his own behalf and on behalf of plaintiff—Claim whether maintainable.

Section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, excludes any claim of plaintiff based upon an averment that property purchased by the certified purchaser at a Court auction sale was purchased by him on his own behalf and on behalf of the plaintiff or some one through whom he claims. The section is not a bar to a claim based on a title independent of the auction purchase.

v.
PRASAD

SIR GEORGE RANKIN. This appeal is brought by the plaintiff from a decree dated August 11, 1936, of the High Court at Allahabad, which affirmed the decision (June 30, 1932), of the Subordinate Judge at Banda dismissing the suit. The only question which now arises is as to the maintainability of the suit in view of s. 66 of the Code of Civil Procedure :—

66.—(1) No suit shall be maintained against any person claiming title under a purchase certified by the Court in such manner as may be prescribed on the ground that the purchase was made on behalf of the plaintiff or on behalf of some one through whom the plaintiff claims.

(2) Nothing in this section shall bar a suit to obtain a declaration that the name of any purchaser certified as aforesaid was inserted in the certificate fraudulently or without the consent of the real purchaser, or interfere with the right of a third person to proceed against that property, though ostensibly sold to the certified purchaser, on the ground that it is liable to satisfy a claim of such third person against the real owner.

The plaint was filed on January 8, 1932, and the case made thereby was as follows. One Ram Dayal died in 1910 leaving as his heiress Mst. Ram Piari Kuer, his widow. On her death in 1922 the plaintiff succeeded to his property as reversioner according to the Hindu law. The first defendant Kesho Prasad was nephew to Ram Dayal, and on July 20, 1907, at a Court sale at which the village of Mamsi Khurd was sold in execution, he had bid therefor on behalf of himself, his brother Kedar Nath and Ram Dayal. The bid was accepted and the sale confirmed, but the sale certificate was made out in the sole name of Kesho Prasad, and his name alone was recorded in the revenue record (khewat). The property was held by Ram Dayal and the defendants jointly, Ram Dayal and afterwards his widow receiving their share of the net profits from Kesho Prasad, who was himself the lambardar of the village. But after the death of the widow in 1922 the defendants stopped paying any part of the profits and denied the right of the plaintiff. The relief prayed for by the plaint was a decree for joint possession of one-half of the village and mesne profits. This was on the footing that Ram Dayal had a one-half interest, the other half belonging to Kesho Prasad either alone or jointly with his brother Kedar Nath.

The plaint contained other allegations directed to show that at the time of a previous suit brought by the plaintiff in 1923 against the defendants and others he did not know of the facts giving rise to his present claim. It contained an express averment that Ram Dayal was not joint with the defendants at the time of his death and it is not now suggested that they were joint in 1907 at the time of the execution sale.

The learned trial Judge held that the purchase was made by Kesho Prasad solely on his own account and that neither the plaintiff nor Ram Dayal nor the widow were ever in possession of a half share. The High Court (Sulaiman C. J. and Bajpai, J.) having pointed out that Ram Dayal and Kesho Prasad were separate, and that the plaintiff's claim as laid in the plaint was to rights alleged to have been acquired by the auction purchase of 1907, held that s. 66 applied to the case and barred the suit. The learned Judges did not find it necessary to come to a finding on the questions of fact upon which the plaintiff had failed in the trial Court. They were careful in two parts of their joint judgment to make clear that the plaintiff's case was rested by him upon the auction purchase :—

"There was, however, no case put forward by the plaintiff in the plaint suggesting that subsequent to the auction purchase of 1907 either Ram Dayal or his widow had by adverse possession for over 12 years acquired title to this property. The suit was not based on any such adverse title claimed independently of the rights alleged to have been acquired by the auction purchase of 1907.

Had the plaintiff come into Court on the allegation that subsequent to the auction purchase of 1907 either Ram Dayal or after him his widow acquired title by adverse possession extending over 12 years, we would have certainly entertained the claim. It has been laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Abdul Jalil Khan v. Obaidullah Khan (1929, L. R. 56 I. A. 330) that section 66 is not a bar to a claim based on a title independent of the auction purchase; but no such case was put forward in the plaint and none has been pressed before us in appeal."

On this appeal learned counsel for the appellant has confined his argument to maintaining that the plaint if properly interpreted did raise a case based upon possession subsequent to the auction purchase, which possession had continued for sufficient time to bar the rights of Kesho Prasad under art. 142 or 144 of the Limitation Act and to extinguish his title under s. 28 thereof. Learned counsel did not dispute that s. 66 excluded any claim of the plaintiff based upon an averment that the auction purchase had been made by Kesho Prasad on account of Ram Dayal as well as on his own account. Their Lordships have therefore no occasion to discuss the various points emerging from the careful study made in the High Court of the case law upon the section. It is sufficient to say that their examination of the plaint leads them to agree with the High Court in holding that the only case pleaded by the plaintiff was that Ram Dayal derived his right to half of the village from the auction purchase having been made in part on his behalf by Kesho Prasad. No case independent of this purchase and basing title upon subsequent possession is traceable in the memorandum of appeal to the High Court or in the grounds of appeal to His Majesty. In these circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the first respondent, who alone has appeared to contest the appeal.

SAJJAN PAL SINGH.

1940

June 28.

Hindu law—Widow—Daughters—Reversioners—Reference by widow of reversioners' rights to arbitration—Whether such reference binds reversioners.

Under Hindu law a reversioner has no right or interest in presenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or to relinquish, or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is mere spes successionis. His guardian, if the reversioner happens to be a minor, cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto.

A Hindu left, by his will, his divided property one of which was mentioned as ancestral, to his wife in the first instance, and on her death to his daughters. A dispute about the ancestral property having arisen between the widow and her husband's collaterals, the widow in her own right as well as the mother and guardian on behalf of her minor daughter referred it to arbitrators, who decided that the property should be enjoyed by the widow during her lifetime, and that after her death it should be divided among the collaterals. After the widow's death, the only surviving daughter, who was a minor at the date of arbitration, sued to recover possession of the ancestral property alleging that the award was not binding on her :—

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed and the award was not binding on the plaintiff, because the widow in making the agreement to refer in no way purported to bind the estate or to act as representing the estate of her husband.

THE facts are sufficiently set forth in the judgment.

J. M. Parikh, for the appellant.

W. Wallach, for the respondent.

LORD RUSSELL. In order to explain the reasons why their Lordships think that this appeal should succeed, the barest statement of the relevant facts will be sufficient. One Jiwa Ram made his will dated August 20, 1890, by which, after stating that being a member of a divided family he was the owner of the divided property specified below, he provided that (in the events which happened) his wife Hans Kunwar should "remain the owner in possession of the entire property left by me like a Hindu widow till her lifetime", and after her death "all the married and unmarried daughters who be alive or whose male issue be alive shall get the estate acquired, i.e., the property in equal shares." At the end of the will were specified four items of property of which the first was described as "ancestral property in mauza Isauli, pargana Jalisar, district Etah—4 biswas out of 20 biswas." The other three items were non-ancestral property which had been acquired by the testator.

P. C.        The testator, who never had a son, died on August 26 or 27, 1890. He 1940        was survived by his wife and two daughters, viz., a married daughter Kawal HAR NARAINI Kunwar and the plaintiff who was then aged three. A third daughter (Het KUNWAR Kunwar) was born posthumously, who died at about the age of seven years.
 v.        The will has been construed as containing no disposition, in the events
 SAJJAN PAL which happened, of the ancestral property in mauza Isauli after the death SINGH        of the widow. It would accordingly (the testator being divided and having Lord Russell no son) in the normal course belong to the daughter or daughters living at the death of the widow.

Shortly after the death of the testator disputes arose. Certain collaterals claimed the ancestral property, alleging that they were joint with the testator. One Nem Kunwar claimed that her son Narain had been adopted by the testator, and that the testator had made a later will leaving the whole property to him.

On February 27, 1891, an agreement was entered into between the various claimants of the one part, and the widow and the testator's married daughter of the other part, by which it was agreed to refer the disputes to arbitration. The material recital states: "There is a dispute between us the parties in respect of the property specified below . . . and it is not settled, hence for its decision we the parties unanimously have accepted to abide by the decision of the arbitrators regarding the dispute." The specified property consisted of the four items specified by the will.

By their award the arbitrators decided that as to the ancestral property in mauza Isauli the widow should remain in possession and occupation during her life, and that after her death it should be divided among the collaterals in certain detailed shares, the testator's daughters not having any concern therewith nor any share therein. As to the acquired property the widow was to remain in possession and occupation during her lifetime, and after her death it was to go to the daughters as therein mentioned.

The widow died on February 12, 1928, leaving the plaintiff as the sole survivor of the three daughters. The Isauli property was mutated in favour of the collaterals. As to the other property the plaintiff succeeded thereto and the present litigation is not in any way concerned with it.

The plaintiff instituted the present suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Etah, on January 11, 1930, against the collaterals, claiming that under Hindu law she alone became entitled to succeed to the property in Isauli on the death of the widow, and that the agreement to refer and the award were not binding on her for a number of reasons specified in the plaint.

The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit.

On appeal to the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad the decree of the Subordinate Judge was set aside and the suit was dismissed with costs in both Courts.

From that order the plaintiff has now appealed to His Majesty in Council, and a number of points have been argued before the Board. . . .

It is, however, unnecessary to express an opinion upon any except one, which in their Lordships' opinion is covered by authority of this Board, and is decisive of this case.

It was contended, and this was the foundation of the High Court's judgment, that a Hindu widow represents her husband's estate, and can compromise claims so as to bind reversioners. That this is true as regards such matters as claims by creditors who are claiming to be paid out of an estate, but are not disputing the title of those beneficially interested in the estate, is beyond doubt; but whether the principle necessarily applies when the claim is one which disputes such title, is another question. But it need not be investigated in the present case for the simple and sufficient reason that in making the agreement to refer, the widow in no way purported to bind the estate, or to act as representing the estate of her husband. The agreement is clear upon the point. She and her married daughter executed the agreement as the second party, and the widow is expressly described as doing so in a double capacity, viz. "in her right and as mother and natural guardian of minor daughters Musammat Hamaraini"—i.e. the plaintiff—"and Het Kunwar." She was, as guardian, contracting on behalf of her infant children.

In those circumstances she was attempting to do what this Board has, viz., in the case of Amrit Narayan Singh v. Gaya Singh,<sup>1</sup> said, cannot be done.

In that case an infant was under Hindu law entitled to succeed on the death of his mother to property which originally belonged to his maternal grandfather. Under a compromise in an arbitration with certain agnates who claimed the property, in which compromise the infant's father Rajander acted for his son, an arrangement was come to, during his mother's lifetime, which deprived the infant of his reversionary interest in his grandfather's property. On the mother's death the son brought a suit to recover the property, and it was held that he was not bound by the compromise. It will be observed that the interest of the plaintiff in the property in suit in the present case is identical with that of the infant son; and in relation to that interest their Lordships made use of the following language (p. 39):

"... a Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in presenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or to relinquish, or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is mere spes successionis. His guardian, if he happens to be a minor, cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto. Rajander's action, therefore, in referring to arbitration any matter connected with his son's reversionary interest was null and void."

Their Lordships are of opinion that the present plaintiff is in precisely the same position as was the son in the case cited, that her mother had no power to bind her by the agreement to refer, and that consequently her right to the property in suit is unaffected by the award.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be allowed, that the decree of the High Court should be discharged and the decree of the Subordinate Judge restored.

The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal and of the proceedings in both the Courts in India.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

v.

BASANGOUDA YAMANAPPA.*

Circumstantial evidence—Accused charged with murder and robbery—Property of murdered person—Accused pointing out property in their possession—Failure to give explanation of possession—Inference of robbery—Accused known to murdered person—Intention to conceal detection evident—Inference of murder—Duty of counsel and Court to fit in explanation as to accused's innocence—Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 34, 302, 394, 457.

Circumstantial evidence must be consistent, and consistent only with the guilt of the accused; if the evidence is consistent with any other rational explanation, then there is an element of doubt of which the accused must be given the benefit. One of the circumstances which has to be taken into account is the fact that the accused has offered no explanation, or has offered a particular explanation; but it must be borne in mind that the accused cannot go into the witness-box, and is not bound to give any explanation at all. The fact that he does not open his mouth cannot be used against him. Often the accused is an illiterate person, and makes a statement under s. 342, Criminal Procedure Code, which is obviously untrue, or he is not prepared to admit anything.

The fact that an accused is not willing to admit that he took part in a robbery which is proved against him ought not to prejudice the question whether he committed murder at the same time.

It is the duty of counsel in defending an accused to point out that the evidence is quite consistent with an explanation which fits in with the accused's innocence. Where the accused is not represented, or not properly represented, the Judge is bound to ask himself whether there is any rational explanation of the evidence which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, and, if there is, he is not justified in convicting. A reasonable explanation of the evidence should not be rejected because not offered by the accused.

Where three accused produced property which had been stolen on the occasion of a robbery and murder, and at the trial they did not offer any explanation of the possession of the property but merely said that they did not produce it, an inference that they were guilty of robbery would be justified. Further, where the evidence disclosed that the accused belonged to the same village as that of the woman murdered at the time of committing robbery and were known to her, the only possible common intention which could be attributed to them was that they intended to murder her in order to prevent her giving evidence against them. The Court, under such circumstances, would be justified in coming to the conclusion that the accused committed the robbery and that pursuant to their common intention to rob the deceased and avoid detection they had the further intention of murdering her, and that they carried out that intention.

In the village of Hulgur in the Dharwar district there lived a family of Lingayat priests consisting of Gangava, her son Chanbasaya aged fourteen years, and her mother-in-law, Mallava aged sixty-five. They lived in a house known as Jamkhandi-math.

In March, 1940, there was an uras (anniversary) of a darga (tomb) about a mile from Hulgur. A fair was held at that time and in that fair Gangava had opened a tea-shop. Gangava and her son Chanbasaya spent their time in this shop. Chanbasaya used to go to the math in the morning for performing pūja (worship). Mallava used to accompany her grandson when he went back, and took her meal in the tea-shop but came to Jamkhandi-math in the afternoon to spend the nights there.

On March 26, 1940, Mallava came to the tea-shop as usual, took her meals, and returned to Jamkhandi-math in the afternoon.

In the morning of March 27, 1940, when Chanbasaya as usual went to the Jamkhandi-math, he found the murdered body of his grandmother Mallava. A blood-stained crowbar was lying near her body and there were wounds on the head. He informed the neighbours and thereafter his mother Gangava and the Police patil. The Sub-Inspector of Police, who was at the neighbouring town of Shiggaon, came to Hulgur in the afternoon and sent the body to the Medical Officer. On recording the statement of Gangava he found that robbery was also committed as the contents of two boxes, which contained saris, bodice-cloths and some gold and silver ornaments, were stolen.

From the statements of several persons, the Sub-Inspector suspected accused No. 1, Basangauda, to have a hand in the affair. He was found at another village, and on being questioned implicated accused No. 2, Ninga, and accused No. 3, Hanmantappa.

On information given by accused No. 1, the Sub-Inspector and some panchas went to Niralgī which was the village of accused No. 1. From a heap of chaff lying on the threshing floor of his field the accused took out a bundle which contained some of the articles mentioned in the statement of Gangava. The party returned to Gadag and there the Sub-Inspector recorded statements of two Sarafs to whom some property was sold by accused No. 1. Accused No. 1 was then arrested.

On April 11, 1940, accused No. 2 was arrested and he also pointed out a place in his backyard from where he took out a bundle containing some missing articles.

Accused No. 3 was then arrested and he also pointed out a spot on the roof of his house from which he took out a bundle containing some missing articles.

The accused were thereupon charged with having committed offences punishable under ss. 302, 457 and 394 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, and the Magistrate committed them to the Court of Session at Dharwar for trial.

The Additional Sessions Judge of Dharwar, before whom the trial took place with the aid of assessors, convicted the accused and sentenced them to death under s. 302 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, and ten years rigorous imprisonment under each of the ss. 457 and 394 read with s. 34

A. Cr. J. of the Indian Penal Code, the sentences of rigorous imprisonment to run concurrently and to come into force in case the death sentence was not confirmed. The accused appealed to the High Court. The Additional Sessions Judge applied for confirmation of the death sentences.

BEAUMONT C. J. These are three appeals by the three accused against their convictions by the Additional Sessions Judge of Dharwar of the offence of murder, and there is an application to confirm the death sentences which the learned Judge passed upon all of them.

The facts established by the prosecution are these. The murdered woman was one Mallava, who was aged about sixty-five. She and her daughter-in-law Gangava and the latter's son used to live in the Jamkhandi-math in the village of Hulgur. But Gangava had some time back opened a hotel about a mile away from the math, and she and her son thereafter lived in the hotel. Mallava used to go there in the day time to take her meals, but she went back to sleep at night in the math, and Gangava's son used to go to the math every day and spend part of his time with Mallava. On the night of March 25 last Mallava went back from the hotel to the math, and the next morning, when Gangava's son went to the math, he found that Mallava had been murdered. She had been severely beaten over the head, and there is, I think, no doubt that the weapon used was a crowbar, which used to be kept in the math, and which was found near the body stained with human blood. The object of the murder was undoubtedly robbery, because boxes had been broken open, and a large number of ornaments and other articles had been taken, though certain ornaments on the body of the deceased had not been removed.

The first evidence in chronological order is that of Channava, (exhibit No. 5), who lived in a house near to the math. She says that on the day before the date on which the murder was discovered she went in to pound chillies in the math; that Mallava was there and that accused No. 1 came in whilst the witness was there, sat talking with Mallava, and was still there when the witness left about 8 p.m. It is not suggested that accused No. 1 committed the murder on the occasion of that visit, but it is certainly possible that he went there to make sure that Mallava was alone.

Then the next witness is Ningappa, (exhibit 6), a servant of accused No. 1, who on the night in question was sleeping in accused No. 1's shop, which is three houses removed from Jamkhandi-math. He says that on that night accused No. 1 went out and returned about midnight, and the witness woke up at the sound of the door being opened; he asked who it was, and accused No. 1 said that it was Basangouda. He says that accused No. 1 opened the lock of his box and put a bundle into it. He identifies the box as article 110, and it is proved by the panch, (exhibit No. 20), and the panchnama, (exhibit No. 22), that this box, article 110, was subsequently produced from the house of accused No. 2, which shows a connection between accused No. 1 and accused No. 2.

Then the next witness is Yallappa (exhibit No. 11). He says that the day before he heard of the murder of Mallava he had been to a cinema performance and that he left the theatre at midnight. He says :

"I was entering my house when I saw the three accused coming out of the door of the Jamkhandi-math. On their coming near me I questioned them where they had gone and they told me not to interfere in such matters. Then they proceeded to the shop of accused No. 1. Accused Nos. 1 and 2 carried a bundle each and accused No. 3 had nothing."

Then he adds :

"The three accused used to meet in accused No. 1's shop always."

It is true that that witness did not come forward until the arrival of the Police Sub-Inspector and the arrest of the accused on April 9 ; but one may assume, I think, that the witness was threatened that he should not speak of what he had seen ; and, as the learned Judge points out, from the fact that he was examined by the Police Sub-Inspector on the day on which accused No. 1 was arrested, it is probable that his name was mentioned by accused No. 1 as a possible witness. No reason is suggested why this witness should give false evidence, but his evidence is the only direct evidence connecting the accused with the offence on the night in question.

The other evidence consists of the fact that each of the accused produced a substantial part of the stolen property, which was identified by Gangava. Accused No. 1 produced the property from his field, accused No. 2 from his backyard, and accused No. 3 from the roof of his house. There is no reason whatever for rejecting the evidence of the panch and the panchnamas as to the production of the stolen property. It is also proved against accused No. 1 that he sold certain of the stolen articles under a false name on two occasions.

I should say that the accused in their statements simply deny everything. They deny the production of any property, or that they had any connection with the offence. There can, I think, be no doubt whatever that the facts proved, and particularly the possession by the accused of all this property, which was the result of the robbery, justify an inference that they took part in the robbery. But the further question arises whether the evidence justifies an inference that they committed the murder of Mallava. The learned Judge, in discussing the circumstantial evidence, followed a decision of the High Court of Madras in Narayana v. King-Emperor.<sup>1</sup> I have had occasion before to consider that case, and, though I do not for a moment suggest that the decision was a wrong one, I do not find myself in agreement with some of the dicta of the learned Judges. The principal judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Reilly, but the learned Chief Justice, Sir Owen Beasley, concurred in a short judgment. The learned Judges differed from certain observations made in a previous case before the High Court of Madras, Sogaimuthu Padayachi v. King-Emperor.<sup>2</sup> The question with which the learned Judges had to deal in Narayana's case was whether an inference that the accused committed murder could be drawn from the circumstances of the case, including his production of property stolen from the murdered person. They do not accept the statement of Mr. Justice Wallace in the earlier Madras case to the effect that "the Court has to be satisfied not merely that the thief could not have come into possession of the property unless murder had been committed, but also that he could not have come into possession of the property unless he himself had taken part in the murder or was privy to it." Mr. Justice Reilly says (p. 237) :

"When it is the duty of a Judge or a jury to draw from evidence a reasonable inference, it is not their duty to find that there was no conceivable possibility other than the conclusion which they reach."

— Later in his judgment he says (p. 241) :

Beaumont C.J. "If the accused offers no explanation, it is not for the Judge or jury to invent one. One of the facts before them, which it is their duty to take into account, is the fact that he has offered no explanation."

Sir Owen Beasley says with reference to Sogaimuthu Padayachi v. King-Emperor that the case is constantly quoted as an authority for the principle that criminal Courts in the absence of any explanation by the accused can only draw an inference that the accused committed the murder where no other inference is possible. I do not think the learned Chief Justice in that passage was merely emphasizing the word "possible" as distinguished from the word "reasonable". If that were the only point of his observation, I should agree that the Court is not bound to have regard to possible or conceivable, but extremely improbable, explanations of the evidence; but in my view both the learned Judges in Narayana's case state the law in relation to circumstantial evidence wrongly. In my opinion, the rule is that circumstantial evidence must be consistent, and consistent only with the guilt of the accused, and that if the evidence is consistent with any other rational explanation, then there is an element of doubt of which the accused must be given the benefit. No doubt one of the circumstances, which has to be taken into account, is the fact that the accused has offered no explanation, or has offered a particular explanation; but it must be borne in mind that in this country the accused cannot go into the witness-box, and is not bound to give any explanation at all. An accused person, who knows the law, is quite entitled to say: "The evidence is just as consistent with the guilt of somebody else as with my guilt, and, that being so, there is a doubt, and you cannot convict me, and I am not going to open my mouth." The fact that he does not open his mouth cannot be used against him. One must remember also that very frequently the accused is an illiterate person, and makes a statement under s. 342, Criminal Procedure Code, which is obviously untrue. Very frequently he is not prepared to admit anything, whereas, if he was wise, he would admit facts which are definitely proved against him, and offer an explanation about them. But very often he will not admit anything. The fact that an accused is not willing to admit that he took part in a robbery which is proved against him ought not to prejudice the question whether he committed murder at the same time. I particularly dissent from the view of Mr. Justice Reilly that it is not the duty of the Court to invent possible explanations.

I remember many years ago discussing with an eminent King's Counsel in London, who afterwards became a Judge on the Common Law Side of the High Court and was a great criminal Judge, the effect of the introduction of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act of 1898, under which accused persons were for the first time allowed to give evidence in England, and he told me that one effect of the Act was to destroy the whole romance of defending an accused. Formerly counsel could exercise his ingenuity in inventing possible theories which fitted in with the evidence, and were consistent with the innocence of the accused ; but after the accused was allowed to go into the box, it was no good suggesting possible theories, because the facts could be proved by evidence. I only mention that story to illustrate my own view of what the duty of counsel and the Court is in India at the present time. It is clearly the duty of counsel in defending an accused to point out that the evidence is quite consistent with an explanation which fits in with the accused's innocence. In many cases the accused are unable to employ counsel, and in other cases counsel are asked to defend by the Court, and such counsel may be inexperienced, and I think that the Judge is bound to ask himself whether there is any rational explanation of the evidence which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, and if there is, in my opinion, he is not justified in convicting. A reasonable explanation of the evidence should not be rejected because not offered by the accused.

Now, the facts here, first of all, are that the three accused produced property which had been stolen on the occasion of this robbery and murder. That is clearly established. They do not offer any explanation of the possession of the property, but merely say that they did not produce it. As I have said, that is quite enough to justify an inference that they were guilty of robbery. But is it enough to justify an inference that they were guilty of murder? The murder was committed with this crowbar. That, I think, is clear, and as there was only one instrument used, it is probable that only one of the assailants gave the actual blow, and, of course, we do not know which assailant it was. Therefore, we can only convict the accused, if we find that there was common intention to commit murder within s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. In considering that question it is of vital importance to notice that all the accused come from the same village as the deceased woman. Accused No. 1 was obviously known to her, because he was in her house on the evening on which she was murdered and talking to her, and there can be no doubt, I think, that she knew accused Nos. 2 and 3, who were both from the same village. Therefore, if these three people committed the robbery, they must, I think, have intended to murder their victim ; otherwise she would have given them away to the police. I do not see what rational intention one can attribute to the robber or robbers, except that they intended to murder the woman, to whom they were known. If they had come from a different village, or if there was any evidence that they had concealed their faces behind masks and that the victim could not recognize them, then one might perhaps say that the common intention was to rob and one of the robbers may have gone too far in committing murder. But in a case of this sort, the murder of a local inhabitant by three men of the village, I think the only possible intention which one can attribute to them is that they intended to murder her in order to prevent her giving evidence against them. I cannot see any rational explanation of the evidence which is consistent with the innocence of the accused. Of course, it is conceivable that somebody else committed the murder and robbery, and that that person was subsequently robbed by the accused, or handed over the property to the accused, but that does not seem to me a rational explanation. If that were the explanation, it is almost inconceivable that the accused would not have given it and mentioned who it was who gave them the property. There is not a particle of evidence that there was any suspicious character in the neighbourhood of the math on the night of the offence. Therefore, I think, the theory that the accused might have got the stolen property from some third party is an instance of an explanation which is conceivable, but not rational, nor one which any Court can be asked to accept.

Beaumont C.J.
 It seems to me that on the evidence the learned Judge and the assessors were right in coming to the conclusion that the only rational explanation, which fitted in with the whole of the evidence, is that the accused committed this robbery, and that pursuant to their common intention to rob the deceased and avoid detection they had the further intention of murdering her, and that they carried that intention out.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeals must be dismissed and the death sentences confirmed.

SEN J. I agree.

It is perhaps not altogether safe to rely on the uncorroborated evidence of Yallappa (exhibit No. 11) that on the night of the murder he saw all the three accused coming out of the door of the math at about midnight. He did not mention this to any one in the village for about a fortnight though he is one of the Walikars in the village, and he would ordinarily be expected to report a matter like this, when he saw two accused persons coming out with bundles in their hands, to the police patil. Besides, his statement that all the three accused proceeded towards the shop of accused No. 1 is not corroborated by the evidence of accused No. 1's servant Ningappa (exhibit No. 6). The evidence of Channavva (exhibit No. 5), again, that she saw accused No. 1 talking to the deceased woman till about 8 p.m. on the night of the murder does not materially help the prosecution as, according to the prosecution, several hours elapsed between the murder and the time when Channavva left the math. We are thus left with the evidence regarding the production of a large number of articles by accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3, all of which have been identified by Gangava as her own property. On this point there has been no cross-examination. Accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 merely said that they did not produce any of those articles. The evidence is clear, there can be no doubt, that all those articles were produced by the accused. The cross-examination of the panchas who were present at the production of those articles does not show that the accused intended to suggest that the discovery was a mere show, the place having already been known to the police. We thus come to the conclusion that the accused were found with property stolen from the house of the deceased.

The next question that arises is, whether it is possible from this conclusion to arrive at the inference that it was the accused and nobody else who had committed the murder of the deceased. I agree that the decision in Narayana v. King-Emperor<sup>1</sup> goes too far, and that it is the Court's duty to speculate, when the accused's statement does not explain the evidence against him, as to the possible hypotheses that may be made out in favour of the accused. The correct principle appears to have been enunciated by Wallace J. in an earlier Madras case, Sogaimuthu Padayachi v. King-Emperor.<sup>1</sup> He said (p. 291):

"In such a case I am confident that neither law nor justice justifies the hanging of a man simply because he does not plead guilty to being a thief or a receiver of stolen property. The Court has to be satisfied not merely that the thief could not have come into possession of the property unless murder has been committed, but also that he could not have come into possession of the property unless he himself has taken part in the murder or was privy to it."

It seems to me that it is possible to think of three or four theories in the accused's favour. In the first place, it may perhaps be said that someone else merely committed the murder and went away, having had a grudge against the deceased, and that the accused came later on the scene and stole the property. There is, however, nothing in the evidence to show that there was enmity between any one in the village or outside and the deceased. The police at first suspected Fakirayya, the son-in-law of Gangawa, as a possible culprit. But Gangawa herself says that Fakirayya, who had been living with her, had left some three weeks before the murder in anger as she had asked him to give some medicine to his daughter who had been ill but he had declined to do so, and that Fakirayya was also thinking of marrying a second wife, his wife (i.e. the daughter of Gangawa) having died. This does not suggest that Fakirayya had any particular reason to be angry with or bore any grudge towards the deceased. This theory would require that the accused came to know of the murder of the deceased woman on the same night as she was murdered. Accused No. 1's servant Ningappa says that accused No. 1 returned to his shop on the same night with a bag; and from the evidence it can be presumed that the bag contained some of the stolen articles. I therefore think that this theory is not tenable.

Secondly, it is perhaps possible to suggest that someone else murdered the deceased and stole the property and then entrusted the said property with the three accused persons. There is evidence that there was a fair on in the village and a large number of outsiders must have been visiting the village. But if it was an outsider who had committed the offence, then one would expect the stolen property to be removed outside the village rather than be entrusted to somebody in the village. In any case, if this was what had actually happened, one would expect the accused to say so in their defence; the offence of keeping stolen property is not such a grave offence as that of murder. This theory again, therefore, does not seem probable.

Thirdly, it may be suggested that somebody had murdered the deceased and robbed her of the property, and he in turn was robbed by the accused. This theory would require that the second robbery took place on the same night as the first robbery, because, as I have pointed out above, Ningappa states that accused No. 1 was found to have returned to his shop on the same night with a bag. This appears to me to be a too far-fetched theory to be at all probable. It requires us to suppose that though the name of the real offender never came to light at all, the three accused persons came to know of the commission of the offence and decided within a few hours of the same to rob him of the stolen property and succeeded in their object the same night.

Lastly, it has been argued by the learned advocate for the appellants that it is not impossible that one of the three accused committed the murder and that the property of the deceased was later on distributed among the three accused, so that it is impossible to say which of the accused it was who committed the murder. It has also been suggested that the original intention of the accused was not to commit any murder at all but that as the deceased woke up one of the accused killed the deceased on the spur of the moment, so that, again, it is not possible to say which of the accused persons killed her. These theories, again, appear to me to be entirely untenable.

If it was the intention of the accused merely to rob the deceased, I think it must be held that they came to the scene of the offence with the deliberate object of killing the deceased also. They must in that case have intended to break open the trunk and the box which contained the valuable properties of the deceased, and they could not expect that those could be broken open without waking up the deceased; they must have intended to remove the only evidence of their crime by doing away with the deceased. Nor does it seem possible that it was only one of the accused who entered the house and committed the offence and later on distributed the spoils to other persons. If he took the help of the other accused persons in concealing or disposing of the property, it is far more reasonable to think that the three accused were associated together in the offence from the beginning. It thus seems to me impossible to escape the conclusion that all the three accused must have been concerned with the offence from the beginning, i.e. from the inception of the plan to commit the theft, and that the plan must have been to commit the theft by killing the deceased woman. The evidence, in my opinion, is not consistent with the guilt of somebody else or only with the guilt of one or some of the accused. I therefore think that all the three accused have been rightly convicted of the murder of the deceased. It was a cold-blooded and deliberate murder, and there can be no doubt that the proper sentence in such a case is the sentence of death.

Section 10B of the Mussalman Wakf Act, 1923, enacted by the Mussalman Wakf (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1935, directs that no prosecution under the Act shall be instituted except by or with the previous sanction of the Court given in the prescribed manner, i.e. the manner prescribed by rules under the principal Act. Rule 26 of the Bombay Mussalman Wakf Rules, 1936, provides that the order of sanction shall state the offence in respect of which the accused is to be prosecuted.

In dealing with a case involving breach of the provisions of ss. 3 and 5 of the Mussalman Wakf Act, 1923, the civil Judge expressed in his judgment an opinion that an offence punishable under s. 10 of the Act had been committed and directed the papers to be sent to the Public Prosecutor for taking necessary action against the offender. It was objected that the subsequent proceedings failed for want of sanction :—

Held, that the remarks made by the Judge were sufficient compliance with r. 26 of the Bombay Mussalman Wakf Rules, though it might be better if a formal sanction had been given independently of the judgment.

A mutwalli, who is in possession of property situate within the local limits of the Small Causes Court at Bombay, is bound to furnish the particulars required by s. 3 of the Mussalman Wakf Act, 1923, to the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court at Bombay, although other properties of the wakf may be situate, and those who benefit from the wakf may be resident, outside Bombay or outside British India. The section applies to any property of a wakf within the jurisdiction of the local Court.

The term "wakf" as defined by s. 2(e) of the Mussalman Wakf Act is not confined to dedication of property by a beneficial owner, but includes a dedication by a trustee provided he keeps within the terms of his trust. Hence, such dedication is constituted by persons collecting money on terms which make it charitable in the hands of the trustees who hold it, their subsequent investment of that money in immoveable property, and their declaration of a trust of that immoveable property for the charitable purpose for which it is held.

There cannot be an offence under s. 5 of the Mussalman Wakf Act unless a statement has been delivered under s. 3 of the Act.

PROSECUTION under s. 10 of the Mussalman Wakf Act, 1923.

The accused belonged to the Dawoodi Bohra community, which was governed by the Mussalman Wakf Act, 1923, and the Mussalman Wakf (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1935.

struction) called "madressa-e-Haideria" for members of the community. Out of the funds so collected they constructed the madressa at Sunnel. From the balance left on their hands, they purchased on February 26, 1932, a house at 1st Bhoiwada in Bombay for Rs. 14,000, the proceeds of which were devoted towards the expenses of the madressa. On July 7, 1932, the property was entered in their names in the Municipal Assessment Register. In the Cadestral Survey Register the accused was mentioned as one of the trustees.

On December 7, 1934, the accused and his colleagues executed a declaration of trust whereby they declared themselves trustees of all fund moneys in their hands as also of the immoveable properties purchased out of the funds collected by them. They also declared that they were holding the properties as trustees for the support and maintenance of the madressa as a charitable institution and not in their own rights as beneficial owners.

The Bhoiwada property was included in the revised list of wakf properties published in the Bombay Government Gazette, dated December 9, 1937, Part I, p. 2775, under entry No. 108, in which the accused and three others were shown as mutwallis of the property.

The accused omitted to file a statement of particulars required by s. 3 of the Mussalman Wakf Act, and also a statement of accounts required by s. 5 of the Act.

On January 20, 1938, the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court at Bombay issued a notice calling upon the accused and three others to show cause why proceedings should not be taken against them under s. 10 of the Mussalman Wakf Act for failure to file statements under ss. 3 and 5 of the Act.

The Chief Judge was of opinion that though the property was originally purchased in the individual names of the four trustees out of moneys collected by them from Dawoodi Bohras at Sunnel the deed of declaration made it abundantly clear that the property was wakf property and the property was dedicated for the purpose of the madressa. The Chief Judge ordered :—

"I hold that the respondent Gulamhussein Alibhai Jariwala ... has committed default by failing to file particulars and accounts, as required by ss. 3 and 5 of the Mussalman Wakf Act in relation to this property situate in Bombay and has thus rendered himself liable to be prosecuted under s. 10. Hence, I direct the papers to be sent to the Public Prosecutor for taking necessary action against respondent Gulamhussein."

No formal order of sanction to prosecute was drawn up.

On February 10, 1939, the Public Prosecutor filed an information against Gulamhussein in the Court of the Chief Presidency Magistrate for offences under s. 10 of the Mussalman Wakf Act.

The Chief Presidency Magistrate convicted the accused of the offences charged and fined him in a sum of Rs. 200 for each offence, observing :—

"The four persons including accused purchased this property out of funds collected from Dawoodi Bohras of Sunnel and got the conveyance in their own name as joint owners. Later on after about two years they dedicated it for the charitable object of a madressa for Dawoodi Bohras. They are, therefore, the wakifs—the property belonged to them at the time of dedication and by a declaration of trust (exhibit D) they released their right over it and dedicated it in the implied ownership of God in such a manner that the profits were to be used for a madressa-e-Haideria at Sunnel—a charitable institution for imparting religious and secular education to the children of Dawoodi Bohras of Sunnel. They appointed themselves as mutwalis by the same declaration of trust. There is nothing against Mahomedan law in a wakif appointing himself a mutwali (vide Mulla's Mahomedan Law, p. 168, where it is stated that the founder of a wakf may appoint himself or his children and descendants as mutwalis). Again at p. 153 (para. 148) Mulla states that a wakf may be made either verbally or in writing. It is not necessary in order to constitute a wakf that the term wakf should be used in the grant if from the general nature of the grant itself such dedication can be inferred. It is true that in the declaration of trust the word wakf is not used but it is called a 'declaration of trust'; but looking to the general nature of the grant itself, the moneys were collected for that purpose. The buying of the property obviously with that object, the vesting of the property in the four persons by a conveyance and then the dedicating of it for charitable object for children of Dawoodi Bohras, it is clear that it is a wakf ...

The other contentions raised ... are that there could not be two charges under s. 3 as well as s. 5 as a charge under s. 5 could not arise unless particulars were filed under s. 3. I do not think there is any force in that argument. Accused has not complied with requirements of both sections and is, therefore, liable under both. The next contention is that sanction to prosecute accused is not given by the Chief Judge in the prescribed manner and cites s. 10B (1) of Bombay Amendment Act XVIII of 1935 and r. 26 at p. 7. I do not think that there is any force in this contention. The judgment of the Chief Judge (exhibit E) states clearly that accused has committed default under ss. 3 and 5 of the Act XLII of 1923 and asks the Public Prosecutor to take necessary action as accused has rendered himself liable to be prosecuted under s. 10 of the same Act."

The accused appealed to the High Court.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga, with R. M. Shah, for the accused.

M. C. Setalvad, Advocate General, with R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal by the accused against his conviction by the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, under s. 10 of the Mussalman Wakf Act (XLII of 1923) for failure to comply with ss. 3 and 5 of the said Act.

The facts are not in dispute so far as they are material for the present purpose. The accused with others collected monies from Dawoodi Bohras at Sunnel, which is in the Indore State, for the purpose of building a madressa at Sunnel, and a madressa was duly built. On February 26, 1932, the trustees of the madressa purchased an immoveable property at Bhoiwada in Bombay out of the funds belonging to the madressa, and on December 7, 1934, they executed a declaration of trust, which is exhibit D, admitting that they had purchased the Bhoiwada property out of monies collected from Dawoodi Bohras at Sunnel for the support of a madressa at Sunnel, and declaring that they held the property upon trust, in substance, for the madressa.

The appellant was called upon to deliver accounts under s. 3 of the Mussalman Wakf Act, and he failed to do so. Thereupon the Court, that is the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court at Bombay—who is the Court for the purposes of this case—holding that the appellant fell within the terms of the Act, directed that the papers be sent to the Public Prosecutor of Bombay in order that he might take the appropriate action. This was done, and the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate convicted the accused under ss. 3 and 5

Four points have been taken in appeal. The first is that the necessary sanction to the prosecution has not been given. By the Mussalman Wakf (Bombay Amendment) Act, which is Bombay Act No. XVIII of 1935, s. 13, there was added to the principal Act s. 10B, which directs that no prosecution under this Act shall be instituted except by or with the previous sanction of the Court given in the prescribed manner. The prescribed manner means the manner prescribed by rules under the principal Act. Rule 26 of the Bombay Mussalman Wakf Rules, 1936, provides that the order of sanction shall state the offence in respect of which the accused is to be prosecuted. In my opinion, the last sentence of the judgment of the learned Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court, in which he holds that the appellant has committed default by failing to file particulars and accounts, as required by ss. 3 and 5 of the Mussalman Wakf Act in respect of this property and has thus rendered himself liable to be prosecuted under s. 10, and in which he directs the papers to be sent to the Public Prosecutor for taking necessary action against the appellant, sufficiently complies with r. 26 though it might be better in future, in order to avoid any question, that formal sanction should be given independently of the judgment.

The second point taken is that a trustee cannot create a wakf, and the third point is that there can be no wakf of a foreign charity. These points can be dealt with together, because they both turn on the definition of "wakf", and the terms of s. 3 of the principal Act. Section 3 provides that within six months from the commencement of this Act every mutwalli shall furnish to the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property of the wakf of which he is the mutwalli is situated, a statement containing the particulars prescribed. So that if one finds a mutwalli with property within the local limits of the Small Causes Court at Bombay, it seems to me clear that he has to furnish the required particulars, although other properties of the wakf may be situate, and those who benefit from the wakf may be resident, outside Bombay or outside British India. That disposes of the contention that the Act does not apply to a foreign wakf. It applies to any property of a wakf within the jurisdiction of the local Court.

Then we have to see what is the meaning of "wakf", in order to deal with the point that a trustee cannot create a wakf. Now "wakf" is defined in s. 2(e) of the principal Act, and we are only concerned with that definition, and we are not concerned with the question, often difficult, as to whether a particular trust constitutes a wakf under Mahomedan law. Under the definition in this Act "wakf" means the permanent dedication by a person professing the Mussalman faith of any property for any purpose recognized by the Mussalman law as religious, pious or charitable. It is not disputed that the purpose of benefiting the madressa at Sunnel is a purpose recognized as charitable by the Mussalman law; but it is argued that there has been no permanent dedication by a person professing the Mussalman faith, because it is said that the only person who can dedicate a property must be a beneficial owner, and a trustee cannot dedicate. I know of no authority for that proposition, though of course a trustee must keep within the terms of his trust, but in any event the dedication here was not merely the declaration of trust of 1934 by trustees. The dedication is constituted by the collection of money on terms which made it charitable in the hands of the trustees who held it, their subsequent investment of that money in immoveable property, and their declaration of a trust of that immoveable property for the charitable purpose for which it was held. That, to my mind, constitutes a good dedication. In my opinion, therefore, the learned Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court was right in holding that this was wakf property, and the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate was similarly right.

Then the fourth point taken is that the conviction under s. 5 of the Musalman Wakf Act is bad, because s. 5 cannot come into operation unless s. 3 has been complied with. It is not an argument which invokes my sympathy, because it really enables the accused to escape from the consequences of a breach of s. 5 by his own wrong in committing a breach of s. 3; but on the wording of s. 5, I do not see any answer to the argument. Section 5 provides that within three months after the thirty-first day of March next following the date on which the statement referred to in s. 3 has been furnished, and thereafter within three months of the thirty-first day of March in every year, every mutwalli shall prepare and furnish to the Court a certain statement; but unless a statement has been furnished under s. 3, there is no date within which he is required to furnish a statement under s. 5, and it seems to me that, on the wording of s. 5, there cannot be an offence under that section unless a statement has been delivered under s. 3.

I think, therefore, that we must set aside the conviction under s. 5, but we uphold the conviction under s. 3. The fine of Rs. 200 imposed under s. 5 to be refunded.

SEN J. I agree.

The words "specific provision to the contrary" in s. 1(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code mean a specific provision that the Code is to override the special law, and s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not contain a specific provision that s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is not to prevail over it.

DACOITY and house-breaking.

ON March 5, 1940, the Sub-Inspector of Police of Yawal, in East Khandesh district, received information at noon that nineteen men of the village of Savkheda were going to commit a dacoity during that night at the house of one Vishnu Bari who was residing at Shirsoli in Jalgaon taluka. He went to Jalgaon and communicated the information to the Sub-Inspector of Police of Jalgaon taluka at nine o'clock in the evening. He gave a written report mentioning the names of the nineteen men who intended to commit the dacoity. The Sub-Inspector of Jalgaon informed the Assistant Superintendent of Police, Jalgaon, about it, and the latter officer ordered the City Sub-Inspector of Police of Jalgaon to render assistance to the Sub-Inspector of Jalgaon taluka.

Accordingly the City Sub-Inspector and the Sub-Inspector of Jalgaon taluka and another Sub-Inspector started at eleven o'clock at night in a bus with ten armed policemen and ten to twelve unarmed constables for Shirsoli, which was about seven miles from Jalgaon. The police party got down from the bus at a distance of two miles from Shirsoli and proceeded thence on foot. When they were about a furlong or so from the village, they heard cries coming from the village. They proceeded in the direction from which the sound of cries came and from the village gate they saw the robbers beating the inmates of the house of the complainant Vishnu Bari. On seeing them the robbers began to pelt them with stones. Some of the stones hit the police, and the City Sub-Inspector thereupon gave orders to fire and seventeen shots were fired. The robbers took to their heels by another route. The police found that the complainant's father had received serious injuries at the hands of the robbers who had taken away the ornaments from the persons of the complainant's mother, wife, and the two wives of his brothers. The robbers had also removed from a box ornaments, sixteen currency notes of Rs. 10 each, and rupees ten in coins. The value of the ornaments and cash came to Rs. 320-13. The complainant and his two brothers were sleeping at their threshing floor which was at some distance from their house. They came to the house after the robbers had decamped. The City Sub-Inspector and another Sub-Inspector with two armed constables pursued the robbers but they escaped. The two Sub-Inspectors reached Savkheda next morning at ten o'clock after passing through the village of Kolnhavi near which the river Tapti was fordable by people coming from Savkheda to Jalgaon. Accused Nos. 6-11 were arrested at Savkheda and taken to Yawal. Accused Nos. 3-5 and 12-18 were arrested at Thorgaon while crossing the river Tapti by a Head Constable and brought also to Yawal. The City Sub-Inspector took accused Nos. 3-18 to Jalgaon and handed them over to the Sub-Inspector of Jalgaon. Accused Nos. 1 and 2 were also arrested on March 6, 1940. None of the stolen property was found with the accused.

The accused were placed before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, First Class, and charged with having committed the offences of dacoity and house-breaking punishable under ss. 395 and 458 of the Indian Penal Code. Accused Nos. 6 and 15 were further charged under s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code as they were previously convicted under s. 375 of the Indian Penal Code.

The Sub-Divisional Magistrate committed the accused for trial to the Court of the Additional Sessions Judge, East Khandesh.

At the trial before the Sessions Court the charge under s. 458, Indian Penal Code, was not pressed by the Assistant Public Prosecutor.

The Additional Sessions Judge convicted accused Nos. 1-6, 8, 10, 12-16, and 18 for committing dacoity. Accused Nos. 4, 5, 8, 12 and 18 were sentenced to four years' rigorous imprisonment. Accused Nos. 1-3, 6, and 13-16 were sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment. Accused No. 10, who was seventeen years' old, was sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment.

Accused Nos. 7, 9, 11, 17 and 19 were acquitted.

Accused Nos. 1-5, 8, 10, 12, 13-16, and 18 appealed to the High Court against their convictions and sentences.

BEAUMONT C. J. In this case the accused, other than accused No. 6, who were convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge of East Khandesh under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code, appeal against their convictions. We are indebted to Mr. R. R. Desai, who has represented the accused as amicus curiae, for the industry he has devoted to the case and the ability with which he has presented it.

The case has some peculiar features. All the accused, except accused No. 18, are from the village of Savkheda in taluka Yaval, and it appears that on March 5, 1940, the Sub-Inspector of Police of Yaval received information that a dacoity was contemplated that night at the village of Shirsol, taluka Jalgaon. So he went to Jalgaon and reported to the Sub-Inspector of Police there and put in a written report, which is exhibit 8, in which he mentioned the names of the nineteen men who, he was informed, were going to commit the dacoity. The Sub-Inspector of Police of Jalgaon and the City Sub-Inspector of Police of Jalgaon accordingly went to Shirsol with a party of police, some of them armed and some unarmed. Unfortunately they did not arrive at Shirsol until about 11 o'clock at night, when the dacoity was in progress, and instead of blocking the exits from the village, the police seem to have entered the village at one end, and, when the dacoits started to throw stones at them, the police fired, whereupon all the dacoits ran away from the other end of the village. The result was that full advantage of this information, which at any rate was good as to the fact that a dacoity was contemplated, was not taken and no arrests were made. But the police suspecting that the dacoits would

A. Cr. J. go back to Savkheda, and realizing that for that purpose they would have 1940 to cross the river Tapti at one or other of the fordable places at Kolnhavi or Thorgaon, posted police at those places. But the police did not arrive at EMPEROR Kolnhavi until about 6 o'clock in the morning by which time there had been
 v. ample opportunity for any of the dacoits to get across the river. Accused BIRAM No. 1 and, accused No. 2 were arrested at Jalgaon. Accused Nos. 8 and 10, SAEDAR among the present appellants, were arrested at Savkheda, and the other appel-Beaumont C.] lants were arrested at Thorgaon trying to cross the river. All the arrests were made on the 6th, that is to say, in the early morning after the dacoity. None of the stolen property was recovered, and the evidence against the various accused consists primarily of evidence of identification, and experience shows that evidence of identification of those taking part in dacoities at night is apt to be unreliable.

I think that we shall have to be very critical in dealing with the evidence because of this report which the police had obtained and which mentioned the names of various persons. The learned Government Pleader has made a great effort to induce us to treat exhibit 8, report made by the Sub-Inspector of Police of Yaval to his superior in Jalgaon, mentioning the names of suspects, as a sort of first information, and as affording evidence that the persons named in that report were under suspicion in connection with this dacoity ; but it is quite clear that the report cannot be used for any such purpose. The Sub-Inspector of Police has not in his report disclosed the source of his information, and the mere fact that he says that somebody told him that certain persons were going to commit a dacoity is no evidence at all against those persons. If the Sub-Inspector of Police wanted to prove as against the accused the information which he had received, he would be bound to give evidence as to the source of his information, and to call his informant, and that, no doubt for sufficient reasons, he was not prepared to do. All that the report amounts to, therefore, is that the Sub-Inspector of Police did receive information which caused him to think that there might be a dacoity at Shiroli and which induced him to go to Shiroli with a police party. But his information affords no ground of suspicion whatever against any of the accused, and we have to see whether the evidence against the various accused is sufficient to justify their conviction. The learned Sessions Judge and the assessors were for the most part unanimous in believing the different witnesses, and this Court always differs with reluctance from the unanimous opinion of the trial Judge and the assessors as to the credibility of witnesses. In this case I am prepared to assume that the witnesses who were regarded as honest by the learned Sessions Judge and the assessors were in fact honest ; but as to some of them I think they were not in a position to be certain of the facts to which they deposed. I think that the risk of mistake on their part is in some cases too great to be run.

[His Lordship then discussed the evidence against the accused and found that the evidence against accused Nos. 1-5, 15 and 18 was not sufficiently reliable.]

Mr. Desai has also raised a point of law which is occasioning a good deal of trouble to the High Courts in India, and that is the question whether information leading to the discovery of a fact and prima facie admissible under

s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is inadmissible having regard to the terms of s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That trouble started with the decision of the Privy Council in Narayana Swami v. Emperor.<sup>1</sup> In that case their Lordships pointed out that s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which prohibits any statement made by any person to a police-officer in the course of an investigation under Chapter XIV from being used as evidence for any purpose, except as mentioned in the section, is wide enough to include a statement made to the police by a person who, either at the time of the statement, was, or afterwards became, an accused; and as far as I know, that view had always been acted upon by this Court. Their Lordships further pointed out that on that reading of s. 162 there would to some extent be a conflict between that section and s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act, and they observed that the question might arise whether s. 162 pro tanto repeals the provisions of s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act, or whether s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is saved by s. 1, sub-s. (2), of the Criminal Procedure Code, and their Lordships left that question open. Since that decision the matter has been considered by four of the High Courts in India. The High Court of Madras (Subbiah Tevar, In re)<sup>2</sup> and the High Court of Patna (King-Emperor v. Mayadhar Pothal)<sup>3</sup> have taken the view that s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is not affected by s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, being saved by s. 1(2). On the other hand, a full bench of the Lahore High Court in Hakam v. The Crown<sup>4</sup> by a majority have held that s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is pro tanto repealed by s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the same view has also been taken by a full bench of the Allahabad High Court in Emperor v. Baldeo.<sup>5</sup> Having read the various judgments of the other High Courts, some of which extend to a considerable length, I am reluctant to add to the number of judgments on the point; but the lower Courts in this province are entitled to guidance. I prefer the view taken by the High Courts of Madras and Patna to the view taken by the High Courts of Lahore and Allahabad.

Section 1 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code reads :

"In the absence of any specific provision to the contrary, nothing herein contained shall affect any special or local law now in force."

Most, if not all, of the learned Judges agree that s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is a special law in force at the date of the passing of the amended s. 162, and that point seems to me beyond question. It is a law applicable to a particular subject within s. 41 of the Indian Penal Code. But the view accepted in Lahore and Allahabad is that s. 162 amounts to a "specific provision to the contrary", because the prohibition therein is expressed in the most clear and emphatic terms. But surely much more than that is required. Section 1(2) enacts a rule of construction to be applied in the interpretation of the Code. That rule is that where there is a conflict between the Code and a special law, the special law is to prevail in the absence of a specific provision to the contrary. But the provision must be to the contrary of the rule of construction, and not merely of the special law. The section presupposes a conflict, and a conflict is none the less a conflict because it is clear for all to see. Reliance has been placed on the use of the word "specific" rather than "express." I am myself inclined to think that "specific provision" is a stronger expression than "express provision," and means a provision clearly expressed. I do not see how a provision arising by implication only can be said to be specific. But if this is going too far, I am clearly of opinion that the language of the Code giving rise to the implication must at any rate be so directly contradictory to the special law that it can be affirmed with certainty that the legislature intended to override the special law. There is, however, nothing in the language of s. 162 which suggests that the legislature had in mind s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. The language of the two sections is quite distinct, and to a large extent the respective subject-matters are not identical. Section 162 deals with all statements made to a police-officer in the course of an investigation; s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act merely deals with information received from a person accused of an offence in the custody of a police-officer which leads to a discovery. The two sections only overlap in respect of statements made to a police-officer in the course of an inquiry which lead to a discovery. It seems to me impossible to hold that s. 162 contains a specific provision that s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is not to prevail over it.

Another argument which appealed to the High Courts of Lahore and Allahabad is based on the history of the two sections. It is said that the legislature must have known when they amended s. 162 in 1923 that originally the subject-matter of s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act had been included in the Code; that prior to 1893, when the terms of s. 162 were in conflict with s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act, the latter section was expressly saved from the operation of the former section, and that the Court is bound to assume that the omission to insert in 1923 an express provision saving the operation of s. 27 was deliberate, more particularly as in the section as it existed from 1898 there was an express saving of s. 32 of the Indian Evidence Act. I do not suppose that any one seriously doubts that the omission of the legislature in 1923 to deal with s. 27 in one sense or another was due to the fact that it was not present to the minds of the legislators that the amendment of s. 162 would appreciably affect s. 27; but if the Court must deal with the matter pedantically, one may suggest that the omission to save s. 27 may have been due to a just appreciation by the legislature of the true effect of s. 1(2), and to a reluctance to insert an unnecessary saving clause in respect of s. 27, merely because the legislature of 1898 had inserted such a clause in the case of s. 32. This explanation, if not conspicuous for its probability, seems to me much more probable than the hypothesis that the legislature, realising the conflict between the amended s. 162 and s. 27, and intending to repeal the latter section pro tanto, and thereby to alter the law as it had existed for fifty years, nevertheless omitted any mention of s. 27. In my opinion to read s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code as overriding s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is to ignore the terms of s. 1(2) of the Code.

The point is really not of very much substance in the present case as against the accused whose appeals have been dismissed. But, as I have said, the lower Courts are entitled to have a lead from this Court on a question which arises so frequently, particularly in dacoity cases, as to the admission of evidence under s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. I think that those Courts may safely proceed on the assumption that at present the law has not been altered by anything which the Privy Council said.

In the result, the appeals of accused Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 15 and 18 will be allowed and the appeals of accused Nos. 8, 10, 12, 13, 14 and 16 will be dismissed.

A panchnama is merely a record of what a panch sees. The only use to which it can properly be put is that when the panch goes into the witness box and swears to what he saw, the panchnama can be used as a contemporary record to refresh his memory.

If the police want to rely on a panchnama they must call a panch to prove it.

A police-officer is not entitled to give evidence of what the panch told him that he saw, and that is what it comes to if a police-officer is allowed to put in the panchnama. A police witness may state that he held a panchnama and offer to produce the record if the accused asks for it, but he cannot bring it on record in his evidence-in-chief. If the police hold a panchnama, and do not offer to call the panch, an inference may be drawn against them from the fact that the panch is not submitted for cross-examination. The putting in of a panchnama without calling the panch is not only an infringement of the rules of evidence against the admission of hearsay evidence, but it is unfair to the accused, because it enables the police to get the advantage of evidence in corroboration without putting that evidence to the test of cross-examination.

THEFT.

The complainant Ramdas lived in a house known as Kansara Chawl on Kalkadevi Road in Bombay. He was a dealer in jewellery.

On September 14, 1939, one Nagar a friend of the complainant introduced the accused Mohanlal to him with the view of finding some work for the former and took the accused to the complainant's house. The business proposition did not materialise.

The complainant intended to leave Bombay for Surat for reasons of health. It was therefore arranged between the parties that the accused and one Kodarlal, a relative of the complainant, should live in two back rooms of the complainant's house during his absence. The complainant locked up the chief rooms of his tenement and went to Surat on September 18, 1939, leaving the accused and Kodarlal in charge of the house and in occupation of the two hind rooms.

The complainant returned to Bombay on October 23, 1939, at 3 p.m., and when he reached his house he found that the accused and Kodarlal had abandoned it and disappeared, that the lock that he had put was broken open, and that some articles were missing from his premises. He informed the police about it on the same day at 7.30 p.m., and was advised by the police not to meddle with his rooms that day. The next day the complainant made a search of his belongings, when he discovered that jewellery worth Rs. 7000 had also disappeared from a secret box in one of the cup-boards.

The police searched in vain for the accused.

On March 1, 1940, the accused voluntarily surrendered himself to the police.

On March 5, 1940, the police held an identification parade, when he was identified by a ghati named Gopal and a locksmith named Hasanali. A panchnama was made of the identification and signed by the panch.

The accused was charged with offences punishable under ss. 454, 380 and 109 of the Indian Penal Code.

At the trial, the investigating police-officer was examined as a witness, when he deposed :—

"On 5. 3. 40 I held an identification parade, at which the locksmith Hasanali and witness Gopal at once identified the accused.

"Panchnama of the identification parade, Ex. E."

Thus, the panchnama went on the record of the case. The panch was not examined as a witness.

Both Gopal and Hasanali were examined as witnesses, when each of them deposed :—

"I identified the accused at a parade."

The trying Magistrate convicted the accused of the offences charged and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for six months on each count and to pay a fine of Rs. 1000.

The accused appealed to the High Court.

M. R. Vidyarthi, and S. A. Kher, for the accused.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal by the accused against his conviction under ss. 454 and 380 of the Indian Penal Code by the Presidency Magistrate, Fourth Court, Bombay.

The story of the complainant is that the accused was brought to his flat by a mutual friend on September 14, 1939, and on the 18th the complainant went to Surat, and left the accused and a relation of the complainant named Kodarlal in the flat. Part of the flat was locked up; the rest was left open. The complainant returned to Bombay on October 23, and then found the locks on the doors of the flat and cupboards broken, and some of his goods missing. He went round to the police at once and gave information. He gave a list of the articles which, he said, he had lost, which were articles of no great value, worth about Rs. 50 or Rs. 60 and he stated that he had no suspicion against anybody. Police Sub-Inspector Harris went round to the flat and found that things were disturbed, and it looked as if there had been house-breaking. The complainant says, and that no doubt is true, that the police asked him not to touch anything because they hoped to find some fingerprints. The next day, the complainant says, after the police allowed him to touch his things, he looked into a secret drawer, and then discovered for the first time that he had lost some pearl necklaces and pearl bangles of the value of over Rs. 7,000. He says that when he went to Surat he left these articles in the secret drawer, and having discovered their loss, he made a supplemental statement to the police. The accused could not be found for some time, and eventually on March 1, 1940, he surrendered to the police, and he is charged with having stolen all these articles.

The learned Magistrate seems to have accepted the whole of the complainant's story, but a good deal of it seems to me to be, on the face of it, absurd. The complainant is a gentleman who has suffered from thieves before, according to his own story, and it is inconceivable that he would go off for a month to Surat, leaving valuable jewels in his flat in some secret drawer, the secret of which could no doubt be discovered by any thief, and with the accused whom, he says, he knew nothing about in occupation of his flat. If he had done so incredibly foolish a thing, I am quite certain that on his return from Surat and on discovering that his flat had been broken into, the first thing he would have done would have been to go to the secret drawer and find out whether the pearls were there. It is absurd to suggest that he never looked into the secret drawer until the next day, and only then discovered the loss of these pearls of very substantial value. I am perfectly certain that the pearls were not lost at all; but, on the other hand, probably somebody did break into the flat. I should think it unlikely that the whole thing was stage-managed, although that is conceivable. There is no doubt that when the police went to the flat, it showed signs of having been broken open.

Now, the evidence against the accused is, first of all, that he was admittedly left in the flat. He says that he remained there for some time. He wrote two letters, which are in evidence, asking the complainant for money to enable him to continue to live in the flat, and as the complainant did not send any money, he says that he left, throwing the key into the flat through a window. At any rate he was at one time in charge of the flat, and the evidence that he committed the house-breaking is that of two witnesses, Gopal, who was a bhaiya employed on the first floor of Kansara Chawl, the complainant's flat being on the third floor, and a locksmith named Hasanali. Gopal says that he had seen the accused and a ghati, who was a servant of the complainant, and whom he had known as a servant of the complainant for seven months previously. He saw these two people removing various articles from the flat, and he was asked by Hasanali, the locksmith, whether these two people were servants of the complainant, because they had asked him to break open certain locks in the flat. Hasanali says that the ghati called him up to the complainant's flat, where was the accused, and they asked him to make keys for some of the locks, but he said that he could not do that, but would break them open, and accordingly, he says, he did break open the locks. Now, if the accused and the ghati got the locks broken open, it is no doubt a fair

A. Cr. J. inference that they probably stole anything which was stolen. But I may 1940 point out that it is not the usual practice for house-breakers to send for an — expert locksmith to help them in their work. I find it very difficult to sup-EMPEROR pose that, if they were minded to break open the locks, two men would not
 v. have done it without seeking the assistance of somebody who could afterwards MOHANLAL identify them. But it is obvious that the value of the evidence of these two BABABHAI witnesses, assuming their main story to be true, must depend on their identi— fication of the accused. So far as Gopal is concerned, his evidence is obviously Beaumont C.J. wrong in respect of the ghati, because the complainant says that he never had a ghati in his employ, and yet Gopal says that he knew him as the employee of the complainant for seven months. It is difficult to see why, if the evidence as to the ghati is entirely false, the evidence as to the accused should be accepted as entirely true. There is no such criticism of Hasanali's evidence, but he had not seen the accused before and the evidence of identification of the accused is most unsatisfactory. Deputy Inspector Kale, who was in charge of the case, says that he held an identification parade at which Hasanali and Gopal at once identified the accused, and he then produced a panchnama of the identification parade, which was put in as exhibit E.

Now, this Court pointed out some years ago in Emperor v. Rustam Lam<sup>1</sup> that if the police relied on a panchnama, they must call a panch to prove it, and that the practice of Presidency Magistrates in allowing a panchnama to be put in by a police witness was wrong. The object of having panch witnesses is to provide evidence which is independent of the police. In searches under Ch. VII of the Criminal Procedure Code or the City of Bombay Police Act it is necessary to call panchas, but s. 103(2) of the Code provides that they need not be called as witnesses unless they are specially summoned. That does not mean that the panchnama can be used if no panch is called. Apart from searches, it is, of course, not a rule of law or practice that police evidence must be corroborated; but where one is dealing with an identification parade, and where it is of vital consequence to show that the accused was duly identified, it is obviously desirable, as the police recognize themselves, to have some independent evidence that the parade was properly and fairly held, because there is nothing easier than for the police to stage an unfair identification parade, in which the witness is shown the accused before he identifies. I do not suggest that the police often hold unfair identification parades, but it is obviously desirable that there should be independent evidence to show that a parade has been properly held, and Deputy Inspector Kale recognized that in this case and summoned panchas; but if the prosecution wish to prove by independent testimony what happened at the parade, they must call the independent witness. The panchnama is merely a record of what a panch sees, and the only use to which it can properly be put is that when the panch goes into the witness box and swears as to what he saw, the panchnama can be used as a contemporary record to refresh his memory. But a police-officer is not entitled to give evidence of what the panch told him, that he saw, and that is what it comes to if a police-officer is allowed to put in the panchnama. A police witness may state that he held a panchnama and offer to produce the record if the accused asks for it, but he cannot bring it on record in his evidence-in-chief. If the police hold a panchnama, and do not offer to call the panch, an inference may be drawn against them from the fact that the panch is not submitted for cross-examination. The putting in of a panchnama without calling the panch is not only an infringement of the rules of evidence against the admission of hearsay evidence, but it is unfair to the accused, because it enables the police to get the advantage of evidence in corroboration without putting that evidence to the test of cross-examination. Such cross-examination might show that the panch was nothing but a police agent, and that his evidence is worthless. If the practice of allowing the prosecution to put in a panchnama without calling the panch is still in force despite the decision of this Court, I hope that Magistrates will see that it is stopped.

Having regard to the extreme importance in this case of the identification of the accused by Gopal and Hasanali, and to the fact that evidence on this point was improperly admitted, the appeal must be allowed. I am not prepared to act on the uncorroborated testimony of the police-officer as to what took place at this identification parade, particularly as evidence in corroboration was available and not called.

The accused must, therefore, be acquitted. Fine, if paid, to be refunded.

V of 1879), Sec. 37—"Which are not the property of individuals"—"Are hereby declared to be the property of Government"—Interpretation.*

A talukdari wanta in Gujarat is neither an alienated nor an unalienated holding. It is a peculiar estate which continues to be the property of its holder under the British rule as it was in pre-British dynasties from ancient times. It was subjected to legislation from time to time.

A talukdar is neither an inamdar nor an occupant of his lands. His wanta is a freehold and not a leasehold. What was paid formerly as tribute and peshkush as a political levy is now converted into a fixed amount in lump as a revenue payment, but his proprietary right over all the lands comprised in the wanta was affirmed at the commencement of the British rule and has not since been taken away by any legal process.

The existence of a highway or a public road is consistent with the ownership of a private person in the soil.

Sir John Lade v. Shephard,<sup>4</sup> Harrison v. Duke of Rutland,<sup>5</sup> and City of London Land Tax Commissioners v. Central London Railway,<sup>6</sup> followed.

There is a presumption that a highway, or waste lands adjoining thereto, belong to the owners of the soil of the adjoining lands. The site of the road must be presumed to belong to the adjoining proprietors half to one and half to the other up to the middle of the road. Where the property is bounded by a road or a river, the boundary, even if given as the road or the river, is the middle of the road or the river as the case may be.

Hence, the use of the road by the public for passage as of right is not inconsistent with the proprietorship of a private individual to the soil of the road. A road, therefore, cannot be said to be the property of Government merely because it is used by the public.

The owner of land abutting on a non-navigable river is entitled to the soil in the bed of the river ad medium filum aquæ.

The words "which are not the property of individuals" in s. 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, are not confined in their application to "all lands wherever situated" but also apply to roads, bridges, beds of the sea, lakes, tanks, etc. Similarly, the words "except in so far as any rights of such persons may be established" govern all the previous expressions and not merely lands.

The words "are hereby declared to be the property of Government" in s. 37 of the Code do not take away rights which existed when the section became law, e.g., wanta lands.

SUIT for declaration and injunction.

The plaintiff, Nawab Sardar Narharsingji, was the Thakor of Amod, and his estate or thakarat was descendible according to the rule of lineal primogeniture. He sued for a declaration that he was the full and absolute proprietor of all the roads, tanks and other waste and unoccupied areas situate within the limits of his thakarat lands and of the sites of the roads on the boundaries thereof, and also for an injunction perpetually restraining Government (defendant) from interfering with the plaintiff's rights.

The house of the plaintiff was established as long ago as 1266 A.D. when it was an absolute and independent kingdom. It flourished as such till 1750 A.D., when Damaji Gaekwar overran Gujarat and exacted tributes from the Sovereigns of Gujarat. The plaintiff's kingdom came to be gradually reduced to its present size in 1817 A.D., when it became a tributary State under the overlordship of the Peishwas. The State paid Rs. 8,506-8-0 per annum as jama and Rs. 3,000 per every three years as peshkush to the Peishwas. In 1817 A.D. the rights of the Peishwas were finally transferred to the British Government by the treaty of Poona.

On October 23, 1926, the Government of Bombay issued a Resolution, the effect of which was a denial of the plaintiff's rights as claimed.

It ran thus :—

"The Governor in Council is accordingly pleased to declare that the Government recognise that the Thakors of Amod and Kerwada are the hereditary proprietors of those portions of their estates which are on the udhad tenure and as such subject to the payment, as jama under the Gujarat Taluqdars' Act, of udhad jama and peshkush and that, while certain provisions of the Land Revenue Code and other laws are applicable to such portions, their status in respect thereto differs from that of an 'occupant' under the Land Revenue Code...

"The Governor in Council is not prepared to admit the claims of the Thakors to proprietary rights over roads and tanks in their estates, and he regrets therefore that he is unable to accede to this request."

On November 21, 1927, the plaintiff filed a suit for a declaration and injunction.

The defendant contended inter alia that the allegation of the plaintiff's ownership to roads, tanks and other waste and unoccupied lands was not correct, and that they vested in public and belonged to Government.

At the hearing the disputes between the parties were confined to 244 items distributed over twenty villages belonging to the plaintiff.

Of these, the Government admitted the plaintiff's claim as to some of the items.

Excepting the admitted items, the trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's claim, observing as follows :—

"Applying the principles of 39 Bom. 625 and 48 Bom. 613 to the present case it is clear that whatever may have been the rights of the plaintiff, if any, before the cession of the territory to the British territory in A.D. 1817, these rights ceased to exist from the moment of the cession to the British Government in A.D. 1817 except in so far as any of his rights have been recognized by the British Government."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

K. M. Munshi, with D. V. Patel, and B. S. Patel, for the appellant.

B. G. Rao, Assistant Government Pleader, for the respondent.

DIVANIA*J. This appeal arises in a suit filed by the appellant, who is the Thakor Saheb of Amod in the District of Broach, against the Secretary of State for India in Council. The reliefs prayed for were a declaration that the plaintiff was the full and absolute proprietor of all the roads, tanks and other waste and unoccupied areas within the limits of his estate, and an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with his rights.

The grounds on which the reliefs were sought are shortly these :—The talukdari estate of Amod was a very ancient one descendible according to the rule of primogeniture. Once upon a time the Thakor's ancestors held the gadi of Amod as independent kings but afterwards the Mahomedan and Maratha invasions in Gujarat reduced the size of that kingdom and tributes were exacted from the Thakors of Amod. Before 1817, when the British conquered the territories, the Thakors were paying to the Peshwa a tribute called the annual jama, which was fixed at about Rs. 8,506, as well as a triennial payment of Rs. 3,000 as peshkush. By the treaty of Poona in 1817 the Thakor's estate as well as the other parts of Gujarat came under the British rule, and the Thakor made to the British Government the same payment which he did to the former Government. After the introduction of the British rule various surveys were made of the Amod Taluka in Broach. But in all of them the Thakor's lands, which consisted of contiguous blocks of lands in twenty-two villages in the district, were kept intact and the Thakor was admitted to be the sole owner and full proprietor of the whole area of the lands in his possession subject only to the payment of the jama and the peshkush. At no time was it suggested that the roads, tanks and other waste lands in these areas belonged to the Government and the Thakor's proprietary rights over them were not disputed. In 1871 when the Broach Talukdars' Relief Act (XV of 1871) was passed, the Amod estate was put under the management of a Talukdari Settlement Officer, and during that management the first regular survey came to be made. At that time the suit lands had been distributed in three different talukas in the Broach District, and although Government officers tried to assert the rights of the Crown on all the unoccupied areas in the Thakor's estate, those contentions were ultimately given up. After the passing of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act in 1888 a regular detailed survey of all the lands of the Thakor's estate was made and concluded in about 1914. Some time after that, the revenue authorities took steps to cancel the entries in the survey records relating to waste areas in his estate. The plaintiff made several representations to the Government, which appointed a committee and finally decided by a Government Resolution of the Revenue Department dated August 25, 1926, that Government did not admit the plaintiff's claim to the proprietary rights over the roads and tanks in his estate. This Government Resolution, according to the plaint, afforded the cause of action for the present suit for a declaration of the plaintiff's title to roads, tanks and all the waste areas in his estate.

The defendant in his written statement denied the plaintiff's allegations that the suit lands were of the plaintiff's ownership and that they were in his possession or enjoyment. It was contended that the roads and tanks in dispute vested in the public and that all the lands in dispute belonged to the Government. It was further stated that the suit was barred by limitation.

On these pleadings the material issues raised were whether the plaintiff proved that he was the owner of the suit lands except those which were admitted by the defendant; whether the orders passed in the Government Resolution of August 25, 1926, relating to the suit lands were legal and proper; and whether the suit was in time.

Voluminous evidence, oral as well as documentary, has been led by both the parties. Before dealing with the evidence it is necessary to describe the nature of the estate held by the Thakors of Amod. There is no doubt that the Amod gadi was one of the old estates enjoyed by the Thakors of Amod since several centuries. The first authentic record to which we have been referred is the treaty of Surat in 1775 between the East India Company and Raghoba Peshwa of Poona printed in volume VII of Aitchison's Treaties. By art. 9 of this treaty Raghoba Peshwa assigned the revenues of Amod and all its districts, among other territories, to the East India Company for meeting the charges of military forces with which he was to be assisted. Thereupon Raghoba ordered the Zamindar of Amod to pay his revenues to the Company. Thereafter in 1782 by a subsequent treaty the East India Company re-transferred those territories to the Peshwa. Just before the Government of the Peshwa was overthrown, some of the territories belonging to that Government including Amod were transferred by the treaty of Poona in 1817 to the East India Company, and the Thakor once more came under the suzerainty of the East India Company and thereafter of the British Crown. At the date of this transfer the Thakor of Amod was paying a tribute for his lands which were known as the lands of wanta tenure. (For a judicial exposition of this tenure see Dolasang Bhavsang v. The Collector of Kaira.<sup>1</sup>) The nature of this tenure is very important for the purpose of deciding the questions involved in this litigation. It is, therefore, necessary to see before proceeding further what exactly is meant by the term "wanta". "Wanta" means a share and a "wantadar" means a sharer. The term was applied to a part of the lands held in absolute proprietorship by old Rajput Chiefs of Gujarat. The Mahomedans, after their invasion, deprived them of all but one-fourth share in their lands. That one-fourth share was allowed to be retained by them in consideration of keeping peace and order in their villages. These lands, which were retained by the former chiefs, became their wanta and continued to remain their absolute property, while the remaining three-fourths share called talpad became the property of the then Government. This proportion of shares, however, was not long preserved. A powerful wantadar would from time to time seize talpad lands and add them to his own wanta; a weak wantadar might lose a part of his wanta by encroachments of the holders of talpad lands; while a needy wantadar might part with his lands by alienation to others. In a majority of cases, the wantadars, or the Thakors as they were called, paid quit rent or salami as it was called to the Government. After the introduction of the British Government some wantadars allowed their wanta lands to be numbered and assessed for the payment of salami under the Summary Settlement Act (VII of 1863), while others continued to make a payment in lump for all their wanta lands. This payment was called udhad jamabandi, i.e. payment of revenue in lump, and the wanta was called udhad salami wanto. It is important to note that wanta is a characteristic of lands and not of the person who holds them. There is a class of landholders in Gujarat who are known from early British times as talukdars (the name seems to have been borrowed from the description of landed proprietors in Upper India who were called talukdars) and the lands held by them as such are known as lands of talukdari tenure. According to the Bombay Survey and Settlement Manual, Vol. I, "the leading characteristic of talukdari tenure is that a talukdar's estate is held neither in gift from the Crown (i.e. alienated), nor in occupancy (i.e. unalienated), but with full proprietary rights antedating the advent of the British rule and including the ownership of lands, minerals and trees." This description would also apply to wanta lands, but a talukdar and a wantadar are not convertible terms, as wanta holders are generally but not invariably talukdars. The Thakor of Amod is a wantadar as well as a talukdar. His holdings were originally in one taluka of the Broach District, but later on they were distributed in three talukas of Amod, Jambusar and Wagra of the same District. The total area of the Amod wanta estate is 14,567 acres and thirty-one gunthas for which the Thakor is paying to the Government Rs. 9,451-13-5 as udhad jama with peshkush. The lands in dispute in the suit are roads, tanks, village sites, creeks, river beds and other waste lands, all known as kharaba in the revenue phraseology. They comprise 244 items with a total area of 758 acres and 15 gunthas distributed in twenty-two villages. The largest compact area out of the suit lands is one big survey No. 354 which is sub-divided into 201 numbers and comprises an area of 5711 acres, 22 gunthas.

It is clear that whatever rights the Thakors of Amod might have enjoyed in pre-British days, they would not enjoy them under the British rule unless they were regranted to them after the commencement of the British rule in 1817 : Secretary of State for India v. Bai Rajbai<sup>1</sup> and Vajesingji v. Secretary of State for India.<sup>2</sup> It is clear on the evidence that the British Government did not recognize the Thakor of Amod as a chief paying tribute and holding his lands under a political tenure. The payment was regarded as of a civil nature, and under the judgment of the civil Court (exhibit No. 40) in 1819 the peshkush paid by the Thakor of Amod was treated as payment of a civil and not of a political nature and therefore enforceable in a civil Court. The status of the Thakor since 1817 can be described as that of a talukdar holding lands from the Government, neither as alienated or unalienated but of a peculiar type by which wanta lands were held in proprietorship for which a lump payment by way of revenue for all the lands was made to the Government. It appears that in 1863 an attempt was made by Government officers to realize this lump payment proportionately on the several lands held by the Thakor in different villages, but it was subsequently given up and the Thakor continued to pay his jama in a fixed lump sum for the whole of his estate. From 1865 the payment of peshkush, which was formerly triennial, was made annual. One important fact may be mentioned here that the lands of the Thakor, which were shown as wanta in the Government records since the advent of the British rule, were in 1867 entered in the revenue records under the heading of "Government lands appertaining to lump jamabandi". The Thakor protested against the change in nomenclature, and requested that they should be shown as wanta. The Government did not grant the Thakor's request but expressly stated that the Thakor's right of ownership of those lands did not stand to suffer thereby (exhibit No. 178).

We will now deal with the lands in dispute as they were treated since the British rule in the chronological order. In 1819 there was a survey of the Amod area which at that time included the three villages of Amod, Wadia and Ranipura, by an officer named Monier Williams, and the survey is known by his name. It was a detailed survey of the talpad lands in Amod area, but the wanta lands of the Thakor in Amod and another village named Buva were shown only by their boundaries in what is known as gol mapni or round survey. Exhibit No. 41 is the register prepared according to that survey. The area of the arable as well as non-arable lands of talpad was shown as 1051 kumbhas and 98 malas (100 kumbhas = 95 acres roughly). This area comprises 864 kumbhas and 55 malas arable, and 187 kumbhas and 45 malas non-arable or waste lands. The wanta of the Thakor was shown as 5,300 kumbhas and four malas. The arable and non-arable portions in the wanta were not separately shown, but only the total area was shown as including cultivable lands, village sites, roads, ponds, ditches, hollow lands, etc., and they were all said to form part of the wanta. They were not shown as belonging to the talpad, i.e. to the Government. Some other villages, where the Thakor's wanta lands were also situated, were surveyed in detail. But in Amod and Buva the wanta lands were only indicated by boundaries, and some big roads and kharabas, which came to notice, were mentioned therein (see the deposition of Gordhandas, exhibit 446).

Under s. 5 of Regulation II of 1814 a revenue register known as kayam kharda was required to be kept by the authorities. Exhibits Nos. 43, 44 and 46 are abstracts from these registers for 1829, 1831 and 1832. In 1829 the arable lands in the talpad portion are shown as 887 kumbhas and 96 malas and the talpad waste lands as 176 kumbhas and 46 malas both totalling 1064 kumbhas and 96 malas. The arable and non-arable portions of the wanta were not mentioned separately as was done for talpad or sarkari lands, but the total wanta was shown as 5300 kumbhas and 4 malas, i.e. the same area as appeared in the survey register of 1819. In 1832 the area of wanta lands seems to have increased as it is shown in lump as 6,033 kumbhas and 50 malas including waste lands. The details of the kharaba lands in talpad were given but not of the wanta. The next document is the kharda register of Amod of the year 1852-53. It is an important Government record in which for the first time we have got a detailed statement of all the arable and kharaba lands in the talpad as well as the wanta portions of Amod. Exhibit No. 45 is an extract from that register showing the non-arable lands in the talpad and the wanta. Column 2 contains the description of the lands, and column 3 states whether it is Government land belonging to the village, or wanta land having its assessment fixed in lump. Column 4 contains a description of the purpose for which the land was used in the case of talpad land, while it simply shows the name of the Thakor in the case of wanta lands. Roads in the talpad portions were shown as passage or public passage while roads in wanta are simply mentioned as in the wanta of the Thakor. The total kharaba in the talpad comes to 91 kumbhas and 40½ malas while that in wanta is 1873 kumbhas and 43 malas, which is subsequently corrected as 1846 kumbhas and 35 malas as 27 kumbhas and 8 malas were removed in arable portion. This register is from time to time corrected and made up to

Its importance for our purpose is that roads, ponds and all other non-arable lands constituting the kharaba in the wanta were shown in detail under the name of the Thakor of Amod and as part of the wanta as contrasted with roads, etc. belonging to the Government. Another important thing to note about this exhibit is the endorsement made by the talati in the register on March 16, 1871, that land measuring seven kumbhas and eighteen malas was taken for road from the Thakor's land. The compensation thereof having been paid, the land was deleted from the wanta kharaj (waste) land and entered as Government land.

As stated above, the area of Amod included the villages of Amod, Wadia and Ranipura and only a boundary survey thereof was made in 1819. In 1865 the Thakor requested the survey authorities to make a detailed survey of the same by showing the three villages separately and deducting the kharaba portion of the wanta from its arable portion. Exhibit No. 493 is a reply of the survey officer stating that the survey department was willing to undertake the work if the expenses were paid by the Thakor. But nothing further seems to have been done in the matter.

In the same year the Bombay Survey and Settlement Act (I of 1865) was enacted. Section 4 empowered the Government to direct extension of a survey to any part of the Presidency for the settlement of land revenue and also to record and preserve proprietary and other rights connected with the soil. Under s. 34 the revenue management of an estate not belonging to the Government may be temporarily taken over by the Government. By s. 49 a survey could be extended to alienated villages for defining the village boundaries and for other purposes on the application of the holder. This Act did not strictly apply to wanta lands paying revenue in a fixed lump sum, its object being as stated in the preamble to equalise the assessment of lands. But it appears that in 1871 when the Broach Talukdars' Relief Act (India Act XV of 1871) was passed, the Thakor's estate was placed, and it remained from 1872 to 1896, under the management of a Talukdari Settlement Officer who asked the survey department to undertake a survey of that estate under the Act of 1865. The survey was then being conducted in the Broach District by Mr. Beyts, who was the Superintendent of Survey and Revenue Assessment in Gujarat, and it is called Beyts Survey after him. He enquired into the assessment rates in the Amod taluka and made a long report, an extract of which is exhibit No. 409. He expressed his opinion that roads in the wanta undoubtedly belonged to the State and that it was unnecessary to enquire about it. As to village sites and tanks, he expressed his opinion as follows :—

"My impression is, and I would advance it with much deference, that no desire to oblige these Thakors will be found an adequate motive for a retrogressive step of the nature which the Talukdari Settlement Officer is inclined to support. It is one thing to treat ancient rights that have never been laid aside with tenderness, and another to create antiquated privileges of which no public necessity can be advanced as the excuse.

"The wantadars, big and small, should be told, briefly and firmly, that they as well as their cultivators will not be disturbed in what they possess. The usufruct of the village site, its temple, its field of ease, and tank, belongs undoubtedly to the whole community, and the property is by the common law of the land vested in the Sovereign."

It is pertinent to note here that his view about the village site in the wanta was not accepted by Government which directed that the right or otherwise of the Thakor to village sites should not be in any way taken up or decided by the revenue survey.

Exhibit 516 is the summary and description of the talpad as well as wanta lands at Amod in 1878 according to the revenue survey conducted by Mr. Beyts. Exhibit 512 is a similar summary in the same year of the compact and big wanta survey No. 354 of the Thakor in Amod. The areas of the lands in this and subsequent records are henceforth entered in acres and gunthas. In exhibit No. 516 the total area of the numbered lands (362), both arable and kharaba portions in the talpad and wanta was shown as 6748 acres and 4 gunthas, out of which 287 acres and 16 gunthas is the kharaba of the whole village, the remaining 6460 acres and 20 gunthas being the cultivable portion. To this total of 6748 acres and 4 gunthas is added the area of 370 acres and 28 gunthas which comprised unnumbered waste lands like village sites, creek and roads. The grand total of all the lands is 7118 acres and 32 gunthas. Survey No. 354 of the Thakor is included in the numbered lands shown in exhibit 516, and its total area is separately shown in exhibit 512 as 5711 acres and 22 gunthas out of which 238 acres and 6 gunthas is the kharaba area of that number. This latter area included roads, ponds, wells, creek, cemetery, building site (of the village of Wadia) etc. Thus the roads and other non-arable portions of survey No. 354 were shown not as part of any unnumbered talpad kharaba lands measuring 370 acres and 28 gunthas in exhibit 516 but as part of the wanta owned by the Thakor. Another material point to note is that the village site of 64 acres and 6 gunthas, which is the site of the town of Amod, was shown in 1878 as the unnumbered Government land on the opinion of Mr. Beyts that village sites did not belong to the Thakor. But as stated above, that opinion was not accepted by the Government, and the claim of the Thakor to that village site, which was put forth by him in a petition to the Government in 1883, was at last accepted in 1897, and an endorsement was, therefore, made in exhibit 516 on December 23, 1903, entering the order of the Government to separate that area from the talpad portion and to include it in the Thakor's wanta. Since then the Thakor's right to the village site of Amod town has been accepted, and it is not, therefore, questioned in this suit. The decision of the Government stating the grounds on which the village site was held to be Thakor's is not on the record of this suit. It is, however, referred to in exhibit No. 66 as having been made in 1897. The Thakor's petitions in 1883 and 1894 are on the record as Appendix 2 to a printed memorial to the Government (exhibit 184) in which he pressed his claim for the village site of Amod and contested the Government demand for an additional salami of two annas in a rupee on his lands. Exhibit No. 185 is also the application by the Thakor in which the history of the dispute is given. Both requests were temporarily turned down by a Government Resolution of December 15, 1883, which contained, however, two important statements that the Thakor's title to the waste lands held by his ancestors in 1818 and 1819 must be admitted and the excess lands should be subjected to a quit rent of two annas in a rupee and that the question of the proprietorship of wanta sites was not between Government and the

A. C. J. Thakor but between the Thakor and the villagers who disputed his claim.
 1940 It may be noted here that this added assessment of two annas per rupee, which — was levied according to the recommendation of Mr. Beyts and the Thakor's NARHAR- request about which was turned down, was abolished in 1888, and the amount SINGJI levied was refunded to the Thakor (exhibit 182). Thus the opinion of ISHVARISINGJI Mr. Beyts about the ownership of the village site as well as the liability of the
 v. Thakor to pay additional assessment for the alleged encroachment of Govern-
 SECRETARY ment lands and their inclusion in the wanta was not accepted, and the Thakor
 OF STATE was allowed to remain in possession of all his wanta lands held by him at that — time without any addition in his udhad jamabandi. The same exhibit in Divatia J. Appendix 4 contains an order by the Collector in 1885 in a dispute about the — ownership of a road in the wanta. It was held that the road belonged to the Thakor who could close it altogether if he liked.

We now come to two enactments which have a material bearing on the questions before us. In 1879, the previous laws relating to the land revenue administration were codified in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, and in 1888 the Gujarat Talukdars' Act was passed for the revenue administration of the estates held by talukdars in Gujarat. The term "talukdar" was described as including, among other persons, a Thakor, and it was further described to include any class of holders of unalienated estates upon which the land revenue is fixed by a lump assessment to whom the Government extends the provisions of part II of the Act. That part in s. 4 authorised the Government to direct a revenue or a revised revenue survey of any talukdari estate under the provisions of the Bombay Land Revenue Code applicable to such surveys. Section 5 authorised the preparation by the survey officer of a settlement register containing several specified particulars. Under ss. 6 and 7 disputes concerning matters to be entered in the settlement register were to be determined by the survey officer. The register was to be corrected from time to time by that officer or the Collector, but no order or decision by the survey officer or Collector was conclusive in a civil suit between the parties. Under s. 8 no suit lay against the Government to set aside any decision or order of the survey officer or Collector. Then, by s. 33 certain sections of the Bombay Land Revenue Code were excluded from application to an estate to which this Act applied. Section 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not one of the excluded sections, and it, therefore, applies, and is mainly relied on by the defendant in this suit. The word "talukdar" was to be substituted for the word "occupant", and the words "talukdari holding" for the word "occupancy" in the Bombay Land Revenue Code in so far as it applied to talukdari estates.

To resume the thread of the narrative, a detailed crop register (pahani patrak) of cultivated as well as uncultivated lands of the Thakor's estate in Amod was prepared in 1886-90 when it was under the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer. It was not prepared by the Government Officers but by the officers of the estate. It is exhibit 160 and it contains a description of the nature of the lands, their area, names of tenants, and the nature of the crops. The area of the cultivated and waste portions of each number is separately given. The cultivated portion is described as either darbari, i.e. belonging to the Thakor, or inami, i.e. given to a person in gift by the Thakor. The uncultivated portion is described as waste land in column 4. At the end of the register all the roads situated in the wanta portion were described with their area. Exhibits 168 and 172 are similar registers for the other two villages of Wadia and Ranipura. Between 1898 and 1904 the survey department conducted a revision survey of Government lands in which the old measurements were mostly confirmed. In 1904 there was correspondence (exhibit 559) between the Thakor and the Mamlatdar of Amod about a road through the Thakor's wanta land from the town of Amod to the burning ground outside. The Mamlatdar thanked the Thakor for giving his thirty feet land for the road and assured him that when the road was diverted and the land fell into disuse, the Thakor would have the right over the same. It stated further that so long as the road existed, it would be used for public purposes and there should be no obstruction from the Thakor in the thirty feet road. In 1911, 2 acres and 38 gunthas out of the roads of the wanta in the Thakor's survey No. 354 were acquired for constructing a railway and compensation at the rate of Rs. 160 per acre was given to him (exhibit 173). Witness Gordhandas (exhibit 446) speaks of the area acquired as gochar or pasture land, but exhibit 173 describes it as a part of road. In the same year the Government granted the Thakor's request to separate the villages of Wadia and Ranipura from the Amod area, and since then they are shown separately from Amod.

In 1912, the survey department began the preparation of a detailed survey of the Thakor's estate under the provisions of s. 4 of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act for the purpose of compilation of the settlement register. The Thakor was unwilling to have his estate surveyed as he was afraid that if his wanta measured more than what it was in the survey of 1874, he would be deprived of the excess, but the Survey Settlement Officer assured him that he would not be deprived of any excess over the recorded area (exhibit 424). Soon after the survey began, the question arose as to how the roads and tanks in the wantas of the talukdars were to be shown. The Assistant Survey Settlement Officer, Khan Bahadur P. R. Mehta, in his letter of April 26, 1913, (exhibit 71), expressed his opinion thus:—In the previous kayam kharda the tanks were shown at the end of the general summary of the village lands and, therefore, they appeared as Government unassessed unalienated lands. However, small tanks when they are situated in the middle of the wantas or do not adjoin unalienated lands were the property of the wantadars and should be shown as such. As to roads, he divided them in three classes, (a) a small road beginning and ending in wanta, (b) a public road passing from one village to another, and (c) a road running on the boundary of a wanta. He was of opinion that the roads of class (a) should be included in the wanta. The other roads should not be included but the trees growing on half of these roads on the wanta side should be shown as the property of the wantadars because of the past practice. Roads passing through wantas should not be shown as of wantadars as otherwise they would obstruct and try to close them. In the next year, registers known as Jamabandi Feisal Patrahs for Wadia, Ranipura and the village site of Amod were prepared (exhibits 208 to 211). The settlement registers were not ready for nearly ten years, and were completed in 1923. Exhibit 395 is the settlement register pertaining to the whole area comprised in the big survey No. 354 which included Wadia, Ranipura and Amod. In the Wadia register 1726 acres and 34 gunthas and 44 acres and 23 gunthas were shown as darbari, i.e. Thakor's, arable and kharaba lands, respectively, while the village site (16 acres and 8 gunthas), river (93 acres and 4 gunthas) and roads (50 acres and 22 gunthas) were not shown as darbari. In the Ranipura register 830 acres and 32 gunthas and 8 acres and 34 gunthas were shown as darbari arable and kharaba lands, while the village site (4 acres and 17 gunthas), (river 29 acres and 11 gunthas), small roads (36 acres and 22 gunthas) and big roads (10 acres and 29 gunthas) were not shown as darbari. Lastly in the Amod register 1631 acres and 13 gunthas and 113 acres and 13 gunthas were shown as darbari arable and kharaba lands, and the village site (63 acres and 35 gunthas), creek called Batrisi Khadi (13 acres and 5 gunthas) and roads (36 acres and 33 gunthas) were not shown as darbari. It is not explained why the village site of Amod, which was held to be of the Thakor's proprietorship in 1897, was not shown as darbari.

In the meanwhile, the Settlement Commissioner started correspondence at the end of 1922 for re-opening the question about the ownership of the roads in wantas (exhibit 73.) He questioned Khan Bahadur Mehta's opinion about the roads in class (a) being regarded as the property of the Thakor. In the Commissioner's opinion when a road was used by the public for the prescribed term of years, the right of the public became indefeasible. That was also, according to him, the effect of s. 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, where the word "Government" was used as equivalent to the public. So that a public road vested in the Government as trustee for the public. He did not think it necessary to consider whether it was or was not private property at some period in the past. In his opinion all roads used by the public in the wanta should be shown as Government property. As to trees standing on these roads also there was no reason why they should not belong to Government if the roads did. The Revenue Commissioner, N. D., accepted this opinion and cancelled Khan Bahadur Mehta's directions about the roads of class (a) and the trees (exhibit 70). Thereafter, the Collector reported that Khan Bahadur Mehta's directions about the tanks should also be cancelled on the same grounds as those about the trees (except in Amod) and that the previous order of his predecessor in 1915 about the trees be also cancelled. The Commissioner accepted that view and directed that tanks should also be shown as Government property (exhibit 69). The Thakor and other talukdars thereupon raised an agitation against these orders and ultimately Government published a Resolution in 1923 appointing a Committee to consider whether the entries made in village forms lately introduced were detrimental to the rights of talukdars (exhibit 75). The Commissioner, N. D., however, in 1924 recommended to the Government to accept the Collector's view that roads which were not through roads but merely afforded access to none but wanta lands along with the trees thereon should be regarded as the talukdar's. The rest must be held to be Government property (exhibit 74). Finally, on August 25, 1926, Government issued a Resolution giving its decision on the questions before us to this effect :—The Government recognized the Thakor of Amod as the hereditary proprietor of those portions of his wanta estates which were on the udhad tenure and as such subject to the payment of udhad jama and peshkush, but the Government was not prepared to admit the claims of the Thakor to proprietary rights over roads and tanks in his estate. It is this Resolution which is stated by the plaintiff Thakor as his cause of action in the present suit for a declaration and injunction against the Government.

Before beginning the discussion of the evidence it is necessary to deal with the provisions of law which bear on it. The main point of law arising in this suit is the application of s. 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code to the suit lands. Sub-section (1) of that section runs thus :—

“ All public roads, lanes and paths, the bridges, ditches, dikes, and fences, on, or beside, the same, the bed of the sea and of harbours and creeks below high-water-mark, and of rivers, streams, nallas, lakes, and tanks, and all canals, and water-courses, and all standing and flowing water, and all lands wherever situated, which are not the property of individuals, or of aggregate of persons legally capable of holding property, and except in so far as any rights of such persons may be established in or over the same, and except as may be otherwise provided in any law for the time being in force are and are hereby declared to be, with all rights in or over the same, or appertaining thereto, the property of Government ; and it shall be lawful for the Collector, subject to the orders of the Commissioner, to dispose of them in such manner as he may deem fit, or as may be authorized by general rules sanctioned by Government, subject always to the rights of way, and all other rights of the public or of individuals legally subsisting.”

The plaintiff's contention is that the suit lands being his property and his rights over it having been established since ancient times, it is covered by the exception in that section. On the other hand, the defendant's contention is that whatever lands are used by the public are Government lands under s. 37, and that the exception does not apply to such lands. It is necessary, therefore, to construe that section, and in doing so, it would be useful to trace the history of its enactment. The earliest enactment in Bombay with regard to waste lands was s. 59 of Regulation I of 1808 which refers to the practice of making general grants to individuals for bringing waste lands into cultivation. This provision, however, applied to the Island of Salsette alone. Subsequent to that, there was an enactment of a general nature in Bombay Regulation III of 1814. The preamble to that Regulation stated, among other things, that “ the Ruling Power of the provinces now subject to the Government of Bombay has, in conformity to the ancient usages of the country, reserved to itself, and has exercised the actual proprietary right of lands of every description.” Previous to that there was an enactment in the Madras Presidency, Regulation XXXI of 1802, the preamble of which was to the same effect as this Bombay Regulation. The preamble in the Madras Regulation was discussed by the Privy Council in The Collector of Trichinopoly v. Lekkamani.<sup>1</sup> It was observed (p. 309) :—

“ The object of the Reg. XXXI of 1802 was merely the protection of the revenue from invalid lakiraj grants, and to provide for the mode of trying the validity of the titles of persons claiming to hold their lands exempt from the payment of revenue ; it was not intended to confer upon Government any title which did not then exist.”

The preamble in the Bombay Regulation has been considered in two cases of our High Court. Referring to this preamble it has been observed in The

"The correctness of this statement is very questionable. The reports of Elphinstone, Chaplin, Grant Duff, Robertson, and others, indicate very clearly that a large portion of the ryots, and especially the mirasdars, are, according to the ancient usage of the country, proprietors of their estates, subject to the payment of a fixed land-tax to Government. The subject will be found discussed at considerable length in Sooryabhan v. Bukajee and another.<sup>2</sup> But, at any rate, the statement in the preamble of Regulation III of 1814 is consistent with the alienation of its proprietary rights by Government, or with its recognition of the existence of proprietary rights in individuals, in particular instances, whether before or subsequently to the Regulation."

In Babon Mayacha v. Nagu Shrivacha,<sup>3</sup> the history of legislation about Government rights over waste lands in the Bombay Presidency is given at pages 37-39, and reference is made to this preamble as a more ambitious assertion of the proprietary right of the State in lands. It is held that that preamble should receive the same construction as that given to the similar preamble in Madras Regulation XXXI of 1802 by the Privy Council in The Collector of Trichinopoly v. Lekkamani,<sup>4</sup> and the opinion is expressed that "the more moderate proposition (that the proprietary right to waste land is prima facie vested in Government), contained or implied in Bombay Regulations I of 1808, s. 59, and XVII of 1827, s. 7, is reasonable and founded upon truth."

The next provision is contained in s. 7 of Bombay Regulation XVII of 1827. It is as follows :—

"Uncultivated land not exempt from assessment may be disposed of, with the Collector's sanction, for the benefit of the revenue.

"Provided, however, that such disposal shall not in any way affect the claim to preference, the right of occupation, or any other rights which individuals may have over such land, as the same may, when contested, be established in a Court of justice."

Thereafter in 1868, so far as the lands in towns and cities were concerned, it was provided by s. 11 of the City Survey Act (IV of 1868) that "in towns and cities all roads and lanes, and all open spaces not in the occupation of any person, and not proved to be the property of any person, vest in Government."

Lastly comes s. 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code in 1879 which embodies almost the same idea in different language. It has been contended on behalf of the defendant that the words "which are not the property of individuals" etc. refer only to "all lands wherever situated", and have no reference to all the previous expressions. That construction seems to us to be erroneous. The words "which are not the property of individuals" etc. would, in our opinion, apply to roads, bridges, beds of the sea, lakes, tanks etc. We do not think that the Legislature could have intended that only lands are capable of being owned by individuals and not roads, bridges, ditches, nallas, lakes, tanks, canals etc. The words "except in so far as any rights of such persons may be established" will also similarly govern all the previous expressions and not merely lands. It is next contended, however, that in any case the words "which are not the property of individuals" etc. do not apply to the opening words of the section, viz., "All public roads, lanes and paths," because the adjective "public" would be inconsistent with private ownership in them. This contention is urged on the basis that roads etc. which are used by the public must be taken to be Government property. But that construction, in our opinion, is based on the erroneous view that there cannot be any public right over private property.

That the existence of a highway or a public road is consistent with the ownership of a private person in the soil can be deduced from the English as well as the Indian law. It is held in Sir John Lede v. Shepherd<sup>1</sup> that by setting out a highway the owner does not part with the property of the soil. In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland<sup>2</sup> it is held as follows (p. 155) :—

"The soil of a highway belongs prima facie to the owner of the land adjoining it. If the land on either side is the property of different owners, each is owner of the soil on his side ad medium filum of the highway. But this ownership is subject to the right of the public to use the highway. Any use of the soil of the highway other than the legitimate use of it for the purposes of a highway is a trespass upon that soil as against the owner to whom it still belongs. These propositions are amply established by judicial decisions."

See also City of London Land Tax Commissioners v. Central London Railway.<sup>3</sup> It is observed in The Law relating to Highways by Glen at page 30 :—

"The owner of the land who dedicates part of it as a public way may enjoy all rights not inconsistent with the dedication."

For distinction between a right of easement and the ownership of a highway see Pratt and Mackenzie's Law of Highways, 18th Edn., p. 2. The law is also summarized in volume XVI of Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham Edition, at pages 240-241, paragraphs 290-291, as follows :—

"The public right in a highway being a right of passage only, an owner who expressly dedicates, or is presumed to have dedicated, land as a public highway retains at common law his property in the soil, and can transfer it by conveyance or lease to others.

"There is a general presumption that the owner of land of whatever tenure adjoining a highway is owner also of the soil of one half of the highway, and a similar presumption arises in the case of a private or occupation road."

Under the Indian law also there is a presumption that a highway, or waste land adjoining thereto, belongs to the owners of the soil of the adjoining land [Nihal Chand v. Azmat Ali Khan.<sup>4</sup>] The site of the road must be presumed to belong to the adjoining proprietors half to one and half to the other up to the middle of the road. Where the property is bounded by a road or a river, the boundary, even if given as the road or the river, is the middle of the road or the river, as the case may be.

It would follow, therefore, that the use of the road by the public for passage as of right is not inconsistent with the proprietorship of a private individual to the soil of road, and that, therefore, a road cannot be said to be the property of the Government because it is used by the public. Moreover, s. 37 uses the words "are hereby declared to be the property of Government." This expression is construed in Secretary of State v. Wasudeo<sup>1</sup> and the relevant remarks are as follows (pp. 460-61) :—

"But it was said that section 37 of the Land Revenue Code was a bar to the right claimed by the respondents. That section, however, has been held by this Court in Hanmantrav v. The Secretary of State for India<sup>2</sup> and in Surannanna v. Secretary of State for India<sup>3</sup> not to take away rights which existed when it became law. No doubt the words in the section are 'are and are hereby declared to be the property of Government;' and there are authorities, according to which, in the case of a law which is in its nature declaratory, 'the argument that it must not be construed so as to take away previous rights is not applicable.' See the judgment of Pollock, C. B., in Attorney-General v. Theobald<sup>4</sup> citing Att.-Gen. v. Marquis of Hertford.<sup>5</sup> But in Harding v. Commissioners of Stamp for Queensland<sup>6</sup> the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in dealing with the argument that the expression 'it is declared' in an enactment is prima facie retrospective, observed that 'the use of the expression "it is declared" to introduce new rules of law is not incorrect, and is far from uncommon. The nature of the Act must be determined from its provisions.' Section 37 itself provides that the ownership of Government, thereby declared, is subject 'to the rights of individuals legally existing.' Before the Land Revenue Code came into force, the law relating to the ownership of such lands was presumably the common law, according to which, 'where the soil is covered by the water forming a river in which the tide does not flow, the soil does of common right belong to the owners of the adjoining land; and there is no case or book of authority to shew that the Crown is of common right entitled to land covered by water, where the water is not running water forming a river, but still water forming a lake' (Per Lord Blackburn in Bristow v. Cormican)<sup>7</sup>. . . Such appropriation to the Khots of the soil must be held to have been made when they were constituted hereditary farmers of the whole village, with the right to bring into cultivation all waste or uncultivated land in the village. Section 37 of the Land Revenue Code declares that Government are the owners of such lands. So they had been before that section became law, and so they are now. But that is not decisive of the right now claimed by Government so as to deprive the respondent Khots of the right acquired by them in virtue of the khotship to cultivate the lands."

In our opinion, these remarks would apply with greater force to the wanted lands of the plaintiff. In this connection we may lastly refer to a decision of our Court in Vinayakrao v. The Secretary of State for India,<sup>8</sup> which is useful for two purposes, namely, the interpretation of s. 37 and the effect of a survey on title to lands. The dispute there was, among other things, about two plots of land, which were part of a village granted in inam to the inamdar. At the time when the village was surveyed, those plots were not given survey numbers, and the lower Court held that they had become part of the village site and belonged to the Government. It was held that s. 61 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code did not empower Government to confiscate any land belonging to an inamdar and confer it on another person, and the mere omission to number a land could not convert it into a village site or take away any existing rights. It was observed by Ranade J. (p. 45) :—

"If at a survey certain lands are not numbered or assessed by reason of their being kharab, it does not follow that the ownership of such land is thereby injuriously affected or curtailed. Numbering or surveying do not by themselves create or destroy rights."

On similar grounds it was held that the bed of a stream in the village also belonged to the inamdar and that the owners of land on both sides were proprietors of the bed of the stream. Parsons J. observed (p. 44) :—

"section 37 deals only with what is not the property of individuals, and can have no application to the bed of a rivulet which flows through the land of any individual, for it would be the property of that individual who owned the land upon its banks."

This decision has an important bearing on the questions involved in this appeal, as the lower Court has based its finding on the entries in the various survey and revenue registers and held that the roads, tanks, etc. in dispute did not belong to the plaintiff, as the survey officers had not given them survey numbers at the various surveys and thereby decided that they did not belong to the plaintiff's estate.

We will now deal with the appreciation of the evidence by the lower Court and the reasons given by it for holding that the plaintiff is not entitled to the declaration sought except as to the items admitted by the defendant.

The learned Judge below seems to be of the opinion that the British Government never accepted the title of the Thakors to the lands in suit from the beginning. He observes that from 1819 the Bombay Government refused to recognize the alleged proprietary rights of the plaintiff's ancestors and their claims as tributary chiefs. That is no doubt true with regard to the Thakor's status as a tributary chief, but there is nothing to show that the Government from the beginning refused to recognize the Thakor as proprietor of all the lands contained in his wanta in the various villages in the Broach District. According to the learned Judge, the fact that the wanta portion of Amod was measured by a round survey only in 1819 by Monier Williams, whereas the rest of the lands at Amod were measured by a detailed survey did not show that the Thakor's title to the wanta was accepted. It is true that that survey was not meant to determine title to any estate. In fact it was not conducted under any legal enactment. But the fact remains that the lands in dispute were shown as forming part of the wanta lands and were comprised in the total area of 5,300 kumbhas and 4 malas forming the wanta portion. It is the plaintiff's case that in all subsequent surveys they have been continued to be shown as part of the wanta although the area of the wanta has somewhat varied from time to time, and that, therefore, the title which his ancestors had from the beginning over them had not been legally taken away by the Government at any time. Exhibit 41 does not say, either expressly or impliedly, that there was any refusal by the Government to recognize the Thakor's title to these lands. The learned Judge further observes that if the plaintiff had been recognized as a tributary chief, his lands in other villages except Amod and Butva would not have been surveyed in detail in 1819. But the plaintiff's claim in the present suit is not based upon his status as a tributary chief. It is admitted that his ancestors ceased to be tributary chiefs holding a political tenure under the British Crown, whatever might have been their ‘ Whenever land has been enjoyed, but not under a deed or writing, wholly or partially exempt from the payment of the public revenue, for more than sixty years in succession by any person, his heirs or others, deriving right from him, such enjoyment, provided it has been under some tenure recognised by the custom of the country in which the land is situated; and more particularly under any of those specified in appendix A (wanta is the first to be included in the list of tenures in appendix A), shall be considered as a sufficient title to the exemption.”

Then it is provided in cl. (3) that—

“ enjoyment of such exemption for twelve years, antecedent to the date when the territory in which the land is situated, came into the possession of the British Government, shall be considered as equivalent to enjoyment for 60 years, in terms of the preceding clause.”

Section 27 provides that—

These provisions were reaffirmed in the subsequent Regulations V and XVII of 1827. Relying upon them the plaintiff contends that all the suit lands being part of the wanta, which was in existence before the Regulation of 1823 came into force, and the wanta having been enjoyed by him from ancient times, his title to all the lands included in the wanta has been affirmed by this Regulation, and since then he has not been legally deprived of his rights to these lands. It may be stated here that the plaintiff accepts the position that if the public has acquired any rights over the suit lands by long user, his rights in them will be subject to the rights in favour of the public, but that, subject to these rights of the public, he continues to be the proprietor of the lands.

The learned Judge below refers to the various surveys from time to time as not supporting the plaintiff's case, and he principally relies upon the remarks of Mr. Beyts in exhibit 409 as clearly repudiating the Thakor's right to the ownership of roads, tanks, etc. But as remarked above, these were only Mr. Beyts's opinions as opposed in some respects to the opinion of the Talukdari Settlement Officer, and his opinions were not wholly accepted by the Government. There is nothing to show that acting upon his opinion the Government decided that the suit lands did not belong to the Thakor. As we have seen above, exhibit 45, which is a Government record of the lands from 1852 to 1874, showed all the wanta lands in detail as of the Thakor. A clear distinction is there made with regard to roads, tanks, etc. in the talpad and in the wanta, and the latter are shown in the name of the Thakor.

The lower Court further relies upon the expression “ Government lump Jamabandi ” as it appears in various Government records against the plaintiff's lands, but there again, as has been shown above, when the plaintiff protested against the use of that expression, it was pointed out to him that it did not imply that any part of the wanta was taken as Government property. On the other hand, the payment of compensation to the Thakor for acquisition of parts of a road in the wanta in 1871 and in 1911 would suggest that the Thakor's title to the roads in the wanta was not disputed by the Government.

Then the learned Judge relies upon the fact that certain roads in the wanta had been constructed, and some repaired, by the local board from 1908 to 1923 under the Local Boards Act. It is true that some of the roads in the wanta were constructed by the local board while some others were only repaired. The evidence does not show the circumstances in which these roads came to be constructed by the local board, but the plaintiff has admitted before us that the roads constructed by the local board in his wanta would now belong to the local board under s. 48 of the Bombay Local Boards Act of 1923 which says that every road, building or other work constructed by a local board shall vest in such local board. But as to the roads which were only repaired by the local board, there is nothing in the Act to vest the ownership of them in the local board. Such power to repair a private road might be implied in s. 50, cl. (n), of that Act.

Then the learned Judge relies upon the contents of a letter, exhibit 493, by the Assistant Survey Superintendent to the plaintiff's ancestors as showing that the latter did not regard kharabas as their property but were anxious to have them separately stated and deducted and to have their estate surveyed. The interpretation put by the learned Judge on this letter is erroneous. What the Thakor really desired was that a survey might be introduced in his villages and the arable lands and the kharabas may be separately shown therein. What he meant was that the former survey was only a round survey and in the new survey the kharaba was to be deducted and separately shown from the arable portion. The letter, exhibit 559 of 1904, has also been erroneously interpreted by the learned Judge. It does not mean that the plaintiff had lost all his right to that road in that year. On the other hand, the letter assures the Thakor that when the road was diverted and the land fell into disuse, the Thakor would have the right over the same, and so long as the road existed, it would be used for public purposes. That rather supports the plaintiff's case than the defendant's.

The learned Judge seems to place much reliance upon exhibit 160 and the other pahani patraks of the Thakor's villages for 1886-87. He treats them as if they were a record of the Government. But that is not so. They were prepared by the officers of the plaintiff's estate which was at that time under the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer. Various lands there were shown under the column "Darbari or Inami" which meant belonging to the Darbar, i.e. the Thakor, or inami, i.e. given in gift by the Thakor to another person. In the principal register, exhibit 160, which relates mainly to the lands comprised in the big wanta survey No. 354, the area of the cultivated and uncultivated portion of each survey number is separately shown at the end of the register. There is a summary of the various roads, creek, and river bed in that wanta. Simply because of the fact that the word "Darbari" is not shown in column 4 against these roads etc., the learned Judge comes to the conclusion that they were not meant to be shown as belonging to the plaintiff's estate. But that is really not so. At the end of the summary, the area of these roads, creeks, etc. is added up as 137 acres and 10 gunthas, and that area is again added to the total area of the lands in that survey number and the grand total is stated as 3904 acres and 34 gunthas, which was the total area of all the lands including the kharaba portions in survey No. 354. There is nothing to show, therefore, that the roads, creek, etc. were admitted as belonging to the Government in this register. On the other hand, the creek known as "Batrisi creek" covering an area of 17 acres and 7 gunthas comprised in this summary has been now admitted before us by the defendant as belonging to the plaintiff.

The learned Judge concludes his appreciation of the evidence as follows (paragraph 76 of the judgment) :—

"It is clear from all these considerations that the plaintiff has no inherent right to the ownership of the suit items either as a tributary chief of the pre-British period or as holder of the Udhad-Jamabandhi wanta, nor have any such extraordinary rights been recognized by the British Government at the time of the survey by Mr. Monier Williams in A.D. 1819 or by Mr. Beyts in 1864-74 or in the subsequent surveys referred to by plaintiff in his plaint."

In our opinion, the learned Judge has appreciated the evidence from a wrong stand-point. It is not the question whether the various survey officers have recognized the Thakor's right to the suit lands. The real question is whether that right has ever been definitely negatived by any decision of the Government. The opinions and decisions of the survey and revenue officers as well as the entries in the survey records have, as has been shown before, no legal force as decisions of the Government negativing the Thakor's right. The really important point is that the suit lands have been included in the wanta portions as described in the revenue and survey records. It was not till the time of the detailed survey that the question arose as to how the roads, tanks, etc. were to be shown in the settlement registers. Even then Khan Bahadur Mehta was of the opinion that small roads beginning and ending in the wanta should be included in the wanta, and that small tanks situated in the middle of the wanta and not adjoining unalienated lands were also the property of the wantadars. He was also of the opinion that the trees growing on half of the road on the wanta side were the property of the wantadars. In this practice he was supported by the Collector of Broach, but his opinion was later on overruled by the Commissioner, N. D., and it was then that the matter was taken up by the Government which finally issued a Government Resolution negativing the Thakor's right to the roads and tanks in the wanta. That shows that there was difference of opinion even among Government officers themselves as to whether the suit lands should be regarded as part of the wanta or not, and ultimately the view prevailed that those portions of the wanta which were used by the public should be held as belonging to the Government. But it left out of account the nature of the right which the wanta-holders claimed in their lands from very ancient times and which was accepted by the British Government.

It is necessary, therefore, to examine the legal basis of the right of the wanta-holders since the advent of the British rule. •A talukdari wanta in Gujarat is neither an alienated nor an unalienated holding. It is a peculiar estate which continues to be the property of its holder under the British rule as it was in pre-British dynasties from ancient times. It was subjected to legislation from time to time. Bombay Regulation I of 1823 recognized the holder of the wanta as having a legal right to the lands comprised therein on payment of the fixed amount of revenue, and under s. 27 of that Regulation the possession of these wanta lands for thirty years was regarded as proof of a sufficient right of property in the same. This would show that the British Government recognized the wanta tenure and the right of its holder to the lands included in it. These land-holders found themselves in very embarrassed circumstances by sales and mortgages of their estates, and at one time their condition became so grave, especially in the Ahmedabad District, that Government in order to save them from extinction thought fit to give legislative protection to this class of very old landed proprietors who had passed through many vicissitudes partly on account of successive conquests of their territories but mostly on account of their own improvidence. The enactment of the Ahmedabad Talukdars Act (Bom. VI of 1862) was the first attempt by the British Government to ameliorate their condition by taking over for a limited period the management of their indebted estates, exempting the holders of such estates from arrests, providing for a scheme for the settlement of their debts and disabling them from incurring fresh debts binding on their estates during the management. It was probably thought that such legislative interference with a class of persons who were really absolute proprietors of their estates could not be justified unless they were described as having a lesser interest than proprietorship, and the preamble of the Act, therefore, began with stating that "the Talukdari estates are now only held on leasehold tenure determinable at the pleasure of Government." This recital, besides being incorrect, was inconsistent with the provisions of the Act itself, especially s. 20, under which they were meant to be restored to their position of absolute proprietors of their estates on the termination of the management. An interesting account of how they were purposely described as lease-holders for the purpose of saving them from the clutches of their creditors and thereafter to re-invest them with their real proprietary rights is to be found at pages 11 to 15 of Peile's Account of the Talookdars in the Ahmedabad Zillah (Selection No. CVI—New Series). This part of the preamble was doubted by our High Court in The Collector of Ahmedabad v. Samaldas Bechardas.<sup>1</sup> It has also been criticized in a judgment of our High Court quoted at p. 91 in Waghela Rajsanji v. Shekh Masludin<sup>2</sup> as being notoriously contrary to historical truth and not consistent with the concluding portion of s. 7 of the Act. The implied approval with which it is quoted in Nathuram v. Secretary of State<sup>3</sup> is not justified in view of this criticism.

In 1871, a similar Act (India Act XV of 1871) with a similar object was passed for the Talukdars of Broach which was, however, repealed by the Broach and Kaira Incumbered Estates Act (India Act XIV of 1877) which was in turn largely repealed by the Broach and Kaira Incumbered Estates Act (XXI of 1881). The object of this Act was also to relieve the impecunious talukdars by taking over the management of their estates and the settlement of their debts. Finally, the Gujarat Talukdars' Act (Bom. VI of 1888) was enacted and applied to all the talukdars of Gujarat. As their estates could not be strictly regarded either as alienated or unalienated, a doubt arose as to the applicability of the Bombay Land Revenue Code to them, and its preamble, therefore, stated that the Act was enacted to remove those doubts. As the Record of Rights Act did not apply to talukdari lands, a provision similar to that Act was made in s. 5 for the preparation of settlement registers and certain provisions of the Bombay Land Revenue Code were, by s. 33, excluded from application to talukdari lands.

This account will make it clear that a talukdar is neither an inamdar nor an occupant of his lands. His wanta is a freehold and not a leasehold. What was paid formerly as tribute and peshkush as a political levy is now converted into a fixed amount in lump as a revenue payment, but his proprietary right over all the lands comprised in the wanta was affirmed at the commencement of the British rule and has not since been taken away by any legal process.

In 1878 Mr. Beyts considered it unnecessary to enquire into the claims of the Thakor over roads and grazing grounds in face of alleged wholesale encroachments on Government waste lands. But in 1912 the Survey Settlement Officer assured the Thakor that he would not be deprived of any excess if his wanta measured more than the recorded area (exhibit 424). Thus the recorded area which, as we have shown above, originally included the roads, tanks, etc., had been accepted as the Thakor's property.

Conflicting opinions were no doubt held by Government officers from time to time as to the nature of the right. Officers like Mr. Beyts were inclined to treat some of the rights which the talukdars claimed for their wanta lands, for example, rights to village sites, as "antiquated privileges of which no public necessity can be advanced as an excuse." Some Talukdari Settlement Officers were of the opinion that their ancient rights should be respected. But the tendency to treat them more like holders of unalienated lands than absolute proprietors of their wantas was apparent on the part of zealous revenue officers. That whatever was used by the public inside the wantas belonged to the community and therefore to the Government, became a common belief in the revenue department. The distinction between the rights of the public and the rights of the Government and the capacity of the public to acquire rights over private as much as over Government property were not taken into consideration in forming their opinions.

We will now deal with the various items in suit in the light of the evidence and the legal position as discussed above. Originally there were 244 items in suit distributed over twenty villages. During the pendency of the suit, however, the defendant admitted the plaintiff's title to several items out of them in the statement, exhibit 198, which was in reply to the plaintiff's statement, exhibit 189, containing the list of the properties claimed by the plaintiffs. One or two more items were admitted by the Government by their statement, exhibit 278. In their statement, exhibit 279, the Government conditioned some of their admissions in some of the former items by stating that those lands were subject to the right of the public to the use of them. But the learned Judge below did not accept the subsequent conditional retraction, and this statement, therefore, may be left out of account. It appears that by their statement, exhibit 198, Government admitted 98 items out of 244. Out of the items 1 to 60 in Amod, Government admitted items 1 and 3 to 46 by exhibit 198. Item No. 2 is a big creek known as Batrisi Khadi, covering an area of 13 acres and 5 gunthas. The learned Judge held that the plaintiff had not proved his title over the same, and relying on the Feisal Patrak, exhibit No. 255, he held that it belonged to the Government. The plaintiff's case is that the area of this creek is included in the originally recorded area of the wanta and that he has also been in possession and enjoyment of it from the beginning. He further points out that the area of 197 acres and 15 gunthas shown in the Feisal Patrak, exhibit No. 255, referred to another creek situated to the south-west and not the Batrisi creek, and that the lower Court was under a clear misapprehension in confusing it with the creek mentioned in that exhibit. He produced evidence to show that the villagers had passed leases to him from time to time for parts of the Batrisi Khadi and that fees were levied by the Thakor from the people for the use of earth from the Khadi. It is, however, unnecessary to refer to this evidence in detail as during the course of the argument before us the learned Assistant Government Pleader on behalf of the defendant conceded the plaintiff's title to this Khadi. Items Nos. 3 to 46, which have been conceded by the Government in the lower Court, are roads for passage situated inside the survey numbers in the wanta. The reason for making this concession seems to be this :—In the latest survey the survey officers included small roads of passage which ran through the fields in the respective survey numbers themselves, but for big roads they did not give any survey numbers but showed them between the numbered fields. These latter roads were called hade pakadela marag, i.e. boundary roads. As the plaintiff's title to all the roads in the wanta was denied, he prayed for relief for the passages situated in the fields, and the defendant conceded the plaintiff's title to all the small roads for passage through the numbered fields. Such roads in the Amod area are items Nos. 3 to 46. But Government did not concede the plaintiff's right with regard to the boundary roads even though both sides of them were flanked by fields inside the wanta. These latter roads are items Nos. 47 to 59. Item No. 47 is what is known as the Achhod Road situated in survey No. 354. In exhibit No. 45, the Government register of lands for 1852, this road is shown under item No. 643 in the wanta land in the name of the Thakor and not shown for public passage such as the roads in the talpad area were shown. In the plan, exhibit No. 92, which shows Beyts's survey, this road is shown as in survey No. 354, but it is not given any number. In exhibit No. 512, the register for 1878, it is included among the roads of the total area of 50 acres and 22 gunthas situated in the kharaba of the wanta. In exhibit No. 395, the settlement register of 1923, this road is included in the passage, 36 acres and 33 gunthas, but not shown as the plaintiff's. It is conceded on behalf of the plaintiff before us that people have used this road for passage at least from 1852, but he says that it was originally a part of his holding, and therefore, s. 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code does not apply to it and make it the property of the Government, even though people might have acquired rights of way over it. There does not seem to be any clear evidence whether this road was repaired by any

A. C. J. local body or by Government. But it is contended that even if it were repaired 1940 by the local board, it would not vest in the local board for that reason.
 — Item No. 48 is a road from Amod to Khar. The same arguments urged NARHAR- for item No. 47 apply to this road also except that it was not shown in Beyts's SINGJI survey. Item No. 49 is a road from Khar joining the road in item No. 48, ISEVARSINGJI and item No. 50 is another road. The same arguments apply to these two
 v. roads as those urged for item No. 48. Item No. 51 is a narrow passage for SECRETARY going to agricultural area, and it is part of a long old road known as Amod
 OF STATE Jambusar road. It is shown as item No. 790 in exhibit No. 45 as belonging — Divatia J. to the Thakor's wanta. Items Nos. 52, 53 and 54 are continuations of the — road in item No. 51 and the same arguments apply to them. Item No. 55 is a road between two survey numbers of the wanta, and item No. 56 is also a similar road. The defendant's advocate has admitted the plaintiff's title to these two items, Nos. 55 and 56, during the course of argument before us.

As to items Nos. 57, 58 and 59, the plaintiff has not pressed his case before us, as item No. 57 is outside survey No. 354, item No. 58 is a public road to Broach constructed by the local board, and item No. 59 is the Palej road also constructed by the local board. It may be noted here that it was a part of the road in item No. 58 which was acquired in 1871 and compensation therefor was paid to the Thakor as stated before. Item No. 60 is the railway line and it is not claimed by the plaintiff.

We next come to the disputed items in the village of Wadia. This village is a part of the big survey No. 354 and the kharaba area thereof is 204 acres and 17 gunthas. Kharaba lands out of this area measuring 44 acres and 23 gunthas have been admitted by the defendant as of the plaintiff's ownership in exhibits 198 and 278. The remaining items are the village site, the roads and the river. The village site measures 16 acres and 8 gunthas. The defendant contended in the trial Court that it did not belong to the plaintiff, although, as we have seen above, the plaintiff's title to the village site of Amod had been admitted by the Government long ago and was not put in issue in this suit. The plaintiff's case is that this village site stands on a better footing than the village site of Amod. In exhibit No. 45 of 1852 it is item No. 981 shown as belonging to the Thakor. In Beyts's survey of 1878, its area, which was then 6 acres and 10 gunthas, was shown as situated in the wanta. It was in 1913 that this village was separated from Amod. In the settlement register, exhibit No. 395, however, the village site was not shown as the plaintiff's kharaba. There is no reason why this village site should not belong to the plaintiff just as the village site of Amod. But it is not necessary to pursue this point further as the defendant's advocate finally conceded the plaintiff's title to it before us. As to the roads which cover an area of 50 acres and 20 gunthas, they are items Nos. 938 and 948 in exhibit No. 45 of 1852. They are known as Amod Wadia road and Amod Bozadra road. They are referred to by the plaintiff's witness Purshottam, exhibit No. 389, in paragraphs 79 to 86 of his deposition. These roads would also belong to the plaintiff subject to the rights of the public for passage, if any. The last item in Wadia is the area of the river bed comprising 93 acres and 4 gunthas. This item will be treated separately at the end as the plaintiff does not claim it as part of his wanta but on his rights under the common law.

Then with regard to the plaintiff's lands in the village of Ranipura, the defendant has admitted the plaintiff's title to items Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 6 out of the total area of 8 acres and 34 gunthas. Item No. 6, which is a local board bungalow, has been admitted by the plaintiff as not belonging to him. Items Nos. 3 and 5, which are a road and a burial place, had been conditionally admitted by the defendant in exhibit No. 279, but the learned Judge has held them as unconditionally belonging to the plaintiff. The remaining items are the village site of Ranipura measuring 4 acres and 17 gunthas. This village was populated on its present village site after 1917 when the former village site situated in another place of the wanta was abandoned. It is clear on the evidence that this new village was populated on the plaintiff's fields in the wanta, and during the course of arguments before us the defendant's advocate conceded the plaintiff's ownership over it. There is another item in dispute, namely, the bed of the river measuring 29 acres and 11 gunthas which we will take up separately at the end. The roads in Ranipura, measuring 36 acres and 22 gunthas and 10 acres and 24 gunthas, stand almost on the same footing as the roads in Wadia, with the general condition applying to both of them, namely, that the portions of these roads constructed by the local board have been admitted by the plaintiff as vesting in the local board, and the plaintiff has further admitted the right of the public of passage over them if such right is proved.

These three villages comprise the plaintiff's land in the big survey No. 354. The remaining lands in dispute are situated in various villages as shown in paragraph 82 of the lower Court's judgment. It is not necessary to deal with them in detail. The plaintiff's contention with regard to them is the same as it was with regard to the lands in survey No. 354, namely, that they are his property subject to the right of the public, if any, for passage.

I may summarize here the contentions as well as the admissions made by Mr. Munshi on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant with regard to roads, tanks and creeks in general :—

(1) The plaintiff admits that the road from Palej to Jambusar, item No. 59, and the road from Broach to Jambusar, item No. 58, and the road L to M in the plan, bounded on one side by Ranipura Survey Nos. 11, 12, 30, 31, 32, 27, 23 and on the other by Survey Nos. 10, 41, 40, 39, 38, 37, 33, 34, 35 and 36, vest in the local board as they have been constructed by it and the plaintiff does not claim ownership over them.

(2) Roads passing through wanta lands and going beyond belong to the plaintiff subject to the rights of the public to pass and re-pass over them as highways.

(3) Roads which end in the wanta to the extent to which they are in the wanta land, whether numbered or not, belong to the plaintiff subject to the right of the public, if any.

(4) The plaintiff is the owner of the soil and sub-soil of the road when it is bounded on both sides by his wanta lands, and only to the extent to which it is so bounded.

(5) The plaintiff is the owner of the soil and sub-soil of the road on which the wanta land abuts up to the middle of the road when the property on the other side is not the wanta land of the plaintiff.

A. C. J. Then with regard to the tanks, the plaintiff's contention is that if a tank is in 1940 a survey number or is surrounded by wanta land, it belongs to the plaintiff.
 With regard to the creeks or khadis, the creeks in the other villages are NARHAR- on the same line as the Batrisi Khadi which has been conceded by the de-SINGJI fendant as of the plaintiff's ownership.

ISHVARISINGJI
 v. We think that these contentions as well as admissions accord with the SECRETARY view which we have taken of the evidence as well as the legal rights of the OF STATE plaintiff in the suit property, and that the plaintiff, therefore, would be entitled to a declaration with regard to those items which would be found to Dwatia J. be of his ownership according to these tests.

There remains now the last item of the bed of the river at two places. The area of the river bed in Wadia is 93 acres and 4 gunthas, and in Ranipura 29 acres and 11 gunthas. It is conceded by the plaintiff that the river is not included in the wanta kharaba at any time but he claims it on his rights under the common law on the ground that the lands of the two villages of Wadia and Ranipura abut on one side of these rivers. It may be stated here that the plaintiff's title to the river, if any, is not negated by the Government Resolution, exhibit 35, which is the cause of action for the present suit; but the plaintiff has asked for a declaration of his rights with regard to the river-bed as all his rights to roads, tanks, etc. in the wanta were denied. The plaintiff claims half the bed of the river in so far as it touches the plaintiff's wanta on one side of the river, there being Government land on the other side. In the private survey of the plaintiff's estate, exhibit 160, half the river-bed was shown in the area of the estate, but it is not mentioned in the other record of the suit. For his common law rights, the plaintiff relies on the full bench decision of the Madras High Court in Venkata Lakshminarasamma v. The Secretary of State.<sup>1</sup> The decision in that case is that in the case of a grant of land bounded by a non-navigable river, the presumption is that the grant passes to the grantee the bed of the river ad medium filum aquae, and that the onus of showing the contrary is on the grantor. The decision in Babon Mayacha v. Nagu Shrawucha<sup>2</sup> has been followed in this case. We think that the presumption referred to in this decision has not been rebutted on behalf of the defendant. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff has been deprived of this right by the Government. As has been observed above, under s. 37 the bed of the river would not belong to Government if it is proved that it is of the plaintiff's ownership. According to the decision in Secretary of State v. Wasudeo,<sup>3</sup> quoted above, s. 37 saves the common law rights of private persons which existed at the date when it came into force. If, therefore, the plaintiff had the right to the river-bed in common law, there is nothing in s. 37 to deprive him of the same. The decision in Secretary of State for India v. Bijoy Chand Makatap<sup>4</sup> is also in the plaintiff's favour. It is held there that by the common law of the country, the right to the soil of a river when flowing within the estates of different proprietors belongs to the riparian owners up to the middle thread. The plaintiff would, therefore, be entitled to a declaration with regard to half the bed of the river in these two villages.

The only point that remains now is the defence of limitation, and in view of the discussion of the evidence, it is not necessary to dwell on it at length. The lower Court held that the plaintiff's suit was time-barred under art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act as his rights to the lands in suit were negatived by the Government long before the suit was filed. In fact, according to the lower Court, they were not recognised at all. We have, however, held on the evidence that the Thakor's title to the suit lands was not definitely denied by the Government till 1926 when the Government Resolution was issued denying the plaintiff's claim to the roads and tanks. Before that, as we have stated above, there were various opinions expressed by Government officers and entries made in the revenue and survey records. We do not think that those entries made before the detailed survey began in 1913 expressly negative the plaintiff's right. But even assuming it to be so, those entries, as held above, cannot be regarded as amounting to decisions about title one way or the other. In our opinion, the plaintiff's cause of action arose only when after the protracted correspondence relating to the manner in which the entries were to be made in the settlement registers it was finally decided by the Government Resolution that those entries should not declare the plaintiff's right to the roads and tanks, etc. The decisions in Surannanna v. Secretary of State for India<sup>1</sup> and Sursingji Dajiraj v. Secretary of State<sup>2</sup> are in favour of the plaintiff's contention that the cause of action did not arise before 1926. The suit, therefore, filed in 1927 is in time.

We will now ask the learned advocates on both sides to prepare a statement showing the various items which would be found as of the plaintiff's ownership, whether with or without the right of the public over them, in the light of our decision.

July 26. The learned advocates on both sides have prepared a statement in the light of our decision and we now proceed to pass the decree in the appeal.

The decree of the lower Court is set aside and the following decree is substituted in its place :—

The plaintiff is declared to be the full and absolute proprietor of (a) the river-bed ad mid filum in Wadia and Ranipura, (b) all the roads, tanks and other waste areas which are within or bounded by his wanta lands, (c) the roads up to the middle line where wanta lands abut on them on one side, and (d) in particular the items mentioned in the schedule attached, (e) the items regarding which declaration has been granted by the trial Court in the plaintiff's favour, and (f) the items admitted by exhibit 279.

The plaintiff is granted an injunction against the defendant restraining the latter and his servants and agents from interfering with the rights of the plaintiff declared above.

The defendant should pay the plaintiff's costs of the appeal and the trial Court, including the costs from the date of the filing of the suit to September 29, 1933.

Decree set aside.

The plaintiffs' ancestors mortgaged their lands to the predecessor-in-title of the defendants in October, 1791. One of the mortgagors sued in 1849 to redeem the mortgage in which suit the pleader of the mortgagee put in a statement signed by him of the account of the mortgaged property. In 1863 another of the mortgagors sued to redeem a portion of the mortgaged property, and in the appeal arising in that case the mortgagee's pleader put in in 1867 a memorandum of appeal signed by him in which the existence of the mortgage and the relationship between the parties as mortgagors and mortgagees was admitted as subsisting. The plaintiffs having sued to redeem the mortgage in 1933; the defendants contended that the mortgagors had lost their right to redeem and their title to the property mortgaged was extinguished :—

Held, (1) that the law of limitation applicable to the suit was the law in force at the date of its institution, provided that neither the right to the property in question had been extinguished nor the right to sue in respect of it barred before that law came into force ;

(2) that the mortgage in suit being of the year 1791 was governed by s. 1, cl. (15), of the Indian Limitation Act, 1859, read with s. 1 of the Amending Act XI of 1861, according to which a suit for redemption of the mortgage was barred after January 1, 1862 ;

(3) that the suit having been already barred attracted the application of s. 2 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877 as well as s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, which prevented the Act of 1877 from affecting any title acquired or reviving any right to sue barred under the Act or under any enactment thereby repealed ;

(4) that the alleged acknowledgment of 1849 did not save limitation, because under s. 1, cl. (15), of the Act of 1859 the acknowledgment should have been signed by the mortgagee or some person claiming under him, and an acknowledgment signed by his pleader as the agent of the mortgagee was of no avail ;

(5) that in any case the present suit having become barred at the date the Limitation Act of 1877 came into force and the right to sue having been lost under its s. 2, it could not be revived even though the acknowledgments of 1849 and 1867 were good under the Limitation Act of 1908 when the suit was brought :

(6) that the suit was therefore barred by limitation.

SUIT to redeem mortgage.

The property mortgaged, which consisted of an eight annas khòti takshim in the village of Sanglat in the Ratnagiri district, belonged originally to three Mahomedan brothers, viz., Isaji, Ibrahimji and Dalvaiji.

In October 1791, Mahomed Saleh, the grandson of Isaji, Abdul Gani, the son of Ibrahimji, and Shaikh Usman, the grandson of Dalvaiji, mortgaged the property with possession for a period of seven years to one Narayan alias Naro Damle.

In 1848 one of the mortgagors filed a suit to redeem the mortgage of 1791 (suit No. 345 of 1848). In that suit one Daji Gopal Joshi, the pleader of the mortgagee, put in a statement of accounts (exhibit 92) signed by himself, on June 21, 1849. *It stated :—

Rs. 1118-8-0. Deed in respect of Rs. 600 of Shake 1793, Ashwin Shud 15 ... passed by debtors Abdul Gani wd. Ibrahimji, Mahomed Sale wd. Shekh Mahammad, and Shekh Usman wd. Shekh Ahmed Nadkar.
(Sd.) DAJI GOPAL JOSHI, pleader for defendants."

In 1863 one Shaikh Ibrahim, a grandson of Abdul Gani, brought a suit (No. 1361 of 1863) to redeem the mortgage of 1791 from Naro's five sons and obtained a decree for redemption on payment to the mortgagees a sum of Rs. 1,035. No time was fixed for the payment, nor did the decree contain any clause for foreclosure in case of default. The mortgagees appealed to the District Court (appeal No. 137 of 1865) with the result that the redemption price was increased to Rs. 2,176. The mortgagees preferred a second appeal (No. 123 of 1867) to the High Court. In the memorandum of that appeal (Exh. 90), signed by the mortgagees' pleader and dated January 28, 1867, in which there was clear admission of the mortgage of 1791, it was stated :—

"(1) The Joint Judge having found from the admission of the plaintiffs in Ex. 107 that the property in dispute was not redeemable till the incumbrances effected by all the Nadkars were paid off erred in not taking into account the incumbrances enumerated in ...

(3) The Joint Judge erred in not awarding the money due on Ex. Nos. 16 and 17 executed in favour of the defendants by the heirs and representatives of one of the three original mortgagors.

(5) The Joint Judge erred in decreeing the redemption of the property in dispute before all the claims of the defendant were paid off.

(6) The Joint Judge erred in not awarding all the liens of the defendants on the property created by the writing of one of the original mortgagors or his representatives by No. 16."

On April 27, 1921, the descendants of the mortgagee sold a portion of the mortgaged property to Abdul Rahiman and Abdul Karim; and on April 19, 1922, they sold another portion of it to Abdul Karim.

In 1933, between February 14 and June 21, the representatives of the mortgagors filed six suits to redeem the mortgage of 1791. Five of the suits were heard by one Subordinate Judge, who held that they were barred by limitation, observing as follows :—

"The mortgage being of the year 1791 A.D. as alleged, its redemption would be barred after the lapse of sixty years, i.e. after 1851 A.D. Even supposing that there was a period of seven years in the mortgage that period would be extended at the most to 1858 ... The mortgage has been extinguished and the Damles became full owners of the property in the year 1877 when the execution of the decree for redemption passed in suit No. 1361 of 1863 became barred by limitation. The sale deed passed by Damles to Abdul Karim also recites that the property has been in their possession and enjoyment as owners since many years. From the facts stated by me above it appears that they became full owners of the property, the mortgage, if any, having been long since extinguished."

In the sixth suit, the trial Judge took a different view and decreed redemption of the mortgage.

There were appeals in all the cases to the District Judge, who heard them together, and came to the conclusion that the suit was barred by limitation, for the following reasons :—

"The first enactment of limitation was Regulation V of 1827. Section 8, cl. 1, of the Regulation clearly laid down that no length of time prevented a Court from entertaining a suit to redeem a mortgage, unless the property was held by a bona fide possessor as proprietor for a period of thirty years. This Regulation was in force in 1858, and, therefore, it was an error to say that a suit for redemption of the mortgage of 1791 became time-barred either in 1851 or in 1858. The next piece of legislation was Act XIV of 1859. Section 1, cl. 15 of the Act for the first time prescribed a period of sixty years for a suit for recovering immoveable property from a mortgagee, the period starting from the date of the mortgage. Under this provision a suit for redemption of the mortgage in question in these suits became barred on the date when Act XIV of 1859 came into force. But the hardship which the Act created in respect of old mortgages which had been allowed to stand without redemption for over sixty years by virtue of Regulation V of 1827 was removed by the amending Act XI of 1861, s. 1 of which gave a grace period till January 1, 1862, for entertaining suits to redeem such mortgages. Therefore, correctly speaking, a suit for redemption of the mortgage in the present case became barred on January 2, 1862 ... A suit of redemption which became so time-barred could not be revived by anything contained in the later enactments. I shall, however, notice only s. 29 of Act IX of 1871 which provided that on the determination of the period thereby limited to any person for instituting a suit for possession of any land, etc., his right to such land shall be extinguished. The expression 'land' was replaced by 'property' in s. 28 of Act XV of 1877. It will follow therefore that at the date of the present suits, a suit for redemption was barred, and also the appellants' right to the 'property', that is to say, the Khoti takshim in question had become extinguished.

The next point is whether Ex. 92, the statement of account produced in the suit of 1848 is a valid acknowledgment capable of giving a fresh start of limitation. Now Regulation V of 1827 gave no recognition to any acknowledgment of liability on a mortgage, for the simple reason that it did not prescribe any period of limitation for a suit to redeem a mortgage. The statement of account therefore had no legal effect when it was produced in 1849. The first provision as to acknowledgments of liability was enacted in Act XIV of 1859 by s. 1, cl. 15, which prescribed a period of sixty years for a suit to redeem a mortgage, the time starting from the date of the mortgage, or from the date of the acknowledgment in writing, if given in the meanwhile, by the mortgagee or some person claiming under him. If Ex. 92 could be regarded as an acknowledgment within the meaning of this section, then undoubtedly the mortgagors were entitled to claim a fresh period of limitation for sixty years starting from 1849. But equally undoubtedly the acknowledgment did not answer the requirements of that section. For, the latter did not recognise the validity of an acknowledgment by an agent such as Damle's pleader was. Therefore Ex. 92 was incapable of extending the period of limitation, with the result that a suit to redeem the mortgage of 1791 became barred after the expiry of the grace period allowed by amending Act XI of 1861. For the first time an agent's acknowledgment came to obtain a limited recognition in s. 20(a) of Act IX of 1871, that is to say, for the purpose of reviving a debt or legacy. With respect to a mortgage, however, the law remained unchanged, for art. 148 of the second schedule of that Act permitted a fresh start of limitation only in case of an acknowledgment in writing given by the mortgagee or some person claiming under him. Finally by s. 19 of Act XV of 1877 an agent's acknowledgment obtained full recognition as if it was an acknowledgment given by the principal himself. But when this provision came into force a suit to redeem the mortgage of 1791 had become already time-barred; and it goes without saying that it could not be revived by the later enactment.

The second document relied on in this connection is Exh. 90, which is a copy of the appeal memo in the second appeal filed by the Damles from the appellate decree in suit No. 1361 of 1863. It is open to the same objection as Exh. 92, because the appeal memo. was prepared and signed by the pleader and not by the Damles. Moreover, a suit being time-barred in 1862 the equity of redemption could not be revived by any subsequent acknowledgments, for in order to be valid, it must be given before the period of limitation expires."

DIVATIA J. These are companion appeals preferred by the appellants who are some of the original plaintiffs in suits to recover possession of certain property and for an injunction against the defendants restraining them from recovering the income of the suit lands. The suit property formed certain fractions of an eight annas khoti taxim in the village of Sanglat in the Ratnagiri district. This eight annas taxim was at one time owned by three Mahomedan brothers. In October, 1791, some of the descendants of these three brothers mortgaged this taxim to one Narayan or Nard Damle. The deed of mortgage is not in evidence, but the mortgage has been admitted by the parties. In 1849, one of the persons interested in the mortgaged property filed a redemption suit, but nothing appears on the record with regard to this suit except a statement of account of the mortgaged property in 1849 signed by the pleader of the mortgagee (exhibit 92). Then in 1863, Shaikh Ibrahim, father of defendant No. 1 in Second Appeal No. 426, filed Suit No. 1361 of 1863 to redeem a portion of the mortgaged property from the son of the original mortgagee. A decree for redemption was passed in the plaintiff's favour, but no time was fixed for payment and there was no provision for foreclosure. That decree was confirmed in appeal subject to a slight variation in the mortgage amount. A second appeal was preferred to this Court in 1867 by the descendant of the original mortgagee. In the memorandum of that appeal the existence of the mortgage and the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee between the parties was admitted as subsisting. This memorandum (exhibit 90) was signed by the pleader of the appellant. The appeal was dismissed, but thereafter neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee did anything in the way of redemption or foreclosure. It appears that a botkhat of the khoti property was prepared in 1893, and the Damles, i.e., the mortgagees, were continued to be shown in that register from 1893 to 1913. In 1921 and in 1922 a fractional share in the suit property was sold by the descendants of the original mortgagee to two persons. One transaction was a sale-deed by the three descendants of the original mortgagee of their fractional share to two persons Abdul Rahiman and Abdul Karim on April 27, 1921, and in the other deed another descendant of the original mortgagee also sold his fraction of the mortgaged property to Abdul Karim on April 19, 1922. In both these deeds, the vendors, i.e. Damles, purported to sell the property as owners, and the purchasers, who are some of the descendants of the original mortgagors, are the main defendants in these suits. The present plaintiffs are some of the other descendants of the original mortgagors, and they have filed these suits against the defendants treating them not as purchasers but as redeeming co-mortgagors, to recover possession of their proportionate shares in the property comprised in the two sale-deeds on payment of the proportionate amount of the price stated in the two sale-deeds. Their case in short is that the two sale-deeds practically amounted to deeds of redemption of the original mortgage, that they were entitled to recover possession of their share from the redeeming co-mortgagors of the property, and that the cause of action arose when the property had been redeemed by these defendants from the descendants of the original mortgagee, i.e. in 1921 and 1922.

The defence to the suits was that the mortgagors had lost their right to redeem and their title was also extinguished, that the Damles had become owners of the property and the two deeds of 1921 and 1922 conveyed shares in the property itself and not the mortgage rights in them, so that the defendants having purchased the property from its owners got rights of ownership which the plaintiffs cannot challenge.

It appears that five out of the six suits came to be tried by one Judge, Mr. Vaidya, and the sixth suit having been filed later on, was tried by his successor. The learned Judge who tried the five suits framed several issues of which the material issue for the purpose of these appeals is, whether it was proved that the mortgage was extinguished and that Damles had become absolute owners. He found that issue in the affirmative, and also held that the alleged purchase by the defendants from the Damles had been proved. On these findings he dismissed all the five suits. The learned Judge who tried the sixth suit, which is the subject-matter of Second Appeal No. 427, came to a contrary conclusion on the strength of certain documents relied on as acknowledgments of the mortgage. It may be stated here that the plaintiffs relied upon these acknowledgments, and they had tried to prove them before Mr. Vaidya, but the learned Judge rejected their application on the ground that they were produced at a late stage. His successor, however, admitted them as they were produced in his suit at a comparatively early stage, and he came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's suit was in time having regard to the acknowledgments which were proved, and on that ground he decreed the plaintiffs' suit.

Against these decrees appeals were preferred to the District Court, the appeals in the first five suits having been preferred by the plaintiffs and that in the sixth suit by the defendants. The material point for determination was the same, namely, whether the suits were barred by lapse of time under art. 148 of the Indian Limitation Act, and the finding of the learned Judge was in the affirmative. In deciding that point he considered the acknowledgments relied upon by the plaintiffs, and came to the conclusion that they do not save the bar of limitation. Shortly stated, his reasons were that the two acknowledgments relied upon on behalf of the plaintiffs, namely, the statement of account (exhibit 92) produced by the pleader of the mortgagee in 1849 in the redemption suit and the memorandum of appeal (exhibit 90) filed by the mortgagee's pleader in the High Court in 1867, were not signed by the mortgagee or by any person claiming through him, but by his pleader who was a legal agent and whose signature would not amount to an acknowledgment under the Limitation Act of 1859 or of 1871. He, therefore, rejected both these documents as not amounting to acknowledgments under either of these two Acts. The right to redeem was lost after January 1, 1862, under the Act of 1859.

These five appeals (the plaintiffs in one suit having not appealed to this Court) have been preferred against the decrees passed by the learned District Judge. Mr. Coyajee on behalf of the appellants has based his argument on one point, viz., that the Act to apply to the present suits for the purpose of determining whether they are barred by limitation is the Act in force at the date when the suits were filed, namely, the Limitation Act of 1908, and that under that Act an acknowledgment made by a mortgagee or his agent, either specially or generally authorised, would be valid under s. 19. Therefore, the acknowledgments of 1849 and 1867, although they might be invalid under the Acts 1859 and 1871, must be deemed to be valid as tested by the provisions of the present Act which alone applies to the suits. He relies upon several cases the most important of which is the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal.<sup>2</sup>

Before dealing with the cases cited at the bar, it is necessary to review what were the relevant provisions in the previous Acts bearing on this point. The earliest law to apply is Bombay Regulation V. of 1827, s. 8, cl. 1, in which it was provided that no length of time shall prevent the Court's entertaining a suit to recover possession of the property held in mortgage; but if such property had been held for more than thirty years by a bona fide possessor as proprietor, the right of suit would be lost. Thereafter, Act XIV of 1859 was passed by the Indian Legislature. For the first time that Act prescribed a period of limitation for suits for redemption in s. 1, cl. (15), which laid down a period of sixty years for redemption of a mortgage from its date unless the mortgagor's title or right of redemption was acknowledged in writing by the mortgagee or some person claiming under him, in which case the period would run from the date of the acknowledgment. As that Act applies to all the mortgages at the date when it was passed, and as according to the previous law there was no provision for limitation for redemption suits, the Legislature provided a period of grace by the amending Act XI of 1861 under s. 1 of which a period of grace was given up to January 1, 1862, to bring suits for redemption of mortgages which were barred on the date when the Act of 1859 came into force. The next Act of Limitation is Act IX of 1871, which repealed the previous Act of 1859, and it provided the same period of sixty years for redemption suits under art. 148 of the Second Schedule to the Act. It was further enacted that the right to sue would expire at the end of sixty years unless there was an acknowledgment of the title of the mortgagor or of his right of redemption, before the expiration of the prescribed period, made in writing signed by the mortgagee or some person claiming under him. In that case a new period would run from the date of the acknowledgment. There was another provision for acknowledgment also in s. 20 of that Act in case of a debt or legacy, under which an acknowledgment in respect of a debt or legacy in writing signed by a party or his agent before the expiration of the prescribed period would have the effect of starting limitation from the date of the acknowledgment. It was further provided in s. 29 of that Act that at the determination of the period limited to any person for instituting a suit for possession of any land, his right to such land shall be extinguished.

This Act of 1871 was followed by Act XV of 1877, which embodied a new provision in s. 2 thereof, that nothing contained in that Act or in the Act of 1871 shall be deemed to affect any title acquired, or to revive any right to sue barred, under that Act or under any enactment thereby repealed. The provision for acknowledgment with regard to mortgage suits, which was provided for in art. 148 of the previous Act, was embodied in s. 19 of this Act in which it was provided that if an acknowledgment of liability in respect of any property or right was made in writing signed by the party against whom such property or right is claimed or by some person through whom he derives title or liability, a new period of limitation would run from the date of such acknowledgment. It was further provided that the word "signed" meant signed either personally or by an agent duly authorized in this behalf. So that for the first time an acknowledgment signed by an agent became a valid acknowledgment. Section 29 of the Act of 1871 was re-enacted as s. 28 of this Act.

The last Act of Limitation is the present one, Act IX of 1908, in which all the relevant provisions, namely, art. 148 and ss. 19 and 28, are similar to those in the Act of 1877. It may be stated here that the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1877, which I have mentioned above, were not re-enacted in the Indian Limitation Act of 1908 for the reason that they were embodied in s. 6 of the General Clauses Act of 1897.

These are the relevant provisions of the law applicable to the facts of the present case.

As I said before, Mr. Coyajee has mainly relied on the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal for the purpose of his argument that the law of limitation to apply to a suit is the one in force at the date when it is filed. That is no doubt true as a general rule, but it is subject to a qualification as stated in that decision itself, viz., unless there was a distinct provision to the contrary. An example of such a contrary provision is s. 2 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877 under which a right to sue once barred cannot be revived by the provisions of a later enactment. On the facts of the particular case which their Lordships had before them, it was not necessary to apply the provisions which limited the operation of that rule. The facts there were that the mortgage was of 1842, the two acknowledgments relied upon were in 1866 and 1867 by the widow and the daughter of the mortgagee, respectively, and the suit was brought in 1907. If the acknowledgments were governed by the law prevailing at the time when they were made, i.e. by s. 1, cl. (15), of the Indian Limitation Act of 1859, they would be valid as they were given by persons who claimed under the mortgagee, but if they were governed by the law in force at the date of the suit, i.e. the Act of 1877, they would be invalid because they were not given by persons through whom the defendants who were reversioners derived their title. It was held that the law of limitation applicable to a suit was the law in force at the date of its institution unless there was distinct provision to the contrary, and under s. 19 of the Act of 1877, which applied, the acknowledgments were invalid for the reason stated above. There was therefore no question there of the applicability of s. 2 of the Act of 1877, according to which nothing in that Act was to affect any title acquired or to revive any right to sue barred under that Act or under any enactment thereby repealed. That was so because no title had been acquired and no right to sue was barred when that Act came into force in 1877 as the period of sixty years had not elapsed at that time. A suit could have been properly filed till the year 1902 without the aid of any acknowledgment, but after that date it would be good only if the acknowledgment was valid according to the law of 1877, and as that was not so, the acknowledgments were regarded as ineffectual. The present case, however, is a converse case where the acknowledgments would be good if they were governed by the law of 1908. The facts of this case would attract the application of s. 2 of the Limitation Act of 1877 as well as s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, because as I observed before, the mortgage in suit was in the year 1791, and it would be governed by the provisions of s. 1, cl. (15), of the Limitation Act of 1859 read with s. 1 of the amending Act XI of 1861, according to which a suit for redemption of a mortgage, which would have been barred when the Act of 1859 came into force, would be barred after January 1, 1862.

The question then is, could a suit on this mortgage have been properly filed after that date? It is clear that the alleged acknowledgment of 1849 would not have saved it, because under s. 1, cl. (15), of the Act of 1859, the acknowledgment must be by a mortgagee or some person claiming under him, and here it was not by such a person but by a legal agent. Therefore, the suit would have been barred after the beginning of the year 1862. Under art. 148 of the Act of 1871 also the acknowledgment must be given by the same type of person as mentioned in the Act of 1859. Therefore, in any case the present suit would be barred at the date when the Act of 1877 came into force, and therefore, s. 2 of that Act would apply with the result that the right to sue having been lost, it could not be revived even though the acknowledgments would have been good under the Act of 1908 when the suits were brought. The present case, therefore, stands entirely on different facts from those in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal, and it is governed not by the general rule about the application of the law in force at the date of the suit, but by the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1877, which makes the general rule inapplicable by barring the remedy as well as extinguishing the right.

Before I go to the other cases relied on by Mr. Coyajee, I might dwell upon an earlier decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Fatimatulnissa Begum v. Soonder Das,<sup>1</sup> which lays down the principle applicable to the facts of the present case. In that case the mortgage was of 1788, there was no acknowledgment within sixty years from its date and the suit for redemption was filed in 1893. Their Lordships held that that suit would be barred at the end of sixty years on October 17, 1848, by Act XIV of 1859, s. 1, cl. (15), unless brought before January 1, 1862, or unless previous to October 17, 1848, an acknowledgment of the mortgage in terms of that clause was given, signed by the mortgagees or some person claiming under them. It was observed in the course of the judgment that as the parties did not sue on the last date provided for such a suit, namely, January 1, 1862, the right to sue had been lost and the right to property had been also extinguished under s. 29 of the Act of 1871. The same principle would apply to the present case even though there purports to be an acknowledgment within sixty years which however was not valid under the law prevailing then. The principle enunciated in this decision has been followed by the Calcutta High Court in Gopeshwar Pal v. Jiban Chandra Chandra,<sup>1</sup> where the later decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal is distinguished. The general proposition there laid down is that where the application of the provisions of an amending Act makes it impossible to exercise a vested right of suit, the Act should be construed as not being applicable to such cases. The decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal was distinguished on the ground that it did not apply to cases where the effect of the application of the amended law would be to confiscate a vested right.

Two cases of our High Court have also distinguished this Privy Council decision. The first is Narayan v. Govind.<sup>2</sup> In that case the mortgage was in 1807. In 1860 there purported to be an acknowledgment by one of the heirs of the mortgagee, and the suit was filed in 1920. It was held that the acknowledgment of 1860 was not a valid acknowledgment under the Act of 1859 as it was not given by all the heirs of the mortgagee, and therefore, as it was ineffectual for the purpose of the Limitation Act of 1859, the right of the mortgagor was extinguished in 1868 in view of s. 29 of the Limitation Act of 1871, and could not be revived by the later Acts. It was observed in the course of the judgment that although the general principle might be conceded, namely, that the Act of Limitation to apply to a suit is the one in force at the date of the suit, it was subject to the qualification that where a right to bring a suit had been extinguished before, it could not be revived subsequently, and on that ground the decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal was distinguished. On the facts of that case it was clear that the acknowledgment was bad, and therefore, the right of suit had already been lost before the Act of 1877 came into force. This decision, therefore, would be applicable to the facts of the present case.

The next decision is in Dhondi v. Lakshman.<sup>3</sup> There the mortgage was in 1799, the acknowledgment was in 1865, and the suit was filed in 1924. It was held that the right to sue for redemption was barred on January 1, 1862, i.e. before the date of the acknowledgment, and therefore, the acknowledgment of 1865, could not extend the period of limitation under the Act of 1859. It was further held that the remedy as well as the plaintiffs' right to bring a suit having been extinguished by the operation of s. 29 of the Act of 1871 as well as s. 2 of the Act of 1877 and s. 6 of the General Clauses Act of 1897, nothing contained in the subsequent Limitation Act of 1908 would affect the operation of the previous enactments. The ratio decidendi of this case is clearly applicable to the facts of the present case. The Privy Council decision in Fatimatulnissa Begum v. Soonder Das<sup>1</sup> was followed and the decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal was distinguished on the ground that in that case there was no question of the revival of the lost right to sue.

Mr. Coyajee has referred to three more decisions to support his argument. The first decision relied upon by him, apart from the decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal, is the one in Mohesh Lal v. Busunt Kumaree.<sup>2</sup> That was a suit to recover a debt, and governed by s. 20 of the Limitation Act of 1871, and the acknowledgment was good under that section. The law of limitation at the date of the suit being the Act of 1871 there was no question of the applicability of s. 2 of the Act of 1877. That case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable from the facts of the present case, which is not to recover a debt and as such governed by s. 20 of the Limitation Act of 1871, but is governed by art. 148 of that Act under which the two acknowledgments would be invalid.

The next case relied upon is Zaib-un-nissa Bibi v. The Maharaja of Benares.<sup>3</sup> In that case the mortgage was in 1823, there was an acknowledgment in 1868 which was valid according to the law in force at the date of the suit which was instituted in 1909. The suit could have been filed without the acknowledgment till 1883, and it would, therefore, have been governed by the Limitation Act of 1877 under which the acknowledgment in question was valid though it was invalid according to the law in force at the date of the acknowledgment, namely, the Act of 1859. The plaintiff was, therefore, held as entitled to rely on the acknowledgment. It is clear that in that case the right to sue was not barred when the Act of 1877 came into force, because sixty years had not elapsed at that time from the date of the mortgage. The general proposition laid down in the head note in that report correctly summarizes the law applicable to acknowledgments. It is held that the criterion to be applied to test the validity of an acknowledgment of liability put forward by a plaintiff as extending the period of limitation in his favour is the law in force at the time when the plaintiff's suit would otherwise have been time-barred and not that in force at the time when the acknowledgment relied upon was made.

The last case relied upon is Amarchand v. Narayan.<sup>4</sup> The mortgage there was in 1834, there were two acknowledgments, one in 1864 and the other in 1877, and the suit was filed in 1924. At least one acknowledgment, viz., the second, signed by the heirs of the mortgagee, was valid under the Act of 1908 when the suit was brought, and that acknowledgment was made while the right to sue on the mortgage was subsisting in 1877. It is clear, therefore, that the acknowledgment having been made during the subsistence of the right to sue, there was no scope for the application of s. 2 of the Act of 1877.

These are all the authorities that have been cited during the course of the arguments. It would be clear from this discussion that the present case is governed by the qualification to the general rule, as the right to sue was lost before the Act of 1877 came into force. The acknowledgments, therefore, though valid under the Act of 1908 are of no avail for saving the bar of time.

1 (1900) L. R. 27 I. A. 103.

2 (1880) I. L. R. 6 Cal. 340.

The decision of the lower Court, therefore, holding that the suits were barred by limitation is correct, and the appeals are dismissed with costs.

BROOMFIELD J. In view of the learned argument at the bar, I will add a few remarks.

It is necessary to Mr. Coyajee's argument that he should be able to show that in 1921 and 1922 when the Damles sold the land, they were still mortgagees, that is to say, that the mortgage was still subsisting. It has to be conceded that, unless there was a valid acknowledgment, a suit to redeem the mortgage would have been barred in January, 1862, and also that the acknowledgment of 1849, on which Mr. Coyajee relies, being by an agent, did not become operative to save limitation until the Act of 1877 was introduced. Under that Act and subsequent Acts it would be operative for that purpose. Mr. Coyajee contends that the test of the validity of an acknowledgment is the law in force at the time of the institution of the suit. As a general rule that is undoubtedly the law : Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal.<sup>1</sup> But the rule is subject to the proviso that neither the right to the property in question has been extinguished, nor the right to sue in respect of it barred before the later law came into force. Once a right to property has been extinguished, or right of suit barred, it cannot be revived by subsequent Limitation Acts in the absence of express words so providing. That the decision in Lala Soni Ram v. Kanhaiya Lal does not really support the argument advanced by Mr. Coyajee in this case is clear, I think, from the discussion of that case in Gopeshwar Pal v. Jiban Chandra Chandra<sup>2</sup> and Narayan v. Govind.<sup>3</sup>

If s. 29 of the Act of 1871 applies to the case, the equity of redemption was extinguished after sixty years from the date of the mortgage and could not be revived. For the purpose of determining whether the right was extinguished or not, the relevant law must, I think, be the law in force when s. 29 was enacted. See Fatimatunnissa Begum v. Soonder Das<sup>4</sup> and Indurai v. Shiwal.<sup>5</sup> If the acknowledgment now relied on was not a valid acknowledgment under the Act of 1871—and it was not—the fact that it was made valid by subsequent legislation would be immaterial. It has not been argued before us that s. 29 of the Act of 1871 did not apply to a suit for redemption. In Dhondi v. Lakshman<sup>6</sup> and Indurai v. Shiwal<sup>7</sup> it has been held that it did apply to such a suit. But even if the equity of redemption had not been extinguished, the right to sue for redemption was barred in 1862, and in view of s. 2 of the Act of 1877, which is still the law, the right cannot be revived. It is true, as Mr. Coyajee says, that the present is not

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 64; O. XXI, r. 54; O. XXXVIII, r. 10—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Secs. 40, 54, 55(4) (b)—Attachment before judgment by creditor—Agreement to sell property to third party entered into by debtor before attachment—Sale effected after attachment—Attaching creditor whether entitled to sell property in execution of his decree—Right of attaching creditor to purchase-money.

An attachment before judgment of property subject to a contract of sale merely gives the attaching creditor a right to the balance of the unpaid purchase-money and he is not entitled to bring that property to sale in satisfaction of a decree subsequently obtained by him. If the purchase-money or the balance thereof has not been paid, he can attach it in the hands of the purchaser. He would also in that case have the benefit of the vendor's lien under s. 55(4) (b) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

The holder of a money-decree had attached the immovable property of his judgment-debtor before judgment. Before attachment the judgment-debtor had agreed to sell the property to a third party who had paid a certain amount as earnest money and who was put in possession of the property. The sale was completed by a conveyance after the attachment when a further sum was paid to the judgment-debtor and the balance was retained by the purchaser to satisfy certain mortgages on the property. In a suit by the decree-holder for a declaration that the property was liable to be attached and sold in execution of his decree:—

Held, that the attaching judgment-creditor was not entitled to sell the property in execution of his decree; but that he could only attach the purchase money or the balance thereof which has not been paid by the purchaser, or he could also have the benefit of a vendor's lien under s. 55 (4) (b) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

One Chinnappa (plaintiff) obtained a money-decree against Virappa on September 1, 1932, in suit No. 205 of 1932, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Bail-Hongal. In this suit the plaintiff had obtained an order of attachment before judgment of the suit property, which consisted of a field belonging to Virappa, on June 9, 1932. Before the latter date Virappa had entered into a contract on April 27, 1932, with Rango (defendant No. 1) to sell the suit property to him for Rs. 7,000. Defendant No. 1 paid Rs. 1,500 as earnest money and he was put in possession of the property.

On June 11, 1932, i.e. two days after the attachment of the suit property, a sale-deed in respect of it was executed by Virappa in favour of defendant No. 1. Virappa was paid Rs. 1,766 and the balance was retained by defendant No. 1 in accordance with the agreement of April 27, 1932, to satisfy certain mortgages on the property.

On May 27, 1936, the plaintiff filed the present suit against defendant No. 1 and the sons of Virappa (defendants Nos. 2 and 3) for a declaration that the suit property was liable to be attached and sold in execution of his decree dated September 1, 1932.

The trial Court in granting the declaration observed as follows :—

"After exhibit 32 (the agreement of sale), but before exhibit 31 (the sale-deed), the property has been attached by the present plaintiff in Civil Suit No. 205 of 1932. In Taraknath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar Mukherji (57 Cal. 274) it has been held that an agreement to sell immoveable property creates an obligation which does not amount to a charge or interest in the property and cannot prevail over subsequent attachment, whether before or after judgment. At p. 158 of Mulla's Transfer of Property Act, there is the following pertinent passage :—

'The obligation which is annexed by this section to the ownership of property by a contract of sale will not prevail against claims enforceable under an attachment. If A agrees to sell immoveable property to B, and if before the conveyance is executed, a creditor C attaches the property, the subsequent conveyance by A to B will be subject to the claims of C enforceable under the attachment.'

Hence in this suit also, as the sale-deed (exhibit 32) was executed after the attachment of the property, exhibit 32 will be subject to the claims of plaintiff under the attachment."

On appeal the appellate Judge confirmed the decree of the trial Court and observed as follows :—

"The appellant urges that his right to obtain a sale-deed in respect of the property originated from the date of the contract which took place on April 27, 1932, which was much prior from the date of the attachment which was effected on June 9, 1932. The argument has no basis either in fact or in law. A mere contract for sale of the property creates no interest in favour of the purchaser. This is laid down in s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. It provides that a contract for sale of immoveable property does not in itself create any interest in, or charge on, such property. Hence it is clear that the contract evidenced by exhibit 32 created no interest in, nor charge on, the property in favour of the appellant under the terms of that agreement. The interest of the appellant in the property was created by the sale-deed, exhibit 31, which is obviously subsequent to the attachment

A. C. J. effected. Section 64 of the Civil Procedure Code provides : 'Where an attachment 1940 has been made, any private transfer or delivery of the property attached or of any — interest therein and any payment to the judgment-debtor of any debt, dividend or RANGO RAM- other moneys contrary to such attachment, shall be void as against all claims enforce-CHANDRA able under the attachment.' Under the provisions of this section the appellant is bound
 v. by the attachment to the extent of all claims enforceable under the attachment. This GUR- is the view held by the Calcutta High Court in Taraknath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar LINGAPPA Mukherji (57 Cal. 274). It is held therein that an agreement to sell immoveable pro-CHINNAPPA perty creates no obligation amounting to a charge, or interest in the property, or an — easement within the meaning of s. 40 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and cannot prevail over subsequent attachment whether before or after judgment.

It is, therefore, clear that the property was purchased by the appellant subject to the restrictions laid down in s. 64 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is equally clear that the attachment was valid in law as the judgment-debtors had an attachable interest in the property on the date on which the attachment was effected and as the appellant had no interest in the property at that time. As the sale-deed in favour of the appellant is subsequent to the attachment it is binding upon him as laid down in s. 64 of the Civil Procedure Code. As such the property is liable to be sold for the recovery of the debt due under the decree in execution."

Defendant No. 1 appealed to the High Court.

BROOMFIELD J. The question for determination in this second appeal is whether the holder of a money decree, who has attached immoveable property of his judgment-debtor before judgment, can bring that property to sale in satisfaction of his decree when the judgment-debtor has, before the attachment, agreed to sell the property to a third party and the sale has been completed by a conveyance after the attachment. The other facts which may be material in the particular case are that Rs. 1,500 out of the total consideration of Rs. 7,000 were paid at the time of the agreement, that possession was handed over to the purchaser at the same time, and that on the date of the sale-deed, which was executed two days after the attachment, Rs. 1,766 were paid to the vendor, the balance being retained by the purchaser in accordance with the agreement to satisfy certain mortgages on the property. The decree-holder brought a suit for a declaration that the property was liable to be attached and sold in execution of his decree, and both the lower Courts have held in his favour. The purchaser from the judgment-debtor has appealed.

The following provisions of law have to be considered in connection with the question :—Section 64, O. XXI, r. 54, and O. XXXVIII, r. 10, of the Civil Procedure Code, and ss. 40 and 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. Section 64 and O. XXI, r. 54, might seem at first sight to make the rights of the purchaser under the sale-deed subject to the rights of the attaching judgment-creditor, but these provisions must be read along with O. XXXVIII, r. 10. That rule saves the right of the purchaser under the contract of sale. His right is a personal one, i.e. the right to a conveyance in his favour on payment of the balance of the purchase-money. But there is nothing in the rule to suggest that it applies only to rights in rem. By reason of s. 40 of the Transfer of Property Act the purchaser may enforce his vendor's obligation under the contract of sale against a transferee with notice. Section 54 of the Act states that a contract for the sale of immoveable property does not, in itself, create any interest in or charge on such property. But the attachment does not create any interest or charge either. In this respect the attaching creditor is in no better position than the purchaser, and simply on the construction of the statutory provisions it is difficult to see how his attachment can confer upon him any higher right than the judgment-debtor had at the date of the attachment, namely, a right to the balance of the purchase-money, this right being subject to the obligation to convey the property to the purchaser. The claim by the attaching creditor to sell the property in execution of his decree would override both the obligation of the judgment-debtor and the right of the purchaser existing prior to the attachment.

We were referred only to one authority in support of the attaching creditor's claim, namely, Buta Ram v. Sayyad Mohammad,<sup>1</sup> and that is really no authority at all, because it was not a case of an attachment before judgment, and O. XXXVIII, r. 10, therefore, did not apply. The lower Courts have relied on Tarakanath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar Mukherji,<sup>2</sup> which case has sometimes been cited in the text books as an authority for the proposition that an attachment before judgment prevails over the rights arising from a prior contract of sale. But though it is by no means easy to follow the judgments delivered in that case, it is clear when the facts are looked at that the Court did not lay down any such proposition. The suit there had been brought by the purchaser from the judgment-debtor for a declaration that the property was not liable to be sold in execution of the decree against him, and the Court of first appeal had made a decree confirming the plaintiff's title, but directing him to pay certain sums to the defendants which were made a charge on the property. This decree was confirmed in second appeal. It seems probable, although the fact does not very clearly appear from the report of the case, that the direction for payment of certain sums to the defendants and the declaration of a charge effectively safeguarded the rights of the attaching creditor to the balance of the purchase-money. But, in any case, as the purchaser's title was confirmed, there was certainly no finding that the attaching judgment-creditor was entitled to sell the property in satisfaction of his decree.

It may be noted moreover that in an earlier case, Madan Mohan Dey v. Rebat Mohan Poddar,<sup>3</sup> the Calcutta High Court decided against the claim of the attaching creditor in similar circumstances. The facts were the same as here except that the contract for sale had been enforced in execution of a decree for specific performance, and the attached property had likewise been sold in execution. The Court had to determine the respective rights of the two purchasers. It held that the rights of the purchaser under the contract must prevail. The reasons given were that s. 64 of the Code only protects the creditor against a transaction subsequent to the attachment, and it must be read subject to O. XXXVIII, r. 10, which is not limited to rights in rem. In Basappa v. Hanmappa,<sup>4</sup> Beaumont C. J. followed this case in preference to Tarakanath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar Mukherji.

It has been held in several cases in Madras, Veeraraghavayya v. Kamala

Devi,<sup>1</sup> Veerappa Thevar v. Venkatarama Ayyar<sup>2</sup> and Diraviyam v. Veeranan,<sup>3</sup> that the attachment before judgment of property subject to a contract of sale merely gives the attaching creditor a right to the balance of the purchase-money. With respect I agree with this view. It necessarily follows that he can never sell the property in satisfaction of his own decree. If the purchase-money or the balance thereof has not been paid, he can attach it in the hands of the purchaser. He would also in that case have the benefit of the vendor's lien under s. 55(4) (b) of the Transfer of Property Act (see Veerappa Thevar v. Venkatarama Ayyar<sup>4</sup>) and he could, if necessary, sue to enforce it. If the whole of the price has been paid to the vendor, the attaching creditor's only right would seem to be to attach the money in the hands of the vendor, if he can. In most cases he will not be able to do so, and the attachment will then be infructuous, for although by reason of the attachment the attaching creditor will become entitled to whatever part of the purchase-money has been paid after the attachment, the attachment itself will not enable him to enforce that right. That is the position in the present case, for the balance of the purchase-money, which was payable to the vendor, was paid on the date of the sale-deed.

We are informed that the purchaser has not yet satisfied the mortgages on the property which he is bound to do under the contract of sale. But that part of the purchase-price has to be applied in that way under the terms of the agreement. The attaching judgment-creditor got no right to it by his attachment of the property. As things are, therefore, not only is he not entitled to sell the property in satisfaction of his own debt but he is not entitled to any relief which the Court could give him in this suit.

DIVATIA J. This appeal arises in a suit by the plaintiff for a declaration that certain property consisting of a field belonging to one deceased Virappa, father of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, was liable to be attached and sold in execution of a decree in suit No. 205 of 1932 obtained by the plaintiff against Virappa. In that suit the plaintiff had obtained an order of attachment before judgment of this property on June 9, 1932. Before that date Virappa had entered into a contract on April 27, 1932, with defendant No. 1 to sell the field to him for Rs. 7,000, and the latter had paid Rs. 1,500 as earnest money and was also put in possession of the property. On the same date Virappa passed to defendant No. 1 a receipt in which it was stated that Rs. 1,500 were received as earnest money, that a sale-deed was to be passed within a month, that out of the balance of Rs. 5,500 payable for the price defendant No. 1 was to pay off a pre-existing mortgage on the property and he was to pay the remaining amount in cash to Virappa. The sale-deed was executed on June 11, 1932, Rs. 1,766 were paid to Virappa, and the remaining amount from the balance of Rs. 5,500 was left with defendant No. 1 to pay off the mortgagee. Thereafter the plaintiff's suit against Virappa ended in a decree in his favour on September 1, 1932. He applied for execution and proceeded against this property which was attached before judgment. Defendant No. 1 filed an objection petition in the darkhast on the ground that the field had been sold to him under a contract of sale prior to the attachment before judgment and that the title having passed to him by his subsequent sale-deed, it was not liable to be sold in execution. Defendant No. 1 succeeded in his application and the attachment was raised on April 15, 1935. Hence the present suit by the plaintiff against defendant No. 1 for a declaration of his right to attach and sell the property.

The plaintiff's case in substance was that the sale-deed being subsequent to the attachment, it was subject to his rights under the attachment, and, therefore, inoperative. Defendant No. 1's case was that he had become the absolute owner of the property even before the attachment by reason of his contract under which he was put in possession, and that in any case the attachment was invalid as he had a charge on the property to the extent of his purchase-money.

Both the lower Courts held that the attachment was valid and binding on defendant No. 1, that he took no title under the sale-deed, and the property was, therefore, liable to be sold in execution of the plaintiff's decree. The reasons given by the lower Courts are shortly these : A contract to sell does not create a charge on the property, and is not, therefore, a pre-existing right under O. XXXVIII, r. 10, of the Civil Procedure Code, that the subsequent sale-deed of the property attached was void as against all claims enforceable under the attachment under s. 64 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that as decided in Tarakanath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar Mukherji,<sup>1</sup> the contract to sell cannot prevail over the subsequent attachment, whether before or after judgment. A decree was, therefore, granted in the plaintiff's favour, and this appeal is now preferred by defendant No. 1 against that decree.

The point arising for decision in this appeal depends on the application of s. 64 read with O. XXXVIII, r. 10, of the Civil Procedure Code. Under s. 64 a private transfer of property after its attachment is void as against all claims enforceable under the attachment. Order XXXVIII, r. 10, provides that attachment before judgment shall not affect the rights, existing prior to the attachment, of persons not parties to the suit. If, therefore, a person has a right over a property before its attachment and he is not impleaded in the suit, that right could not be affected by the attachment. The question then is whether a transfer of property in pursuance of such a right would be affected by the attachment. It is true that under s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act a contract for sale of immoveable property does not, of itself, create any interest in, or charge on, such property, but it is also true that an attachment, whether before or after judgment, does not confer any title in, or create a charge over, the property. It merely keeps it in custodia legis and prevents its alienation in certain cases. Moreover, the attachment is not necessarily of the property itself but of the right, title and interest of the debtor in the property at the date of the attachment. So also under O. XXXVIII, r. 10, it is subject to pre-existing rights over the property. If, therefore, a person, having a contract of sale in his favour, has such pre-existing right, the attachment could not be binding on him. The right of a promisee under such contract is to enforce its specific performance by the sale of the property to him. If the promisor sells or gifts the property and hands over its possession to another with notice of the contract, the promisee can enforce it against that other person also under s. 27 of the Specific Relief Act as well as s. 40 of the Transfer of Property Act. True, it is a right in personam and not in rem, but it is an obligation annexed to the ownership of immovable property and is in the nature of a trust under s. 91 of the Indian Trusts Act. It is, therefore, clearly a right within the meaning of that term in O. XXXVIII, r. 10, and the attachment under s. 64 is subject to that right. If the promisee gets a conveyance, after the attachment, in pursuance of his contract, he takes a good title in spite of the attachment. Even if the property is sold in execution, he can enforce specific performance of his contract against the auction-purchaser as the latter acquires only the interest of the judgment-debtor, and that interest is burdened with the contract.

The lower Court has relied on the decision in Taraknath Mukherji v. Sanatkumar Mukherji in holding that the attachment is binding on defendant No. 1 and that the property is liable to be sold in execution of the plaintiff's decree, but it has misunderstood the actual decision in that case. There the contract to sell took place on July 8, 1921, in favour of the plaintiff under which he paid the greater part of the price as earnest money. The property was attached by three creditors in their suits in August and September, 1921; in November, 1921, it was sold to the plaintiff who paid the balance of the purchase-money. In execution of the attaching creditors' decrees, the plaintiff objected unsuccessfully, and he, therefore, filed suits for declarations that the property was not liable to be sold. The lower Court had held that the title of the plaintiff to the property would be confirmed but he should pay certain sums to the defendants which would be a charge on the property. That order was confirmed by the High Court, but the two learned Judges based their decisions on different grounds. Cuming J. observed that as the contract did not create a charge on the property, the attaching creditor had the right to bring it to sale in execution in spite of the previous sale to the purchaser who may enforce his right of specific performance against the auction-purchaser under s. 40 of the Transfer of Property Act. He discussed a previous decision of the Calcutta High Court in Madan Mohan Dey v. Rebati Mohan Poddar<sup>1</sup> in which it was held that the attachment was not effective against a sale in pursuance of a contract before attachment, but it was distinguished on the ground that it did not proceed on any principle of law but on natural justice. In the end, however, he did not hold the sale to the plaintiff as invalid but made it subject to a charge for the payment of sums due to the attaching creditors on the property in his hands. But he did so on the ground that as the attachment prevailed over the subsequent sale, the property remained liable for the attaching creditors' claims. The other Judge, Pearson J., was of the opinion that the previous decision in Madan Mohan Dey v. Rebati Mohan Poddar was not based merely on the principle of natural justice but on s. 64 coupled with O. XXXVIII, r. 10, of the Civil Procedure Code. He was, however, of opinion that the attachment affected the right of the vendor in the property, at any rate, to the extent of any balance then receivable under the agreement, and the attaching creditor was entitled to have it applied, in the events which had happened, towards the payment of his debt. On that ground he agreed with the order that the plaintiff was liable to pay to the defendants the balance recoverable at the date of the attachment.

I have dwelt upon this case at some length because it has been mainly relied on by the lower Court in support of its decision, and it is therefore necessary to see whether it can be regarded as an authority laying down any general rule. One thing is, at any rate, quite clear that even if that decision is correct, it does not support the decree which the lower Court, relying upon it, has made in the present case. The lower Courts have held that in spite of the sale in favour of defendant No. 1 in pursuance of the contract prior to the attachment, the property is liable to be sold in execution of the plaintiff's decree. But that was not the order in Tarakanath's case. On the other hand, the title of the purchaser to the property was confirmed. The only result of the attachment was held to be the creation of a charge on it for payment of the sums due to the creditors even though the whole of the price had already been paid by the purchaser to his vendor. There is no authority for the proposition that in such a case the sale in pursuance of the contract is to be treated as absolutely void and that the property should be sold at the instance of the attaching creditors either free from or subject to the right under the pre-existing contract. On the other hand, it has been held in Veerappa Thevar v. Venkatarama Ayyar<sup>1</sup> and Diraviyam v. Veeranan<sup>2</sup> that title to the property passes to the purchaser, and it cannot be sold in execution of the decree. The same view is taken by Beaumont C. J. in Basappa v. Hanmappa<sup>3</sup> although the observations were in the nature of obiter dicta. The decree of the lower Court cannot, therefore, be justified in any case, but the question would still remain whether defendant No. 1 gets absolute title under the sale or he gets it subject to a charge for the balance of the price payable at the date of the attachment. In Tarakanath's case, discussed above, a charge was no doubt created on the property in favour of the attaching creditors, but it is difficult to extract any general principle from either of the two judgments in that case. The plaintiff appears to have been satisfied with the confirmation of the sale to him and willing to pay off the decree-holder. Tarakanath's case, therefore, cannot be regarded as an authority for the proposition that the attachment prevails over the contract in the sense that the purchaser under the contract takes the property burdened with the obligation to pay off the attaching creditors to the extent of the balance of the price unpaid at the time of the attachment, even though he had subsequently paid the balance to his vendor at the time of the completion of the sale. It is indeed true that the attachment holds good in respect of such right as the vendor had in the property at the time of the attachment, i.e. the right to receive the whole or a part of the price on completion of the sale. It is held in Veerappa Thevar v. Venkatarama Ayyar that where there is an unpaid balance of the purchase-money, the attachment fastens to the vendor's right to recover the money, i.e. the unpaid vendor's lien over the property under s. 55(4)(b) of the Transfer of Property Act. To the same effect is the decision in Diraviyam v. Veeranan. Those decisions are, in my opinion, correct. If, therefore, there is an unpaid balance of price in the hands of the purchaser, the attaching creditor can hold the purchased property in his possession liable for that amount, because by virtue of the attachment he gets the benefit of the lien. If, however, the purchaser has paid the whole price to the vendor, the vendor's lien has ceased to exist and the property is free from liability. The attaching creditor can proceed against the price in the hands of his judgment-debtor, but he cannot hold the purchaser responsible for paying it over again to him.

We have not got sufficient materials in the present case to hold that the order of attachment before judgment operated as a notice or an injunction to the purchaser not to pay the balance of the purchase-money to the vendor. It seems to be clear in any case that he had no specific notice of the order of attachment. That being so, he was not bound to pay it in Court or to the attaching creditor, and if he did pay it to his vendor at the time of the completion of the sale, he cannot be ordered to pay it over again to the attaching creditor. In my opinion, therefore, the purchaser in the present case gets an absolute title to the property he has purchased under his contract, and the decision of the lower Court is, therefore, wrong and must be set aside.

KESHAVRAO LINGANGOUDA DESAI.*

Hindu law—Adoption—Joint Hindu family—Sole surviving coparcener—Widows of predeceased coparceners—Arrangement under which adoptive widow of sole coparcener takes life interest—Consent of adopted son's natural father to such arrangement—Son subsequently adopted by widow of another coparcener—Whether such arrangement affects rights of subsequently adopted son.

Under Hindu law an arrangement which regulates the rights of the adoptive mother vis-a-vis the adopted son cannot affect the rights or claims of a person who is subsequently adopted in the undivided family and who is not a party to the arrangement.

One V was left the sole surviving coparcener in a joint Hindu family after the death of his two brothers who died childless leaving their widows surviving them. On July 17, 1928, V executed a document in the nature of a testamentary deed of his estate by which he authorised his widow L to adopt M who was the son of his daughter by his predeceased wife. L was authorised to manage V's "property in her independent right till her death." Soon after this V adopted M and executed a registered deed of adoption under which L was authorised to manage the property in the terms of the previous deed. This arrangement was agreed to by the natural father of M. V then died and on February 26, 1935, the widow of one of V's brothers adopted the plaintiff. The plaintiff filed a suit against L and M for partition claiming a half share in the joint family property. L contended that the arrangement evidenced by the adoption deed was binding on the plaintiff and governed the relationship between him and L as well as M.---

Held, (1) that inasmuch as the family continued to be joint so long as any widow remained in it with a power to adopt, the adoption of the plaintiff was valid and affected the family property :

(2) that the arrangement evidenced by the deed of adoption, validated on the ground of custom, was binding in so far as it regulated the right of L as against M :

Krishnamurthi Ayyar v. Krishnamurthi Ayyar,<sup>3</sup> followed ;

(3) that it could not be supported on the basis of a supposed alienation by a sole surviving coparcener prior to the adoption of the plaintiff, because the deed was to come into operation after V's death ;

(4) that the rights or claims of persons subsequently adopted in the family who were not parties to the arrangement were not affected by it ; and

(5) that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to half a share in the family property.

SUIT for partition.

The property in suit belonged originally to one Bistappagouda, to whom the parties to the suit were related as shown in the following genealogical tree :—

On Bistappagouda's death, his three sons continued to live jointly as before. One of the sons Nilkanthgouda died in 1918 leaving him surviving his widow Kamalabai (defendant No. 4). Lingangouda died in 1923 leaving his widow, Saraswatibai (defendant No. 5), surviving him.

The surviving coparcener Venkatrao was a thrice married man. By his first wife Bhagirathibai he had a daughter. That daughter had a son named Martandgouda (defendant No. 1). His second wife Lakshmibai (defendant No. 2) gave birth to three daughters, Anusuyabai, Chitrabai and Savitribai. The name of his third wife was Indirabai (defendant No. 3).

On July 17, 1928, Venkatrao executed a vyavasthapatra by which he authorised his wife Lakshmibai to adopt a son, empowered her to manage the property in her independent right during her lifetime, and provided that if disputes arose between her and the adopted son, each one should take a moiety of the income of the property.

v.

KESHAVRAO
GOUDA

On August 11, 1928, Venkatrao himself adopted his minor grandson Martandgouda (defendant No. 1) after stipulating with his natural father as his guardian that the terms of the vyavasthapatra were binding on the adopted son. Venkatrao died the next day, i.e. August 12.

Disputes between Lakshmibai and Martandgouda were not long in coming. They came to a head in 1930, and resulted in litigation in 1930. The disputes were finally decided in the High Court on September 21, 1936, by Barlee and Tyabjee JJ., who decided :—

“Lakshmibai is entitled under the agreement to the management of the estate for her life and in case the adopted son quarrels with her after he comes of age, to a life interest in a moiety. The adopted son is the full owner subject to her life interest and will get a moiety of the income after he attains majority. Up to then he is entitled to maintenance.”

Whilst the above litigation was going on, Saraswatibai (defendant No. 5), the widow of Lingangouda, adopted Keshavrao (plaintiff) on February 26, 1935.

On June 28, 1937, the plaintiff filed a suit to recover a half share in the family property as the adopted son of Lingangouda.

The trial Judge held that the adoption of the plaintiff was valid and decreed to the plaintiff a half share in the family property by partition.

Defendant No. 2 appealed to the High Court.

R. A. Jahagirdar, for the appellant.

H. B. Gumaste, for respondent No. 1.

V. H. Gumaste, for respondents Nos. 1 and 4.

WASSOODEW J. This is an appeal from a decree of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dharwar in a suit by the plaintiff to recover, upon partition, possession with mesne profits of his half share in certain properties mentioned in the schedules to the plaint which were admittedly the joint family estate of the plaintiff's adoptive father Lingangouda and his two brothers Venkatrao, alias Kenchappaya and Nilkanthagouda. The facts which have given rise to this dispute are briefly these.

The plaintiff's adoptive father Lingangouda died childless in 1923 leaving a widow Saraswatibai, defendant No. 5 in the case. Lingangouda was predeceased by his younger brother Nilkanthagouda in 1918 who left a widow who is defendant No. 4. Upon the death of these two brothers Venkatrao was left the sole surviving coparcener in the family. Venkatrao was thrice married and in 1928, which is an important period in the history of this litigation, only his last two wives the appellant Lakshmibai, defendant No. 2, and Indirabai, defendant No. 3, were living. They had no issue. The first wife: Bhagirathibai who died before 1928 had left three daughters, one of whom had a son Martand, defendant No. 1 in the case, who was then a child aged four and is still a minor. It appears that Venkatrao on July 17, 1928, executed a document (exhibit 100) described as “vyavastha-patrack” in the nature of a testamentary disposition of his estate. By that document he authorised Lakshmibai to adopt his daughter's son Martand. He also made provision for his daughters and widows and mother and also for the management of the estate during the minority of Martand and thereafter. The material provisions in that respect are contained in cls. (2) and (7) of the deed which are reproduced below :—

"My second wife Laxmibai should bring up the said adopted boy and she alone should make vahiwat of the property in her independent right till her death and she alone should go on managing the household affairs (go on making vahiwat of the family). It is my wish that all the members of the family should remain in union. In case any dispute arises, then the lands as mentioned below out of our family property should be taken by the respective persons and should stay.

"Laxmibai should make vahiwat of all my property. During her lifetime and after the adopted son becomes major, any dispute arises, then in the remaining income Laxmibai should take half of the net income and should manage as she wills and the remaining half only should be taken by the adopted son who should make vahiwat and enjoy the same."

Not long after executing that document, Venkatrao adopted Martand, his daughter's son referred to in the above deed, on August 11, 1928. The next day it appears Venkatrao died. On the date of the adoption Venkatrao executed a registered deed of adoption (exhibit 94) which is to the following effect :—

"I have no male issue born of me. I am now attacked by illness. For the continuation of the line of my family, I asked your genitive parents to give you (Martand) in adoption to our family. They accordingly having agreed, gave you in adoption. And I accordingly, have taken you in adoption as per our Hindu Dharma Shashtra (according to Hindu rites). You are the absolute owner to my entire moveable and immoveable property. My wife Laxmibai herself should make vahiwat of my family moveable and immoveable properties. The arrangement and the vahiwat of my family properties (moveable and immoveable) as per will executed by me on date 17th of July 1928 should be made. Such is the adoption executed by me voluntarily."

The document is signed by the adoptive father and is addressed to the adopted son Martand (vide exhibit 94).

Thereafter disputes arose between Laxmibai on the one hand and the adopted son represented by his natural father on the other, in consequence of which Laxmibai instituted a suit in 1930 for a declaration that the adoption of Martand was invalid and illegal and that she was entitled to manage and enjoy the property under the adoption deed read with the earlier document the "vyavastha-patrak" executed in her favour by Venkatrao on July 17, 1928. The trial Court held that the adoption was valid and binding on the widow Laxmibai, but that she was entitled under the deed of adoption to the management of the estate for her life in terms of the "vyavastha-patrak" to which reference has been made therein. It was held that the arrangement, which was agreed to between Venkatrao and the natural father of the adopted son, was binding on the parties and the adoptive mother. Against that decision Laxmibai appealed to the High Court and there were cross-objections filed on behalf of the adopted son Martand. This Court on September 24, 1936, dismissed that appeal as well as the cross-objections maintaining the decree of the trial Court.

While that litigation was pending between Laxmibai and her adopted son Martand, the widow of the deceased Lingangouda adopted the plaintiff on February 26, 1935, and on June 28, 1937, the latter instituted this suit for partition claiming a half share in the joint family estate which his deceased

That claim was met by various pleas, including the plea that the adoption of the plaintiff was invalid and illegal, and in the alternative that the arrangement evidenced by the adoption deed of August 11, 1928, and upheld by the High Court in the suit between Laxmibai and defendant No. 1, Martand, was binding on the plaintiff and governed the relationship between him and Laxmibai as well as defendant No. 1. Laxmibai's principal contention was that she could not be dispossessed of this property and deprived of the enjoyment of its benefit during her lifetime, there being a disposition in her favour by her husband whilst he was the sole surviving coparcener which was acquiesced in and agreed to by the natural father of her adopted son.

The learned trial Judge has found that the plaintiff's adoption was proved and valid and that he was entitled to partition and possession of a share in the disputed estate. Accordingly a preliminary decree for partition was passed in his favour and an enquiry was directed upon the claim to mesne profits from the date of the suit, the plaintiff's share being fixed as half in the disputed property.

In this appeal by defendant No. 2 Laxmibai from that decree, two contentions have been formulated by her learned advocate, first, that the arrangement evidenced by the deed of adoption is operative as an alienation of the entire estate in favour of Laxmibai under which it was to be enjoyed and managed by her during her lifetime in terms of the "vyavastha-patrak" of July 17, 1928, and is therefore binding not only on defendant No. 1, the son adopted by Laxmibai's husband, but also on all other persons subsequently born in the family or adopted by the widows of the deceased "gotraja sapindas" who died in union; and, secondly, that the adoption of the plaintiff is illegal and invalid in view of the extinguishment of the coparcenery prior to the adoption of the plaintiff. The latter ground was not urged in the trial Court in defence to this action and no issue was claimed and no evidence directed to the question as to whether the coparcenery had come to an end either upon the death of Venkatrao or subsequent thereto prior to the adoption of the plaintiff. It is also material to note that that ground has not been taken in the memo of appeal. It is a new point raised for the first time in argument. That point necessarily involves questions not only of law but of fact. We have therefore declined to hear arguments of Mr. Jahagirdar for the appellant on that point.

The only issue that was therefore argued is the one involved in the first contention. The factum of adoption was not questioned for the appellant. The evidence in my opinion satisfactorily establishes the adoption of the plaintiff by the widow of Lingangouda on February 26, 1935. There is no question that the adoption to her husband by a widow of a deceased "gotraja sapinda", who was a member of a Mitakshara joint family, is valid and binding on the other members of the family so far as the creation and vesting of a coparcenery interest in the joint family property is concerned immediately upon adoption, the interest being co-extensive with that of his adoptive father. And it makes no difference to the vesting of that interest where only one member of the joint family survives at the time of adoption, for it has been held that the family continues to be joint so long as any widow remains in

Mr. Jahagirdar contends that the terms of the deed of adoption give effect to what he describes as a family arrangement and therefore it is binding upon all the members of the coparcenery including those born subsequent to the deed of adoption. His argument is that inasmuch as the parties to that arrangement, assuming it to be the act of Venkatrao and Martand, were absolutely entitled to the joint family estate, they could by mutual consent limit the estate of the future coparceners. His alternative contention, as I have stated, is that the arrangement is tantamount to an alienation either by a sole coparcener or existing coparceners, and as such is binding on the plaintiff, the subsequently adopted son by a widow of a deceased "gotraja sapinda". The former contention involves a strange doctrine, namely, that it is in the power of coparceners in a joint family for the time being in possession of the joint family estate by an arrangement or agreement among themselves which is short of alienation or severance of their respective interests, to restrict or curtail the rights of enjoyment of the future coparceners, born or adopted in the joint family. Mr. Jahagirdar has argued that Krishnamurthi Ayyar v. Krishnamurthi Ayyar<sup>3</sup> is an authority for upholding such an arrangement. There a dispute arose between the adopted son and the widow of the adoptive father with regard to the enjoyment and management of the joint family property. An arrangement was made by the adoptive father in a will before the adoption took place, according to which his widow was allowed to enjoy his property during their lifetime, or for a less period. That arrangement was consented to by the natural father of the adopted son before the adoption. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee after reviewing the Indian authorities which they thought were not reconcilable in so far as they could yield some principle governing the arrangements arrived at between the adoptive father and the natural father of the adopted son, came to the conclusion that the only ground on which such arrangement could be sanctioned was custom. The following observations of Viscount Dunedin, who delivered the judgment of the Board, are important (p. 263) :—

"They are of opinion that there is such a consensus of decision in the cases with the exception of the case of Jagannadha v. Papamma,<sup>4</sup> that they are fairly entitled to come to the conclusion that custom has sanctioned such arrangements in so far as they regulate the right of the widow as against the adopted son. It seems part of the custom that one sine qua non of such an arrangement should be the consent of the natural father. But if this is looked at narrowly, it is only because it is a part of the custom that it is either here or there."

There can be no doubt upon that authority that the arrangement evidenced by the deed of August 11, 1928, could be upheld on the ground of custom. And that arrangement has been upheld by this Court in the appeal between defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2. But according to their Lordships of the Privy Council that arrangement is binding in so far as it regulates the right of the widow as against the adopted son. The question is whether the rule of custom could be extended to regulate by such an arrangement the rights of persons in the position of the plaintiff or other coparceners born in the family. If, for instance, after the arrangement was concluded a son were born to the adoptive father in his lifetime or after his death, would his interest be bound by the terms of that arrangement to which he was not a party actually or fictionally? Similarly, would the interests of a person adopted by a widow of a deceased coparcener of the joint family entitled under ordinary law to a share in the coparcenary property be affected by it? No authority has been cited before us to show that the rule of custom can be extended to affect other interests referred to. In my opinion it does not seem right that such an arrangement, which regulates the rights of the adoptive mother vis-a-vis the adopted son, should affect the other coparceners in the joint family acquiring that status by birth or adoption.

But Mr. Jahagirdar has argued that inasmuch as Venkatrao, who was the sole surviving coparcener prior to the adoption, could make a disposition inter vivos of his property in his wife's favour which would be binding on the son adopted or born subsequently, the arrangement in question should be similarly treated and given effect to. The assumption underlying that argument is that the arrangement must be looked upon as governed by a special equity or as an alienation. It is certainly not a family arrangement, as ordinarily understood implying a settlement of a doubtful claim by agreement to attract the special rule of equity to it. Nor could it be regarded as an alienation or disposition inter vivos, for obviously under the two deeds the adoptive father so long as he lived lost nothing or rather contracted to lose nothing of his interest in the entire estate. An alienation inter vivos implies the voluntary resignation of an estate by one man and its acceptance by another. The deed was to come into operation after Venkatrao's death. So that the argument based on a supposed alienation by a sole surviving coparcener prior to the adoption is not well founded. But Mr. Jahagirdar contends that it could still be regarded as a joint disposition by the father and the adopted son. That argument is obviously unsound. It could not be regarded as a disposition by the son prior to his adoption, for he had not acquired any right which he could dispose of through his natural father. In point of fact it is not a joint act of the adoptive father and the adopted son. The latter after his adoption could not being a minor effect an alienation himself. Upon his adoption his natural father could not on the minor's behalf agree to an alienation in favour of the adoptive mother except within the limits of the rule of custom recognized in Krishnamurthi Ayyar's case. The consent of the natural father would not be effectual in law or by custom to validate the disposition of Venkatrao according to his will, for that would take effect after the lifetime of the adoptive father and curtail the rights of the adopted son as a co-sharer. I do not therefore think on principle that the rights or claims of persons subsequently adopted in the family who are not parties to the arrangement would be affected by it. In that view of the matter, it is unnecessary to deal with the other cases referred to which have very little bearing upon the question in dispute. I would therefore confirm the decree of the lower Court and dismiss this appeal with costs (one set).

BROOMFIELD J. Mr. Jahagirdar does not rely on the will of Venkatrao and it is clear that the adoption of a son by the testator renders the will as such invalid. The main argument before us on behalf of the appellant is that the agreement between Venkatrao and the natural father of the adopted son before the adoption, providing that Venkatrao's widow, defendant No. 2, should have a life estate may be regarded as an alienation of joint family property inter vivos analogous to an alienation by a sole surviving coparcener or by a coparcener in excess of his share, and should be similarly held binding on a person like the plaintiff, not then in existence as a member of the family. As my learned brother has pointed out, however, it is extremely difficult to see how the transaction can be regarded as an alienation. Mr. Jahagirdar says that it was an alienation by the father Venkatrao or by Venkatrao and the adopted son together. But if it be treated as an alienation by the father, it was obviously not inter vivos. The terms of the agreement were not to take effect until his death. On the other hand, if it were to be treated as an alienation by the son, it was not by a coparcener, for until he was adopted he was not a coparcener. That being so the principles laid down in Basawantappa v. Mallappa<sup>1</sup> and the cases referred to in the judgment in that case have no application.

Defendant No. 2's right to a life interest is really based on custom and nothing else—the custom recognized in Krishnamurthi Ayyar v. Krishnamurthi Ayyar<sup>2</sup> which regulates the right of a widow and mother of the adopted son as against the adopted son. But in the absence of authorities,—and it is admitted that there is no authority—this custom cannot be extended so as to make the pre-adoption agreement binding on parties other than the adopted son. Defendant No. 2 by virtue of the agreement, which has been recognized in the previous litigation, got a right as against defendant No. 1 to enjoy defendant No. 1's property during her lifetime. She still has that right. But defendant No. 1 being a member of the joint family, although for a time after Venkatrao's time he was the sole surviving coparcener, his interest in the estate was liable to be diminished in case one of the widows of a deceased coparcener adopted a son, and in that event defendant No. 2's right was liable to be diminished to the same extent. I agree therefore that the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ANNU BAJABA JAGADALE

v.

DADU TUKARAM JAGADALE.*

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Secs. 6, 7, 8 and 9—Alienations by Hindu widow—Adoption made after alienations—Death of adopted son after attaining majority—Second adoption—Suit by second adopted son to set aside alienations—Whether suit by second adopted son to set aside alienations barred—Cause of action—Limitation.

A Hindu died in the year 1900 without issue leaving certain properties. His widow alienated some of his lands in 1901 and 1904 by passing sale deeds in favour of defendants' predecessors-in-title. She adopted a son to her husband, but he died unmarried in 1918 after attaining the age of majority. In 1934 she adopted another son to her husband. In a suit by the second adopted son to set aside the alienations made by her adoptive mother, it was contended that the prior adopted son, who had been validly adopted and had attained majority long after the alienations, had a right to challenge the alienations, and, as against him the period of limitation had commenced to run, the plaintiff could not acquire a fresh cause of action to set aside the alienations in respect of which time had already run :—

Held, that the effect of ss. 6, 7, 8 and 9 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, was to bar the prior adopted son's right to sue, and as his right was barred, no further right to sue in respect of the alienations could accrue to the plaintiff.

SUIT for possession of property.

In 1900 one Tukaram died leaving certain properties but no issue behind him.

On April 15, 1901, his widow Dhondai executed a sale-deed of survey No. 184, admeasuring two acres and fifteen gunthas, for Rs. 500 in favour of the father of defendants Nos. 4 and 5.

On October 3, 1904, Dhondai's father executed a sale-deed of survey No. 165 belonging to Tukaram in favour of the father of defendant No. 6 for Rs. 200.

On May 11, 1908, Dhondai executed a sale-deed of survey No. 122, admeasuring four acres and sixteen gunthas, for Rs. 100, in favour of defendant No. 1.

Dhondai adopted a boy to her husband, but he died unmarried in 1918 after having reached the age of majority.

In 1934, she adopted the plaintiff Dadu, who brought this suit as the adopted son of Tukaram for a declaration that the three sale-deeds were not binding on him as they were not passed for legal necessity and for possession of the lands alienated thereby.

Defendant No. 1 contended that the plaintiff was not properly adopted and the sale-deed was passed for legal necessity.

* Second Appeal No. 84 of 1940, from the decision of T. B. Shanbhag, Assistant Judge at Satara, in Civil Appeal No. 222 of 1938, reversing the decree passed by S. G. J. D'Costa, Joint Subordinate Judge at Dahi-wadi, in Civil Suit No. 275 of 1935.

Defendants Nos. 2 to 6 contended similarly and further submitted that the suit was barred by limitation.

The trial Court held that the plaintiff was validly adopted, that the sale deeds were passed for legal necessity, that the suit was out of time so far as survey No. 165 was concerned because the possession thereof was with defendant No. 6 since 1917, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the lands alienated.

On appeal, the lower appellate Court set aside the decree of the trial Court, holding that the alienations effected were not for legal necessity, the suit was not barred by limitation, and the claim in respect of survey No. 165 was also not barred.

Defendants Nos. 2 to 6 appealed to the High Court.

A. G. Desai, with G. M. Joshi, for the appellants.

K. N. Dharap for P. B. Gajendragadker, for the respondent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is a second appeal from the Assistant Judge of Satara. The plaintiff, as a son adopted by one Dhondai to her deceased husband, claims to recover possession of the suit property on the ground that alienations by the widow were not for legal necessity. The husband died in 1900, and the plaintiff was adopted in 1934. The alienations took place between 1901 and 1904. There was also an alienation in 1908 in favour of defendant No. 1, but he has not appealed and I am only concerned with two alienations, one in 1901 and the other in 1904. The trial Judge raised two issues, which are relevant for the present purpose. The first is issue No. 1 :

"Does the plaintiff prove that he has been duly and validly adopted by Dhondai?"

The other is issue No. 3 :

"Is the suit barred by time?"

The only allegation relating to limitation in the written statement was that the plaintiff and his predecessors had not been in possession within twelve years from the date of the suit and hence the plaintiff's suit was out of time.

Now, on the first issue as to whether the adoption was valid, the learned trial Judge held that the fact of adoption was proved, but then he notices a legal objection raised as to its validity, namely that the widow's power to adopt had been extinguished by a previous adoption of a son who had attained the age of ceremonial competence. On that point the learned Judge observes :—

"It is admitted that prior to the present adoption Dhondai had adopted a cousin of Dadu Tukaram, who passed away in 1918 unmarried in his twenties. It is argued that because of the ceremonial competence this adopted son had attained, Dhondai's right to further adopt had terminated."

The learned Judge held that that point was not a sound one and that the widow's power of adoption had not been exhausted by this prior adoption.

On the issue of limitation the learned trial Judge held that so far as survey No. 165 was concerned, the defendants had been in possession since 1917, and the suit was out of time. He does not say why the plaintiff's title, which only accrued in 1934, should be barred.

v.
DADU
TUKARAM

A. C. J. In appeal the question of limitation was sought to be put upon a different 1940 ground. It was said that this prior adopted son had been validly adopted — and had attained majority long after these assignments, which are challenged ANNU and that he had a right to challenge these assignments, and as against him BAJABA time had run, and that the plaintiff could not acquire a fresh cause of action
 v. to set aside the assignments in respect of which time had already run. The DADU learned Assistant Judge refused to go into that point, because, he said, it had TUKARAM not been raised in the Court below and was a mixed question of law and — fact. I entirely agree with the lower appellate Court that it would not be Beaumont C.J. right in appeal to allow a point of law to be raised, which depended on questions of fact which the party relying on the point of law had not chosen to raise in the lower Court, and certainly I should not allow such a point to be raised in second appeal. The difficulty, however, in the plaintiff's way is that the questions of fact about the prior adoption were raised and answered in the lower Court, though not in connection with the issue of limitation. The defendants in the lower Court alleged that by reason of this prior adoption and of the age attained by the adopted son, the right of the widow to adopt had come to an end, and, therefore, the plaintiff's adoption was invalid, and it was clearly open to the plaintiff on that issue to dispute the prior adoption, which he did not do. I do not think it would make any difference whether the prior adopted son had attained majority or not. Even if he had not attained majority when he died, I think that the effect of ss. 6, 7, 8 and 9 of the Indian Limitation Act would be to bar his right to sue. It is not disputed that if the right of the prior adopted son was barred by limitation, no further right to sue in respect of these assignments could accrue to the plaintiff.

I cannot agree with the lower appellate Court that this question was not raised in the trial Court. The question as to the adoption was raised, and the plaintiff had an opportunity of challenging the facts. As soon as the learned trial Judge found as a fact, in connection with the issue as to the validity of the plaintiff's adoption, that there had been a prior adoption by the widow of a son who died in 1918 unmarried in his twenties, it was the duty of the learned Judge under s. 3 of the Indian Limitation Act to raise this point of limitation. It is true that he did not raise the point, nor did the parties raise it. But there was actually an issue as to limitation, and the learned Judge ought to have pointed out that on the facts found by him there was a ground of limitation in addition to the ground which had been raised in the written statement. Had the learned Judge taken that view of the matter and observed that there was this further ground of limitation,
 I think he would have been bound to hold that the plaintiff's suit was barred.
 When the point was raised in the District Court, I think the learned Assistant Judge ought to have done what the trial Judge should have done and said that on the facts found the suit was barred. In second appeal I must adopt that course and say that on the facts found in the trial Court the plaintiff's suit is undoubtedly barred as against the appellants.

I must, therefore, allow the appeal. With regard to costs, I think probably if this point had been raised in the trial Court, it would have been decided in favour of the defendants, and there would have been no necessity of any appeal. In my opinion, the proper order will be to allow the appeal and direct that the plaintiff's suit be dismissed as against defendants Nos. 2 to 6, who are the present appellants, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of defendants Nos. 2 to 6 of the trial, but I allow no costs of the appeal to the lower appellate Court or to this Court.

Appeal allowed.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Sec. 92—Subrogation—Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872), Sec. 69—Payment of money which another person is bound by law to pay—Reimbursement by person making payment—Tagai loan—Another person repaying tagai loan, whether entitled to recover it—Land Improvement Loans Act (XIX of 1883).

In 1927 R (father of defendant No. 1) borrowed a sum of Rs. 1000 from Government as tagai allowance and made the amount a charge on his land No. 5/2, for the improvement of which the loan was taken, and offered his other lands Nos. 381, 382 and 124 as collateral security. In 1929 R mortgaged lands Nos. 381 and 382 to defendant No. 3. On January 25, 1932, R sold lands Nos. 5/2 and 124 to the plaintiff who kept Rs. 1000 out of the purchase money with himself and paid off the tagai loan with that money. Four days before the sale, i.e., on January 21, 1932, defendant No. 2, who held a money decree against R, attached land No. 5/2 in execution of his money decree and at a Court-sale which followed purchased the land himself. In 1935, the plaintiff sued for a declaration that the amount of tagai loan repaid by him was a charge on lands Nos. 5/2, 381 and 382, and for recovery of the amount by sale of the lands :—

Held, (1) that if the plaintiff came within the terms of s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, he would have the same rights as Government not only against defendant No. 1, who borrowed the money from Government but also against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 who derived their rights from defendant No. 1 ;

(2) that the plaintiff did not fall within the scope of the section, because there was in fact no mortgage to Government but only a statutory charge on the lands in favour of Government ;

(3) that inasmuch as part of the consideration for sale of land 5/2 was retained by the plaintiff for the discharge of incumbrances on the land, that money should be regarded as the money of R and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to subrogation under the first part of the section :

(5) that the plaintiff was not entitled to a personal decree against the defendants by reason of the equitable principle enunciated in s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, since the repayment of the tagai loan to Government was to be regarded as the act of the vendor R and not the act of the plaintiff the purchaser, and even if there was a payment by the plaintiff within the meaning of the section, it was a payment which he was bound to make under the terms of his agreement with R and it was not open to him to say that it was a payment which some other person was bound to make :

(6) that the plaintiff's suit was misconceived and that his only legal remedy was to sue his vendor, defendant No. 1, for damages.

SUIT for declaration.

One Ramappa (father of Vithoba, defendant No. 1) was the owner of lands bearing survey Nos. 5/2, 381, 382, and 124.

On October 5, 1927, Ramappa borrowed a sum of Rs. 500 from Government as tagai loan under the provisions of the Land Improvement Loans Act. On November 9, 1927, he borrowed another sum of Rs. 500 from Government for the same purpose. The amount of Rs. 1000 was needed for improving land No. 5/2, on which a charge for the amount was declared. Survey Nos. 381, 382 and 124 were given as collateral security for the advance.

On November 26, 1929, Ramappa mortgaged Survey Nos. 381 and 382 to Baswant (defendant No. 3).

On January 25, 1932, Ramappa sold Survey Nos. 5/2 and 124 to Vithaldas (plaintiff) for Rs. 5000. Of this amount Rs. 2000 were paid in cash to Ramappa. The balance of Rs. 3000 was allowed to remain with the plaintiff for repaying the tagai allowance of Rs. 1000 to Government and for paying off the fees earned by S. V. Kowjalgi, pleader, for legal services rendered to Ramappa. In repayment of the tagai debts the plaintiff paid to Government Rs. 150 on May 27, 1932, Rs. 150 on March 18, 1933, and Rs. 608 on November 23, 1934.

In 1930 Basappa (defendant No. 2) brought a suit (No. 197 of 1930) against Ramappa and obtained a money decree against him. In execution of the decree (darkhast No. 41 of 1932) defendant No. 2 attached Survey No. 5/2 on January 21, 1932. At a Court-sale held in execution proceedings on February 4, 1933, defendant No. 2 purchased Survey No. 5/2 for Rs. 1200. He obtained possession of the land on April 30, 1933.

On March 23, 1933, the plaintiff sued (suit No. 126 of 1933) Ramappa and defendant No. 2 to recover possession of Survey No. 5/2, but the suit was decided in favour of defendant No. 2 because of his prior attachment of the land.

On February 28, 1935, the plaintiff gave a notice to defendant No. 2 calling upon him to hand over possession of survey No. 5/2 to the plaintiff.

On June 4, 1935, the plaintiff sued defendants Nos. 1 to 3 to obtain a declaration that he had a charge on survey Nos. 5/2, 381 and 382 for Rs. 974-12-0, the amount repaid by him to Government under tagai allowance together with interest, and also to recover the amount by sale of the lands. He relied in support of his claim on s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

Defendant No. 1 did not appear. Defendant No. 2 contended inter alia that he was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the tagai claim, that he did not enter into possession of land No. 5/2 till May 1933 and the plaintiff could not seek to recover the tagai loan repaid before that date, and that the plaintiff purchased lands Nos. 5/2 and 124, subject to the tagai incumbrance, after defendant No. 2 had attached land No. 5/2 in darkhast No. 41 of 1932. The defence of defendant No. 3 was that the plaintiff had purchased Ramappa's interest in land No. 5/2, that he had paid off the tagai loan on that land in order to enjoy it free from any burden, and that he could not therefore maintain the suit.

"The crucial question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a prior statutory charge on the suit lands and can enforce it against defendants Nos. 2 and 3, who are the transferees thereof. Section 92 of the Transfer of Property Act and s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act are called in aid in support of plaintiff's contention. It is contended that the plaintiff as a purchaser of R. S. No. 5/2 was interested in discharging the tagai encumbrance on that land and, therefore, he is subrogated to the rights of Government in respect of R. S. No. 5/2 and the collateral security thereof, viz. R. S. Nos. 381 and 382. I think s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act can have no application to the facts of the present case. There was a covenant in the sale-deed passed by Ramappa in favour of plaintiff that the latter should discharge the tagai encumbrance on the suit land R. S. No. 5/2 for this purpose a sum of Rs. 1,000, which formed part of the consideration of the sale-deed passed by Ramappa, was left with plaintiff, see exhibit 28. If plaintiff paid Rs. 908 to Government on account of tagai, he paid it as part of the consideration which he was to pay to Ramappa. He paid it as an agent of Ramappa. The principle of subrogation cannot, therefore, apply to plaintiff's case. A person cannot claim subrogation when he simply performs his own obligation. Covenant excludes subrogation and this rule has been applied to a transferee from the purchaser of an equity of redemption with notice of the covenant, see Lakshmi Achi v. Narayanasami, 53 Mad. 188, Thiruvadi v. P. Janaki, 45 M. L. J. 693, and Abdul Razak v. Abdul Rahiman, 65 M. L. J. 390. In paying the tagai the plaintiff was discharging his own obligation.

The same principle which excludes the operation of the principle of subrogation in plaintiff's case also excludes the principle of reimbursement contained in s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act. It has been held that a person purchasing property subject to a charge is alone liable to pay it off, and he is not, therefore, entitled to recover the amount paid by him from the person originally liable in respect of it, see Manindra Chandra v. Jamahir Kumaree, 32 Cal. 643. The High Court of Madras has held that a person who buys immoveable property, subject to a charge for maintenance in favour of a widow, cannot recover from the vendor maintenance money paid by him to the widow, to save the property from sale at the instance of the widow, see Mangalathalmal v. Narayan Swami, 17 M. L. J. 250. The plaintiff in this case purchased R. S. No. 5/2 subject to the tagai encumbrance and he retained with him money on that account out of the consideration of the 1940 sale consideration retained by him, he cannot claim reimbursement from defendant

No. 1 under s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act.

VITHALDAS There can be no doubt that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 will not also be liable under BHAGVANDAS s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act to answer plaintiff's claim, nor can there be any
v. doubt that plaintiff is not entitled to proceed against the suit property in the hands TUKARAM of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 under the said section. All that s. 69 says is that VITHOBA a person who is interested in the payment of money which another is bound by law to pay, and who, therefore, pays it, is entitled to be reimbursed by the other. If, therefore, plaintiff is entitled to claim reimbursement, he can claim it from defendant
No. 1 and not from defendants Nos. 2 and 3. I have already held that even defendant No. 1 is not liable to plaintiff in this suit."

On appeal, the decree was affirmed by the District Judge, for the following reasons :—

"Before the plaintiff can claim the right of subrogation (s. 92), he must show that with regard to the lands in the possession of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 he comes in the category of persons referred to in s. 91 (of the Transfer of Property Act). This point appears to have escaped the notice of the learned Judge below. The appellant's counsel says that his client comes within the description of persons mentioned in cl. (a) to s. 91. That clause refers to 'any person (other than the mortgagor of the interest sought to be redeemed) who has any interest in, or charge upon, the property mortgaged, or in or upon the right to redeem the same!' Now under the sale deed exhibit 28, by which the appellant purchased the two S. Nos. 5/2 and 124 the appellant did not get any interest in the two survey Nos. 381 and 382 mortgaged by Ramappa to defendant No. 3. The payment by him to Government of the tagai dues cannot, therefore, secure to him the mortgage rights of Government in these two survey numbers, which were redeemed by the appellant, for the simple reason that the principle of subrogation cannot be invoked in favour of a mere volunteer or stranger. The plaintiff's claim against defendant No. 3 is, therefore, untenable on this ground alone. Besides, the payment to the Government was in reality by the mortgagor himself and not the present plaintiff. The tagai dues were discharged out of a part of the consideration amount which was left by the vendor with the present plaintiff specifically for that purpose. The plaintiff was merely an instrument or agent of the mortgagor for making the payment. As a mortgagor paying a prior debt is not himself entitled to subrogation it is clear that where he employs an agent to secure the mortgage, the agent also is not entitled to subrogation for the simple reason that the agent cannot be clothed with a higher right than his principal. In the present case on a perusal of the contents of the sale-deed, exhibit 28, there can be absolutely no doubt that the payment made by the plaintiff was on behalf of his vendor Ramappa and out of funds belonging to Ramappa. It is true that in a recent full bench case of Tota Ram v. Ram Lal (54 All. 897) the Allahabad High Court has repudiated this doctrine of agency which has been recognized by its earlier decisions. The reasoning on which their Lordships' decision is based is, however, not acceptable to me. The facts in the Allahabad case were also quite different. In the present case there can be no doubt that the payment, though nominally, by the present plaintiff was in effect and to all intents and purposes by the mortgagor. The present plaintiff, therefore, cannot, on the principle of subrogation, claim rights in S. Nos. 5/2 or S. Nos. 381 and 382 for the reason that his principal, the mortgagor, for whom he made the payments to Government, is not entitled to such rights. Even if the doctrine of agency were not to be applied, the plaintiff has no case against defendant No. 3 who is in possession of S. Nos. 381 and 382; for the plaintiff had no interest such as is contemplated by s. 91 of the Transfer of Property Act in those survey numbers, when he made the payments to Government. It is, however, different with regard to S. No. 5/2. The plaintiff had an interest in that survey number as he had actually purchased it along with S. No. 124 under the sale-deed though the sale with regard to S. No. 5/2 was subsequently held to be invalid. But a purchaser of mortgaged property who has paid off the mortgages on the property is entitled after the sale is found to be invalid to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee whom he has paid off. He is not a mere volunteer, because when he discharged the mortgage, he did so by virtue of his claim as purchaser and had an interest to protect. However, as I have already remarked, the payment being in reality by the plaintiff's vendor and not by himself he cannot get the relief which he has claimed against defendant No. 2 who is in possession of this survey number. For these reasons I hold that the plaintiff's suit was properly dismissed."

VITHOBA

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. Defendant No. 1, having died pending the hearing of the appeal, was represented by his sons Tukaram and others.

H. C. Coyajee, with G. R. Madbhavi, for the appellant.

S. R. Parulekar, for respondents Nos. 2 and 3.

BROOMFIELD J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a decree of the District Judge of Bijapur confirming a decree of the Joint Subordinate Judge of Bijapur, who dismissed a suit brought by the plaintiff for reimbursement or contribution.

The plaintiff's claim was put forward in the following circumstances. One Ramappa who was the father of defendant No. 1 was the owner of four fields, survey Nos. 5/2, 381, 382 and 124. In October-November, 1927, Ramappa borrowed Rs. 1,000 from Government under the Land Improvement Loans Act for the improvement of survey No. 5/2. By virtue of s. 7 of the Act Government therefore has the right to recover the money with interest from the borrower personally, or out of the land for the benefit of which the loan was granted, or out of properties given as collateral security that is in the present case survey Nos. 381, 382 and 124. It is provided in the same section that it is in the discretion of the Collector to determine the order in which he will resort to the various modes of recovering the moneys which are recoverable as if they were arrears of land-revenue. On November 26, 1929, Ramappa mortgaged survey Nos. 381 and 382 to defendant No. 3. On January 25, 1932, he sold survey Nos. 5/2 and 124 to the plaintiff. The consideration for the sale was Rs. 5,000, and the sale deed (exhibit 28) provided that out of this sum Rs. 1,000 was to be kept with the purchaser (plaintiff) for discharging the tagai debt. Prior to this in 1930 defendant No. 2 had obtained a money decree against Ramappa and he attached survey No. 5/2 four days before the plaintiff's purchase. Subsequently on February 4, 1933, defendant No. 2 purchased that survey number in execution proceedings. The tagai debt due to Government was paid off by the plaintiff in three instalments—one of Rs. 150 paid on May 27, 1932, one of Rs. 150 paid on March 18, 1933, and the final instalment of Rs. 600 paid on November 13, 1934. On March 23, 1933, the plaintiff brought a suit against defendant No. 2 to recover possession of survey No. 5/2, but the suit failed because it was held that defendant No. 2 had a prior claim in view of the fact that he had attached the land before the sale of it to the plaintiff. The suit in which the present appeal arises was filed by the plaintiff in June, 1935. He claimed to have a charge on survey Nos. 5/2, 381, and 382 and to be entitled to recover the amount paid by him to Government from defendants Nos. 1, 2

A. C. J. and 3. As I have mentioned, the plaintiff failed in both the lower Courts.
 1940 He there relied partly on s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act and partly on — s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act.
 VITHALDAS Section 92 deals with the rule about what is called subrogation. In s. 91
 BHAGVANDAS certain persons other than the mortgagor are stated to be entitled to redeem
 v. a mortgage; and s. 92 provides that if any of these persons does in fact TUKARAM redeem a mortgage, he has the same rights as regards redemption, fore-VITHOBA closure or sale as the mortgagee whose mortgage he has redeemed has against — the mortgagor or any other mortgagee. That is provided in the first para-Broomfield J. graph of s. 92, and the third paragraph provides this:

“A person who has advanced to a mortgagor money with which the mortgage has been redeemed shall be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage has been redeemed, if the mortgagor has by a registered instrument agreed that such persons shall be so subrogated.”

By virtue of s. 59A of the Act the word “mortgagor” includes “persons deriving title from a mortgagor,” so that if the plaintiff comes within the terms of s. 92 he would have the same rights as Government not only against defendant No. 1 who borrowed the money from Government but also against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 who derived their rights from defendant No. 1.

There are however obvious difficulties in the way of the application of s. 92 to this case. In the first place there was in fact no mortgage to Government. There was a statutory charge in favour of Government in respect of survey No. 5/2 and also the three fields given as collateral security. But it was not a mortgage. Assuming however that that difficulty could be got over, it has been held, by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Hira Singh v. Jai Singh,<sup>1</sup> that where part of the consideration for sale of land is retained by the purchaser for the discharge of incumbrances on the land that money is to be regarded as the money of the vendor, and therefore the purchaser is not entitled to subrogation under the first paragraph of s. 92. He may or may not come under the third paragraph, but in the present case it is clear that the plaintiff cannot come under the third paragraph because there is no registered agreement giving him the right of subrogation. The same view of the construction of s. 92 has been taken by a full bench of the Madras High Court in Lakshmi Amma v. Sankara Narayana Menon.<sup>2</sup>

In view of these authorities the learned counsel for the appellant has conceded that he cannot rely on the doctrine of subrogation. He does not now claim that his client has any charge over the lands in suit and argues merely that he is entitled to a personal decree against the defendants by reason of the equitable principle enunciated in s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act. According to that section “a person who is interested in the payment of money which another is bound by law to pay, and who therefore pays it, is entitled to be reimbursed by the other.” But the same reasoning which rules out s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act appears to render s. 69 of the Indian Contract Act also inapplicable. If the repayment of the tagai loan to Government is to be regarded as the act of the vendor Ramappa, and not the act of the plaintiff, the purchaser, the plaintiff, obviously does not come within the terms of s. 69. Moreover, even if it were possible to say that there was a payment by the plaintiff within the meaning of s. 69, it was a payment which he was bound to make under the terms of his agreement with Ramappa, and it would not therefore be open to him to say that it was a payment which some other person was bound to make.

Mr. Coyajee relied on Dakshina Mohun Roy Chowdhry v. Saroda Mohun Roy Chowdhry,<sup>1</sup> where Lord Macnaghten said in the course of his judgment (p. 163) :—

"...it seems to their Lordships to be common justice that when a proprietor in good faith pending litigation makes the necessary payments for the preservation of the estate in dispute, and the estate is afterwards adjudged to his opponent, he should be recouped what he has so paid by, the person who ultimately benefits by the payment,..."

Section 69 of the Indian Contract Act was not mentioned in the judgment, but the principle relied upon seems to be the same, and that principle does not apply if the legal effect of the transaction between the plaintiff and Ramappa was that Ramappa paid the money and not the plaintiff. Incidentally I may say that the plaintiff's good faith is by no means clear, since all the payments which he made to Government were made after the attachment of the survey No. 5/2 and the final payment was made after defendant No. 2 had actually got possession of the land.

We were also referred to Muhammad Siddiq Khan v. Muhammad Nasir-ul-lah Khan.<sup>2</sup> In that case part of the consideration for a sale of land was retained by the vendees for the purpose of partially discharging the encumbrances on the land, the vendor being bound to supply the rest of the money necessary for the purpose. Their Lordships held that the money retained by the vendees was not to be regarded as a deposit of the vendor's money on which the vendor was entitled to get interest. They did not say that the money was not the vendor's money, and I think that there is nothing in this case inconsistent with the view taken by the Full Benches of the Allahabad and Madras High Courts. The Privy Council case therefore appears to be of no material assistance to the plaintiff.

It may be a case of some hardship as the plaintiff has not got the full benefit of his repayment of the tagai loan to Government, whereas the other defendants have benefited by it in proportion to the land in which they are interested. But in our opinion the lower Courts were clearly right in holding that the plaintiff's suit was misconceived and that his only legal remedy was to sue defendant No. 1, his vendor, for damages. The appeal therefore must be dismissed with costs.

THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

v.

NARAYAN GOVIND NADGIR.* •

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 53—Watan property inherited by son from father—Father's debts—Liability of son under decree to extent of inherited property—Execution of decree against property in hands of son, whether proper—Pleadings—Admission in pleading by party to suit—Whether party bound by such admission in other suit.

Watan property inherited by a son from his father is not exposed to liability to execution under s. 53 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, for the payment of the father's debts. The fact that the son is made liable under the decree to the extent of the property inherited by him does not by itself make the watan property liable to execution under the section.

A party is not bound by an admission in his pleading except for the purposes of the suit in which the pleading is delivered. Where a party is prepared in a particular suit to deal with the case on a particular ground and makes an admission, that admission is not binding on him in any other suit, and certainly not for all time.

EXECUTION.

In a suit filed by one Laxmanrao, against the Secretary of State for India in Council (plaintiff), and Shrinivas, Narayan and Venkaji (defendants Nos. 1 to 3), the Privy Council made an order on June 28, 1927 [Laxmanrao v. Shrinivas, 29 Bom. L. R. 1484] that costs should be paid by the plaintiff and the defendants. In April 1929 the plaintiff paid these costs in full, which amounted to Rs. 13,649-6-5, on his own-behalf and on behalf of the three defendants.

The plaintiff thereafter filed a suit against the defendants to recover contribution from them and a decree was passed on November 26, 1934, directing contribution. Defendant No. 3 was made liable to the extent of the property he had inherited from his father, who was the original defendant.

The plaintiff then took out the present darkhast against the defendants in execution of the decree obtained by him. The defendants contended that the lands sought to be attached were watan lands which could not be attached under s. 13 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act, 1874.

* Cross First Appeals Nos. 204 and 275 of 1937, (with Civil Applications Nos. 1040 of 1937 and 9 of 1939), from the decision of G. A. Balse, First Class Subordinate Judge at Dharwar, in Special Darkhast No. 128 of 1933.

The trial Judge held, as against defendant No. 1, that the lands which were sought to be attached were not watan lands, and in the case of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 he held that their lands were nadgirki watan lands. He observed as follows in his judgment :—

“ Only the watan property assigned as remuneration of an officiator under s. 23 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bombay Act No. III of 1874) is not liable to process of any civil Court (vide s. 13 of the aforesaid Act). Hence it is on the judgment-debtors Nos. 2 and 3 to show that the lands in dispute are such watan property. They rely on para. 12 of exhibit 46 which is a copy of written statement filed by the present darkhastdar in Original Suit No. 2 of 1913, of which the suit in which the decree now under execution is passed, was an off-shoot. In that paragraph the present darkhastdar has admitted that the nadgir watan lands were assigned for nadgirki, that is to say, for nadgir services. It is argued for the darkhastdar that that admission is wrong. Reliance is placed in this connection only on the observations in the Privy Council judgment reported in 29 Bom. L. R. 1484, which was the final decision in suit No. 2 of 1913 referred to above. It will, however, appear from that Privy Council judgment that there was no question about nadgirki lands in that proceeding which related only to the lands, which were claimed as patilki and kulkarniki watan lands. Hence the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council cannot be taken to apply to the nadgirki lands, with which we are now concerned. This being so, there is nothing to show that the present darkhastdars' admission relied on by the judgment-debtors is wrong. And in view of that admission I hold that the lands were assigned for nadgirki service, and that they, as such, come under s. 23 of the above-mentioned Bombay Hereditary Offices Act. Hence I hold that under s. 13 of the Act the lands of judgment-debtors Nos. 2 and 3 are not liable to attachment.

Even assuming for the sake of argument that the lands in the hands of judgment-debtor No. 3 sought to be attached are not assigned for nadgirki, I hold that they are not liable to attachment in view of the ruling in Vithaldas v. Shrinivasrao, 58 Bom. 218, because it is not defendant No. 3's own property but his father's property that was held liable by the decree under execution.

The learned pleader for the darkhastdar relies on the ruling in 58 Bom. 273 (Vishvanath v. Keshavbhat), where it has been held that in the execution of a decree against the father and his minor sons, the life interest of the sons in the watan property can be attached and sold. That case is, however, distinguishable from the present one, inasmuch as in that case there was a decree against the sons themselves, while in this case the decree is practically against the father alone, in that it holds only the father's property liable for the decretal debts.”

mately paid those costs in full, and then he filed this suit to recover contribution from his co-defendants, and a decree was passed on November 26, 1934, directing contribution. In the case of defendant No. 3, it had been stated by an amendment of the plaint that the original defendant had died, and his son defendant No. 3 was held to be liable to the extent of the property he got inherited from his father. The Secretary of State for India then took out the present darkhast in order to execute the decree against the three defendants. The contention of all the defendants was that the lands sought to be attached were watan lands, and that they could not be attached by virtue of the protection afforded under s. 13 of the Watan Act. As against defendant No. 1, the learned Judge held, in view of certain admissions made by that defendant in the witness-box, that the lands which were sought to be attached were not watan lands. In the case of the other two defendants, he held, basing his decision on the Record of Rights, that the lands were nadgirki watan lands. I am not quite sure whether he merely meant to hold that the lands of defendant No. 1 were not shown on the Record of Rights as nadgirki watan lands, or whether he meant to hold that the admission of defendant No. 1 would rebut the presumption arising from the entry in the Record of Rights that they were nadgirki watan lands. I am rather disposed to think that there is no distinction between the lands held by defendant No. 1 and the lands held by defendants Nos 2 and 3. However, having held that the lands of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 were watan lands, it was then necessary to establish that they had been assigned as remuneration for services under s. 23 of the Watan Act, because, unless they had been so assigned, the protection afforded by s. 13 does not arise.

There is really no evidence on the record to show that any of these lands had been assigned under s. 23 as reward for services. The learned Judge, in the case of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, held that Government were bound by an admission in their written statement filed in the original suit of 1913 in which the costs were incurred, and that by that admission Government had acknowledged that the lands had been assigned as reward for services; but the learned Judge's view on that point is clearly wrong. A party is not bound by an admission in his pleading except for the purposes of the suit in which the pleading is delivered. It frequently happens that a party is prepared in a particular suit to deal with the case on a particular ground and to make an admission, but that admission is not binding in any other suit, and certainly not for all time. Government may have known much less about the position in 1913 than they know now. If they had pleaded erroneously in the suit of 1913 and had discovered the error in time, they could have amended the pleading, and it would be a strange thing to hold that, after the suit had been disposed of, and the chance to amend the pleading had gone, Government were bound for all time by their admission. In my opinion there is no evidence on record that the lands of any of the defendants had been assigned by the Collector under s. 23 of the Watan Act and that, therefore, the protection afforded by s. 13 came into operation.

But in the case of defendant No. 3, there is a separate defence. As I have pointed out, the decree sought to be executed provides that he is liable to the extent of the property he got inherited from his father, and, of course, the executing Court is bound by the decree. Therefore, if he inherited this watan property from his father, that property is liable. But on the authority of the cases, to which the learned trial Judge referred [viz. Vithaldas v. Shrinivasrao,<sup>1</sup> Vishvanath v. Keshavbhat<sup>2</sup> and Jagjivandas Javerdas v. Imdad Ali<sup>3</sup>], it is, I think, established that a son does not inherit watan property from his father at any rate to the extent of making that property liable for the father's debts. As was pointed out by this Court in Vithaldas v. Shrinivasrao, to hold that watan property was liable for the father's debts, like other property of a Hindu father, would really be to go behind the prohibition contained in s. 5 of the Watan Act, which prevents a watandar from alienating or mortgaging watan property beyond the term of his own life. The learned Government Pleader seeks to distinguish the cases of Vithaldas v. Shrinivasrao and Vishvanath v. Keshavbhat on the ground that the decrees in these cases were ordinary money decrees against the father, whereas here there is an express provision that the decree may be executed against the property of the father inherited by the son; but that does not really carry the matter any further, because in my view the effect of the decisions of this Court is to show that watan property is not to be regarded as property inherited by the son, so as to expose it to liability to execution under s. 53 of the Civil Procedure Code. Whether it can be regarded as inherited for other purposes, it is not necessary for us to consider. I think, therefore, that the learned Judge's decision was right as to defendant No. 3.

In the case of defendant No. 1, I think that his decision was also right, although I base my opinion on different grounds from those which appealed to the learned Judge. We are told that defendant No. 1 has died since the date of the decree appealed from and that his widow has been brought on record. Of course, a question may arise in execution how far the property can be attached as against the widow of defendant No. 1, but we are not concerned with that. The appeal of defendant No. 1 must be dismissed, because the decree only dealt with his liability during his lifetime.

The result will, therefore, be that the appeal of defendant No. 1 will be dismissed with costs, and the appeal of Government, First Appeal No. 275, will be allowed with costs as against defendant No. 2 but, dismissed with costs as against defendant No. 3 in proportion to the claims of defendants Nos. 2 and 3.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 10—Stay of suit—Suit pending in mofussil Court—Suit subsequently filed on Original Side of High Court—Application for stay of suit in High Court made to Appellate Side Bench of High Court—Whether application competent.

An application under s. 10 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, for stay of suit should be made to the Court which is actually seized of the case.

An application under s. 10 of the Civil Procedure Code was made on the Appellate Side of the High Court to stay a suit which was instituted on its Original Side until the decision of a previously instituted suit between the same parties in a Court in the mofussil. On the question whether the application to the Appellate Side Bench of the High Court was competent :—

Held, that the application should be made on the Original Side to the Judge trying the suit.

APPLICATION for stay of suit.

On January 1, 1940, one Nagappa (applicant) filed a suit (No. 4 of 1940) against Ramsing and Atmasing (opponents Nos. 1 and 2) in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Sholapur for a declaration that a promissory note executed by him in favour of opponent No. 2 was not binding on him and for its cancellation. While this suit was pending opponent No. 1, as assignee of opponent No. 2, on January 9, 1940, filed a suit (No. 38 of 1940) on the aforesaid promissory note against the applicant and two others on the Original Side of the High Court.

On April 8, 1940, the applicant under s. 10 of the Civil Procedure Code, made the present application to the Appellate Side Bench of the High Court for stay of opponent No. 1's suit filed on the Original Side of the High Court on the ground that the High Court suit was a later instituted suit.

The application was heard.

G. N. Thakor with T. N. Walawalkar, for the applicant.

F. J. Coltman with Haridas & Co., for the opponents.

BROOMFIELD J. This is an application under s. 10 of the Civil Procedure Code to stay a suit which has been instituted on the Original Side of this Court until the decision of a previously instituted suit in the Sholapur First Class Subordinate Judge's Court.

Mr. Coltman who appears for the opponents has taken a preliminary objection that the application should be made on the Original Side. We think he is right. He relies on r. 344 of the High Court Original Side Rules. But in our opinion the matter is made sufficiently clear by the language of s. 10 itself. The section provides that no Court shall proceed with the trial of any suit in which the matter in issue is also directly and substantially in issue in a previously instituted suit between the same parties. It is a reasonable inference in our opinion that an application asking the Court not to proceed with the trial should normally be made to the Court which is actually seized of the case. According to my experience that is also in accordance with the general practice.

Mr. Thakor for the applicant says that so far the case has not been assigned to any particular Judge on the Original Side. But in due course the assignment will be made and when it is made his client can apply. As held in Mulchand Raichand v. Gill & Co.<sup>1</sup> the Judge on the Original Side could, if necessary, restrain the parties from proceeding with the suit in the mofussil Court. If the Judge declined to make an order under s. 10 an appeal would then lie to an Appellate Bench as held in Jivanlal Narsi v. Pirojshaw Vakaria & Co.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Thakor has relied on a case, Lachmandas Tulshiram v. The Buckingham and Carnatic Co. Ltd.,<sup>3</sup> in which my learned brother and myself held that an Appellate Side Bench of this Court has power under s. 24 of the Code to transfer a suit pending on the Original Side of the High Court for trial to a Court in the mofussil. In coming to that conclusion we were partly influenced by the fact that there was a precedent, whereas in this case no precedent has been referred to, and we were also impressed by the circumstance that it is at least doubtful whether a Judge on the Original Side would have power to make the order of transfer which we were asked to make under s. 24. It is unnecessary, however, to decide whether we have or have not jurisdiction to make the order which we are asked to make in the present case, because we are quite satisfied that even if we have jurisdiction, we ought not to exercise it. We consider that the proper and convenient procedure is that the application should be made on the Original Side to the Judge trying the suit, and we apprehend that all sorts of difficulties might arise if applications of this kind were to be entertained on the Appellate Side.

For these reasons we discharge the rule with costs.

Rule discharged.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 289—Trial by jury—No evidence against accused—Direction by Judge to jury—Acquittal of accused.

In a case tried by a jury if the Judge comes to the conclusion that there is no evidence to go to the jury, it is the duty of the Judge to direct the jury that in law they must acquit.

It is the function of the jury to determine whether the evidence is true, and if the Judge thinks that the prosecution evidence, if true, will lead to a conviction, then he is bound to leave the case to the jury. He may think that the prosecution story is inherently improbable, that the evidence is discrepant, and that it is of a class which is generally unreliable; but if he thinks that though weak the evidence if true will justify a conviction, he must leave the case to the jury, cautioning them about the weak points in the evidence.

If, however, the Judge, after the prosecution case is closed, comes to the conclusion that, assuming that the jury believe every word of the prosecution evidence, nevertheless they will not be justified in convicting, then he is bound in law to say so and to direct the jury that in law they must bring in a verdict of not guilty, and he ought not in such a case to leave the matter to the jury.

THIS was a trial for theft in the High Court Sessions before Macklin J. and a common jury.

The accused Thokarsi Narsi was a mehta and cashier in the service of Sulleman, Mithai & Co., Ltd., in Bombay. He was one of the two cashiers employed by the company. The duties of the cashiers were to note particulars of a hundi presented for payment in the presentation book, to check the hundies in order to see whether they should be honoured, and to pay the amount of the hundies.

There was a room in the office of the company where the typist of the company used to work. In that room there was a cupboard in which printed forms of hundies were kept. They were bound in books, and the forms were serially numbered. The cupboard also contained stationery of the company. It had two keys. Each one of the two cashiers had a key. At the start of work every morning the cashier unlocked the cupboard, and it remained open during office hours; in the evening the cupboard was locked again. During office hours any clerk in the office had access to the cupboard.

In March, 1939, the company sent one Ratansi up country to purchase cotton, and was given a book of hundi forms for the purpose of drawing hundies for the price of cotton purchased by him. On March 8, 1939, Ratansi drew a hundi for Rs. 5,000 and cashed it with one Achratlal Hiralal. The hundi so drawn bore printed number 1604. On the same day Ratansi wrote a letter to the company intimating to them the drawing of the hundi.

In the ordinary course the hundi would be presented for payment within two or three days after it was drawn. It was not so presented. Thokarsi (accused No. 1) was therefore asked by the directors of the company not to honour the hundi on presentation without their permission.

On May 5, 1939, a hundi for Rs. 5,000 purporting to be drawn by Ratansi and to bear No. 1604 was presented at the office of the company for payment. Accused No. 1 informed the directors of the company about the hundi, and acting upon their instructions refused payment of the hundi.

The hundi in question bore some other number, which appeared to have been changed into 1604. The signature of Ratansi appeared to have been forged. It was presented for payment by the New Citizen Bank of India, Ltd., for collection and payment into the account of one Shamji Damji, who could not be traced.

On examination of forms of hundi books kept in the company's cupboard it was found that a hundi-form bearing the serial number 1904 together with its counterfoil was missing from its book.

Accused Nos. 1 and 2 were cousins. Accused No. 2 used to live as a boarder in the same building as accused No. 1, and used to sleep in the passage of the building. He was without employment. Accused No. 1 had a Home Savings account with the Central Bank of India, Ltd. On May 1, 1939, he drew from the account a sum of Rs. 85 by a withdrawal order drawn in favour of self and endorsed into the name of accused No. 2. On the same day accused No. 2 opened an account in the New Citizen Bank of India, Ltd., in the name of Shamji Damji and paid Rs. 150 into it. The bank rules required an initial minimum payment of Rs. 100 for the opening of the account. On May 4, 1939, accused No. 2 withdrew Rs. 130 from the account, and paid in a hundi for Rs. 5,000 to be collected from Sulleman Mitha & Co., Ltd. The bank presented the hundi for payment on May 5, 1939. It appeared that the signature of Ratansi on the hundi was in the handwriting of accused No. 2. The endorsement on the reverse of the hundi and a letter giving authority to the bank to deliver the proceeds of the hundi were in the handwriting of accused No. 3.

On May 6, 1939, the company lodged a complaint with the police.

On May 8, 1939, accused Nos. 1 and 2 were found talking with each other for 15 to 20 minutes in the building where accused No. 1 resided.

On these facts the three accused were tried before Macklin J. and a common jury on February 29, 1940. The presiding Judge charged the jury as regards all the accused. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as against all the accused. The Judge sentenced accused No. 1 to suffer rigorous imprisonment for five years, and the other two accused to like imprisonment for three years each.

On August 27, 1940, the Advocate General of Bombay issued a certificate under cl. 26 of the Letters Patent that "in my judgment whether the omission to direct the jury hereinbefore specified is an error in law and amounts in law to a misdirection, should be further considered by this Hon'ble Court."

On October 4, 1940, the case was thereupon reconsidered by a full bench consisting of Beaumont C. J., Broomfield J. and Wassoodew J.

THOKARSI

Sir Jamshedji Kanga. The matter comes up before the Court under cl. 26 of the Letters Patent. There is no evidence against accused No. 1 to connect him with the offence with which he is charged. There is nothing against him beyond mere suspicion. The error here lies in the fact that the trial Judge did not point out to the jury that there was no evidence against accused No. 1. In doing so, he has contravened the provisions of s. 289(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

A. C. Beynon. According to the English practice the Judge is not bound to withdraw the case from the jury in the absence of a submission : Frederrick Jackson.<sup>1</sup> The term used in s. 289(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code is "may" and not "must". Refers to Queen-Empress v. Vajiram,<sup>2</sup> which approves Queen-Empress v. Munna Lal,<sup>3</sup> and Makbul Khan v. The King-Emperor.<sup>4</sup>

BEAUMONT C. J. This matter comes before the Court on a certificate given by the Advocate General under cl. 26 of the Letters Patent. Under cl. 25 there is no appeal from a decision in the Sessions Court, but under cl. 26, the Advocate General may certify the matter to the Court if he thinks that there has been some error in law on a matter which requires further consideration. Many people, including myself, think that it is very wrong that there should be no appeal, at any rate on points of law, from a trial in Sessions in this Court. But, however that may be, in law there is no appeal.

The learned Advocate General in deciding whether to give a certificate, and this Court in dealing with any matter which he has certified, is in a difficulty where the case is not one of murder, because owing to the insufficient number of shorthand writers supplied to the Court no shorthand note is taken of the learned Judge's charge to the jury. It is only in murder cases that a note is taken.

The ground on which the learned Advocate General has certified that the case should be reconsidered is that he thinks that a question arises whether the learned Judge should not have withdrawn the case from the jury on the ground that there was no evidence to go before them. In determining that question it would assist us to know from the charge to the jury what view the learned Judge took of the evidence. However, fortunately the learned Judge made a full note of the evidence and we can ascertain from that what the real case was.

There were three accused, and the general nature of the case was this. The present appellant, if I may so call him, accused No. 1, was one of the two cashiers with Messrs. Sulleman Mitha & Co., Ltd., Bombay. In the month of March 1939 Sulleman Mitha & Co. sent an agent named Ratansi into the Broach District to buy cotton. He bought certain cotton and drew a hundi on the firm by way of payment, cashed that hundi with one Achratlal or Amratlal Hiralal of Broach, and notified his firm of Sulleman Mitha & Co. on the same day by exhibit B that he had drawn such a hundi. The number of the hundi was 1604; and the evidence is that Ratansi took with him a book of forms of hundies, and it was from this book that he withdrew the form 1604 and filled it up in favour of the payee for Rs. 5,000. The evidence of the two directors of Sulleman Mitha & Co., who were called, is that in the normal course a hundi is presented for payment within a day or two after they have been notified that it has been drawn, and, having been presented, it would be the duty of one of the cashiers to check the particulars of the hundi, and if there was nothing suspicious about it, he would pay it, as he would have seen in the ordinary course the notification that the hundi had been drawn, and would probably have no difficulty in deciding whether it was a hundi which should be honoured. But in the case of this hundi, No. 1604, it was not presented for payment within the normal time, and accordingly the directors instructed accused No. 1 as cashier not to pay it when it was presented without reference to them. The hundi was dated March 8, and these instructions were given, I suppose, about the 10th or 11th. On May 5, hundi No. 1604 was presented for payment to Sulleman Mitha & Co. It was apparently received by some other clerk. Accused No. 1 says he was not in the office, and the particulars were entered in a book by that other clerk. But then accused No. 1 as cashier was informed about the presentation of this hundi, and he at once informed the two directors of the firm who told him not to honour it without further instructions. They then enquired into the matter. The hundi had been presented through a bank, called the New Citizen Bank, and they found that it had been paid into an account with that Bank in the name of Shamji Damji, and it was not found possible to trace Shamji Damji. The directors also thought that the signature on the hundi was not that of Ratansi, their agent. Therefore they placed the matter in the hands of the Police, and I think we must take it for the purposes of this reference that it was definitely proved that accused No. 2 was the man into whose account this hundi had been paid, that Shamji Damji was a fictitious name taken by accused No. 2, and that accused No. 2 had forged the body of the hundi. The endorsements on the hundi, according to the evidence, had been forged by accused No. 3. But there is no suggestion that accused No. 1 had forged any part of the hundi. The actual charges against accused No. 1 were two.

"First :—That you, accused No. 1, Thokarsi Narsi between the 8th day of March 1939 and the 5th day of May 1939, at Bombay, being employed as a Mehta and cashier of Sulleman Mitha & Co., Ltd., Bombay, committed theft by stealing page No. 1904 from an hundi Book (Ex. D) in the possession of the said Sulleman Mitha & Co., Ltd., Bombay, and thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 381 of the Indian Penal Code....."

"Secondly : That you, accused No. 1, Thokarsi Narsi, at the time and place aforesaid, abetted the commission by accused No. 2, Khiasi Asaria, of the offence of forging a valuable security, which offence was committed in consequence of your abetment and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under Sections 109 and 467 of the Indian Penal Code...."

The suggestion is that the forged hundi, which purports to bear the number 1604, had in fact been written on a blank form, and the number had been altered. It looks as if both numbers '6' and '0' had been altered, but the

F. B. suggestion is that the original number of the form used was 1904, and the 1940 reason for that suggestion is that in the hundi book kept by the firm form — No. 1904 is missing. So that the prosecution case seems to be this, that the EMPEROR hundi No. 1604, which was a genuine hundi, was stolen. The evidence is
 v. that it was sent by post from Broach to the payee's agent in Bombay in order THOKARSI to be cashed, and that in fact it never arrived. So, probably it was stolen, NARSI and it may be that originally it was intended to present that hundi, perhaps — with a forged endorsement, for payment, but that was not done. Whether Beaumont C.J. the hundi met with some accident or not, I do not know. But the suggestion — is that, not being able to present the original hundi, the conspirators got another form with a number which could be easily altered to 1604, and they then altered the number and forged the contents of the hundi; so that the charge against accused No. 1 is that he stole the form No. 1904 and thereby enabled the forgery to be committed; and the question is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury on that charge.

Now, the book of forms, from which form No. 1904 was missing, was kept in a cupboard in a part of the office of Sulleman Mitha & Co., which was only occupied by a typist, and the typist was not there all day. It would, I think, have been easy for anybody to come up by the lift and enter this room, and if the typist was out, there would be no difficulty in getting to the cupboard. The door is just next to where the lift comes up. This cupboard was kept locked at night, and each of the two cashiers, including accused No. 1, had a key.
 The other cashier was away when the forged hundi was presented, though he had only gone away early in May, and his key was kept by the directors in his absence. So that, no doubt, accused No. 1 had access to this cupboard in which the forms were kept. But then the evidence of both the directors is that many other people had access to it as well, because stationery and other things were kept in the cupboard, and the cupboard was kept open during the day. It was unlocked by one of the cashiers in the morning, and left open during the day, and as there was only the typist in the room at certain periods, there would be no difficulty in many persons entering this room and taking away forms from the hundi book in the cupboard.

However, the first piece of evidence against accused No. 1 is that he had access to the cupboard from which it is suggested that the form was taken.
 I may say that there is no conclusive evidence to my mind that the forged hundi is on a form which was originally numbered 1904. It looks as if the '6' and the '0' have been altered, but I am quite unable to say from the hundi itself that the original number was 1904. The second figure has been obliterated, and it is no more than a guess that it may have been 9.

Then the next piece of evidence against accused No. 1 is that accused No. 2, who did the major part of the forgery, is his cousin, and they lived in the same building, though not on the same floor. The third piece of evidence is that it is proved that on the first of May, that is seven days before the forged hundi was presented, accused No. 1 drew a cheque on his bank account to self or bearer, and gave that cheque to accused No. 2, who cashed it, endorsing his name on the back of the cheque, because, although it was a bearer cheque, the Bank apparently required anybody cashing it to endorse his name on the back. It is then shown that accused No. 2, very shortly after receiving this money from accused No. 1, opened an account in the name of Shamji Damji at the New Citizen Bank, and for that purpose he had to deposit at least Rs. 100 to open the account, and he did in fact deposit Rs. 150, and it is a justifiable inference that he obtained a part of that Rs. 150 by means of this advance from accused No. 1. But it is not shown that accused No. 1 knew the purposes for which the sum of Rs. 85 was required, or the manner in which it was in fact used. He says that accused No. 2, being his cousin, borrowed the money from him to go upcountry to his native place, and he says, though there is no independent evidence of the fact, that he had advanced him moneys before. That, at any rate, is not improbable, seeing that accused No. 2 was his cousin and had apparently no work. That is the whole of the evidence against accused No. 1.

Mr. Beynon, counsel for the prosecution, in addressing the trial Court, said that he did not stress the charge of theft against accused No. 1, but relied on the abetment of forgery. It is, I think, difficult to see what abetment of forgery there was apart from the alleged theft of the form No. 1904. But the jury brought in a verdict of guilty against accused No. 1, on both charges, by a majority of 8 to 1, and the learned Judge accepted that verdict and sentenced accused No. 1 to five years' rigorous imprisonment.

The question which we have to determine is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that accused No. 1 was guilty. Under s. 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code, if the Court considers that there is no evidence that the accused committed the offence, it may, in a case tried by a jury, direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. No doubt, the word used is "may" and not "must", but it is well settled that if the Judge comes to the conclusion that there is no evidence to go to the jury, it is the duty of the Judge to direct the jury that in law they must acquit. In applying any rule, there are always cases on the border line, and it may be difficult some times to say on which side the particular case falls. But the general principle which governs the present matter is to my mind perfectly clear. It is the function of the jury, in a trial by jury, to determine whether the evidence is true, and if the Judge thinks that the prosecution evidence, if true, will lead to a conviction, then he is bound to leave the case to the jury. He may think that the prosecution story is inherently improbable, that the evidence is discrepant, and that it is of a class which is generally unreliable, for example, the evidence of discharged servants; but if he thinks that though weak the evidence if true will justify a conviction, he must leave the case to the jury, cautioning them, of course, about the weak points in the evidence. But if the Judge, after the prosecution case is closed, comes to the conclusion that, assuming that the jury believe every word of the prosecution evidence, nevertheless they will not be justified in convicting, then he is bound in law to say so and to direct the jury that in law they must bring in a verdict of not guilty, and he ought not in such a case to leave the matter to the jury.

Now, the question here is whether there was any evidence on which the jury could convict, assuming they believed the whole story against accused No. 1 to be true. To my mind there was not. It is perfectly clear that the particular items of evidence against accused No. 1 come to nothing. Any one may have a dishonest cousin, any one may lend money to that cousin, and it is shown that many people besides accused No. 1 had access to the cupboard in which the document alleged to have been stolen was kept. Therefore none of those particular items of evidence can lead to a conviction. But, no doubt, one has to consider their cumulative effect, and it seems to me that the cumulative effect comes at the very most to a case of suspicion. The learned Judge seems to have been most impressed, judging from the memorandum which he has been good enough to supply to the Court, with the fact that very shortly before the forged hundi was presented, accused No. 1 had lent money, or given money, to accused No. 2, without which it might have been difficult or impossible for accused No. 2 to open the account through which the forged hundi was to be presented. But that, at the most, raises mere suspicion. If it had been shown that accused No. 1 knew the purpose for which the money was to be used, that would have been a different matter. But there is no evidence whatever that he knew the purpose for which it was intended, or the manner in which in fact it was used, and it is not by any means unlikely that he lent the money to his cousin because the cousin was in financial difficulties and wanted to go upcountry to his native place. But, at most, the evidence raises a case of suspicion, and I must confess that to my mind, when one looks at the whole of the prosecution evidence, the suspicion is extremely faint. It is proved that accused No. 1 as cashier knew that this hundi No. 1604 was suspect. He had been warned by the directors that if it was presented for payment, he was not to pay it without reference to them; he was to take instructions; and in fact he reported to them the presentation of the hundi. Surely, therefore, if he was in a conspiracy to try and cash a forged hundi on form No. 1604, he would have told his fellow conspirators that it was perfectly useless to go on with the matter. He knew for a fact that the presentation of hundi No. 1604 was not going to lead to payment of Rs. 5,000, but was likely to lead to an enquiry by the Police, and he would have warned his fellow conspirators that they had better take no further steps in the matter. That would have been the course he would probably have adopted, if he had really been in the conspiracy. These observations relating, as they do, rather to the weight of the evidence go beyond the reference, but I have made them because it is only fair to the accused, who will have to take up again the threads of his life, to say that in my view on the materials before the Court there is no case against him even of serious suspicion.

So far as the question of law is concerned, I am clearly of opinion that the learned Judge erred in not ruling that there was no case to go to the jury, and that he ought to have directed the jury that in law they must bring in a verdict of not guilty. That being so, we must set aside the conviction, acquit the accused, and direct that he be released.

Section 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, provides that if the Court considers that there is no evidence that the accused committed the offence, it may, in a case tried by a jury, direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. It confers in terms a discretion on the Judge—a discretion which must be exercised judicially. Where the Judge is satisfied that there is no evidence to go to the jury, he must in his discretion withdraw the case from the jury, or, in other words, direct them to return a verdict of not guilty. The question whether there is any evidence to go before the jury is a question of law.

If the Judge is of opinion that the evidence led for the prosecution is very weak, that there are discrepancies in it, that it is of a type usually found to be unreliable, and that the story is inherently improbable, he is bound to bring such defects to the attention of the jury.

Where, however, the evidence is such that if it is believed by the jury, it must lead to a conviction, the Judge is bound to leave the question to the jury, because it is for them to decide whether the evidence is to be believed or not. If the Judge comes to the conclusion that, assuming that the jury believes the whole of the evidence placed before them, in law they cannot convict the accused, then he is bound to hold that there is no evidence to be placed before the jury, and he is bound to direct them in law to return a verdict of not guilty.

THIS was a trial for murder and abetment of murder before Lokur J. and a special jury in the High Court Sessions.

The murdered man Hussain and his son Noor Mahomed lived in a house in Bhisti Moholla in Bombay. Four or five years before August 1939 a quarrel had taken place between Hussain and one Suleman Adam (a near relation of Dawood Hasham and Suleiman Ahmed, accused Nos. 1 and 2) regarding some satta beta.

On the night of January 22, 1939, at about 11 p.m. when Noor Mahomed returned home he heard some persons shouting abuses from an otla near his house. He found accused Nos. 1 to 3 and one Hasham on the otla.

When Noor Mahomed inquired why he was being abused, accused No. 2 replied by more abuses. The two started abusing each other. From words they soon came to blows.

About that time Hussain, the deceased, as well as the father of accused No. 2 were passing by. They interceded and separated the contestants.

Just then, either Hasham or accused No. 3 or both shouted: "Seize Hussain; do not let him go." Accused Nos. 2 and 3 caught hold of Hussain, who shouted to his son : " Dawood (accused No. 1) has a knife in his hand : run away." Noor Mahomed accordingly ran away to his house.

All of a sudden accused No. 1 jumped down from the otda and stabbed Hussain with a knife on his chest, while he was being held fast by accused Nos. 2 and 3. Accused No. 1 then ran away. Hussain died shortly afterwards.

The whole incident lasted barely a few minutes.

Accused No. 1 was later tried for the offence of murder and accused Nos. 2 and 3 for abetment of the offence before Lokur J. and a special jury.

Lokur J. in his summing-up to the jury, after dealing with the case of accused No. 1, addressed the jury as regards accused Nos. 2 and 3 thus :

" Unless you assumed that there must have been a conspiracy beforehand and in pursuance of the conspiracy accused Nos. 2 and 3 caught hold of Hussain, you cannot say that accused Nos. 2 and 3 abetted the commission of the crime. It is admitted that accused Nos. 2 and 3 did not speak to accused No. 1 nor did accused No. 1 say anything to accused Nos. 2 and 3 or to the deceased before he stabbed the deceased. It was done all of a sudden, and so you cannot hold accused Nos. 2 and 3 guilty of abetting the stabbing of the deceased. Accused Nos. 2 and 3 themselves did not know why they were called upon to seize the deceased Hussain. It may be that Hasham wanted merely to detain Hussain. Hussain had gone there as a peace-maker to settle the quarrel between accused No. 2 and Noor Mahomed. Noor Mahomed ran away, and then Hasham or some one from the crowd may have thought of keeping Hussain in order to settle the dispute once for all. In these circumstances unless there was a previous conspiracy that Hussain should be seized and stabbed, it will be difficult for you to hold accused Nos. 2 and 3 guilty of abetment. But the presence of Hussain there was accidental. It is, therefore, to my mind clear that on the evidence accused Nos. 2 and 3 cannot be held to have conspired with accused No. 1 for stabbing the deceased Hussain."

The case of accused No. 1 as well as the case of accused Nos. 2 and 3 were left to the jury.

The jury returned an unanimous verdict of guilty against accused No. 1 of murder, and of abetment of murder against accused Nos. 2 and 3.

His Lordship accepted the verdict, sentenced accused No. 1 to death, and accused Nos. 2 and 3 to transportation for life, because " they had merely seized the deceased when accused No. 1 stabbed him."

The Advocate General granted a certificate under the Letters Patent that " whether the omission to direct the jury [as regards accused Nos. 2 and 3] is an error of law and amounts in law to a misdirection, should be further considered by this Honourable Court." It was represented to him that it was the duty of the Judge to determine as a matter of law whether any evidence had been given on behalf of the prosecution on which the jury could properly find accused Nos. 2 and 3 guilty on the charge against them, and that having regard to the provisions of s. 289(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code it was the duty of the Judge to direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty.

The case against accused Nos. 2 and 3 was accordingly considered by a full bench consisting of Beaumont C. J., N. J. Wadia J. and Sen J.

A. C. Beynon, for accused Nos. 2 and 3.

P. P. Khambatta, with N. K. Pettigara, Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

BEAUMONT C. J. This case comes before the Court on a certificate of the Advocate General given under cl. 26 of the Letters Patent. He considers that the question, whether the learned Judge should have withdrawn the case from the jury on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury, is a question of law which requires to be considered by this Court.

The case in question was tried by Mr. Justice Lokur and a special jury, and in it three accused were charged with murder and abetment of murder. The actual murder was charged against accused No. 1, and abetment of murder against accused Nos. 2 and 3.

The material facts, which the jury accepted, appear sufficiently from the certificate of the Advocate-General. The murdered man, Hussain Aiman, and his son Noor Mahomed were living in a house in Bhisti Moholla, and on January 22, 1939, about 11 p.m., Noor Mahomed was returning to his house, when he was abused, by accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and a man named Hasham who were sitting on the otla of a house near to his house. A quarrel ensued and a fight started between Noor Mahomed and accused No. 2, and at that stage Hussein, the father of Noor Mahomed, came up and separated the contestants, and either Hasham or accused No. 3 shouted, "Seize Hussein, do not let him go." Thereupon accused Nos. 2 and 3 caught hold of the deceased Hussein. Hussein, when caught, was facing the otla and accused No. 3 was facing Hussein. Whilst Hussein was being held by accused Nos. 2 and 3, he shouted to his son Noor Mahomed "Dawood, (that is accused No. 1) has a knife in his hand, run away." Then Noor Mahomed ran away. Thereupon accused No. 1 jumped down from the otla and stabbed Hussein through the heart, and killed him. Accused No. 1 was found guilty of murder by the jury and was sentenced to be hanged, and no question about his guilt arises.

Accused Nos. 2 and 3 were found guilty of abetment of murder and were sentenced by the learned Judge to transportation for life, and the question before us is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that they were guilty of abetment. Now, the law, I think, is free from doubt. Section 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that if the Court considers that there is no evidence that the accused committed the offence, it may, in a case tried by a jury, direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. That section confers in terms a discretion on the Judge, but it is a discretion which must be exercised judicially, and when one considers the respective functions of the Judge and jury in a trial by jury,—functions which are prescribed in ss. 298 and 299—, it is quite clear that where the Judge is satisfied that there is no evidence to go to the jury, he must in his discretion withdraw the case from the jury, or, in other words, direct them to return a verdict of not guilty. That is clear, because all questions of law have to be decided by the Judge, and the question whether there is any evidence to go before the jury is a question of law. The jury have to decide all questions as to the reliability of the evidence, and it is for them to determine which view of the facts is true. The Judge may consider that the evidence led for the prosecution is very weak, that there are discrepancies in it, that it is of a type usually found to be unreliable, and that the story is inherently improbable. All such defects he ought to bring to the attention of the jury, but if the evidence is such that if it is believed by the jury, it must lead to a conviction, then the Judge is bound to leave the question to the jury, because it is for them to decide whether the evidence is to be believed or not. But if the Judge comes to the conclusion that, assuming that the jury believes the whole of the evidence placed before them, in law they cannot convict the accused, then he is bound to hold that there is no evidence to be placed before the jury, and he is bound to direct them in law to return a verdict of not guilty.

Now, the question is, on which side of the line this case comes. Is it a case of no evidence which can justify a conviction, or is it a case of weak evidence which the jury nevertheless would be entitled to accept? Nobody suggests that the evidence against accused Nos. 2 and 3 is of a convincing character. The learned Judge gave a very full and fair summing-up, indeed so full is the summing-up that both sides have agreed that it is not necessary to have a transcript of the evidence, because the learned Judge has correctly summarised all the material evidence. The bulk of his charge is, of course, directed to the case against accused No. 1, with which we are not concerned, but in the early part of his summing-up he explains to the jury accurately the nature of abetment. He points out that under s. 107 of the Indian Penal Code abetment may be of three characters, either by instigation, or by conspiracy, or by aiding or assisting, and then, at a later stage of his summing-up, he deals with the case against accused Nos. 2 and 3 specifically. There was no evidence that accused Nos. 2 and 3 had instigated accused No. 1 to stab Hussein, but the learned Judge discusses the two other aspects of abetment—active assistance, and previous conspiracy. He points out that as against accused Nos. 2 and 3 there is no evidence at all that they took any active part in the actual stabbing. He also points out that the whole incident took place in a few minutes and that it is not alleged that accused No. 1 shouted out that Hussein should be stabbed. He points out further that if accused Nos. 2 and 3 were looking away from the otla, they could not expect that accused No. 1 would immediately come down from the otla and stab Hussein. He says that abetment requires that the persons abetting must intend to facilitate the commission of the offence. Then he says

“If accused Nos. 2 and 3 did not seize Hussein intending that he should be stabbed by accused No. 1, then they cannot be said to have abetted the commission of the offence by accused No. 1. It was pointed out to you in the course of the arguments that as accused Nos. 2 and 3 were holding Hussein, they could not see what the accused No. 1 was doing as their backs were turned towards him. If accused No. 1 had shouted to accused Nos. 2 and 3, ‘Seize Hussein, I am coming to stab him,’ then they might perhaps have let him go or prevented accused No. 1 from stabbing him. There is no evidence to show that accused Nos. 2 and 3 had their attention directed towards accused No. 1. Unless you assume that there must have been a conspiracy beforehand and in pursuance of that conspiracy accused Nos. 2 and 3 caught hold of Hussein, you cannot say that accused Nos. 2 and 3 abetted the commission of the crime.”

So that the learned Judge seems definitely to express the view that unless the jury found abetment by means of previous conspiracy, there was no evidence of abetment; there was no evidence, that is to say, of actually aiding in the commission of the murder. Then the learned Judge goes on to discuss the evidence relating to previous conspiracy. He says:

"It is admitted that accused Nos. 2 and 3 did not speak to accused No. 1, nor did accused No. 1 say anything to accused Nos. 2 and 3 or to the deceased before he stabbed the deceased. It was done all of a sudden."

Then he says :

"Accused Nos. 2 and 3 themselves did not know why they were called upon to seize the deceased. It may be that Hasham wanted merely to detain Hussein. Hussein had gone there as a peacemaker to settle the quarrel between accused No. 2 and Noor Mahomed. Noor Mahomed ran away and then Hasham or some one from the crowd may have thought of keeping Hussein in order to settle the dispute once for all. In these circumstances unless there was a previous conspiracy that Hussein should be seized and stabbed, it would be difficult for you to hold accused Nos. 2 and 3 guilty of abetment. But the presence of Hussein there was accidental. It is, therefore, to my mind clear that on the evidence accused Nos. 2 and 3 cannot be held to have conspired with accused No. 1 for stabbing the deceased Hussein."

So that the learned Judge has really held that there was no evidence of abetment by active assistance or previous conspiracy, and there was no suggestion of abetment by instigation. I think, therefore, that if the learned Judge's attention had been drawn to s. 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he would have held that there was no evidence to go to the jury. Unfortunately, his attention was not directed to that section, and he left the case to the jury, and, no doubt, much to his surprise and regret, the jury brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty against accused Nos. 2 and 3.

It is argued by Mr. Khambatta for the Crown that in point of fact there was evidence, weak perhaps, but still evidence fit to be left to the jury. The evidence has not been transcribed, and, as I have said, we are judging from the summing-up of the learned Judge. To my mind the learned Judge has ruled upon the question, which it was for him to rule upon, and he has in fact held in his summing-up that there was no evidence against accused Nos. 2 and 3 of abetment, and, if that is so, as a matter of law he was bound to withdraw the case from the jury. There is no material before us which would justify our differing from the learned Judge on his view of the law. The error arises from the fact that, having decided the question of law, and held that there was no evidence to go to the jury, he did not adopt the correct course and direct the jury that in law they were bound to return a verdict of not guilty.

I think, therefore, that we must set aside the verdict of the jury as against accused Nos. 2 and 3. Of course, they might undoubtedly have been held guilty of assault under s. 352, and, therefore, they have not much to complain of, if they have spent some time in prison. We set aside the verdict and sentence as against accused Nos. 2 and 3 and direct that they be acquitted and set at liberty.

Under cl. 10 of the Letters Patent, 1865, the High Court is empowered to remove or suspend from practice an advocate or attorney on "reasonable cause". A wide discretion is given to the High Court in regard to the exercise of disciplinary jurisdiction by the use of the words "reasonable cause."

"Reasonable cause" means professional or other misconduct under s. 10 of the Bar Councils Act, 1926. "Misconduct" is a wide expression and it is not necessary that it should involve moral turpitude. Any conduct which in any way renders a man unfit for the exercise of his profession or is likely to hamper or embarrass the administration of justice by the High Court, or any of the Courts subordinate thereto, amounts to "misconduct."

The High Court has power to remove an advocate or attorney if he is unfit to be entrusted with a professional status and character. If an attorney is found guilty of moral delinquency in his private character, he is liable to be struck off the roll.

An attorney of the High Court sent two notices, under s. 80 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, to a Judge of the Small Cause Court, Bombay, alleging that the Judge had acted with prejudice, bias, and malice, in the course of his judicial duties, that he decided a case in which the attorney figured as a witness not according to his own convictions but to please somebody else, and that the remarks made by him in respect of the evidence of the attorney were false, unjustified, malicious and irrelevant, and that in passing those remarks he did not act honestly, judically, or in good faith. On a petition presented by the Advocate General for taking disciplinary action against the attorney—

Held, (1) that the fact that the allegations were contained in notices under s. 80, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, did not prevent them from being contempt of Court ;

(2) that the Court had to consider the conduct of the attorney as it affected his position as an attorney and his relations to the Court ; and

(3) that the conduct of the attorney in writing the notices to the Judge amounted to a reasonable cause for taking disciplinary action against him under cl. 10 of the Letters Patent, 1865.

DISCIPLINARY action.

In January, 1931, one Vishnabai and others filed a suit in the Small Causes Court, Bombay, against one Choithram Bharmal for recovery of rent.

On February 24, 1931, the suit came on for hearing before S. E. Kurwa, a Judge of the Court, and, there being no appearance for the defendant, an ex parte decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs.

On August 11, 1931, the plaintiffs issued a notice against the defendants' father, Bharmal, to show cause why his name should not be brought on the record as the real defendant, why the decree be not amended, under s. 151. Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and why execution be not issued against him on the ground that he had occupied the premises in the name of his son Choithram.

In the course of the hearing of the notice, one Tulsidas A. Karani, a solicitor of the High Court, was examined as a witness. The Judge was not favourably impressed with the witness' demeanour, and disbelieved his evidence, and severely criticised him in his judgment which he delivered on November 12, 1931. The Judge made the notice absolute and ordered execution to be issued against Bharmal. An appeal against his judgment was made to the Full Court of the Small Causes Court, but it was dismissed on December 9, 1931. Bharmal then applied to the High Court in revision, but his application was dismissed on December 9, 1932.

On March 26, 1936, Karani served a notice, under s. 80 of the Civil Procedure Code, on the Small Cause Court Judge, stating his intention to file a suit against the Judge in the High Court for a declaration that the remarks passed by him in his judgment were false, unjustified, malicious and irrelevant, and that in passing those remarks he did not act honestly, judicially, or in good faith, and for an order that the remarks should be expunged from the judgment.

On August 31, 1937, Karani served another notice, under s. 80, Civil Procedure Code, on the Judge alleging that he had no jurisdiction to pass the ex parte decree, to entertain the application made by the plaintiffs under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, and to pass the false unjustified, malicious, and irrelevant remarks in his judgment.

On November 11, 1937, Karani filed a suit in the High Court against the Judge on the grounds mentioned in the two notices, but the suit was dismissed as the consent of the Governor of Bombay was not obtained to the institution of the suit as required under s. 270 (1) of the Government of India Act, 1935. Karani filed an appeal, but it was dismissed on October 5, 1939. He then applied to the High Court for leave to appeal to the Federal Court of India, but his application was dismissed.

On December 7, 1939, the Registrar of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, presented a petition to the High Court in its disciplinary jurisdiction praying for an inquiry into the conduct of Karani, and for disciplinary action against him.

On March 19, 1940, the High Court issued a notice to Karani to show cause why action under the disciplinary jurisdiction should not be taken against him for the allegations made by him in the two notices.

The Chamber Judge, Mr. Justice B. J. Wadia, made a formal inquiry

On July 31, 1940, the Advocate General was asked by the High Court to submit a petition praying that Karani might be called upon to show cause why disciplinary action should not be taken against him.

On August 22, 1940, the Advocate General presented a petition submitting that Karani was guilty of such conduct as made him unfit to continue on the roll of attorneys of the High Court, and praying that he might be called upon to show cause why his name should not be removed from the roll of attorneys or why he should not be suspended from practice.

BROOMFIELD J. This is an application to the High Court in its disciplinary jurisdiction made by the Advocate General of Bombay in the matter of Tulsidas Amanmal Karani, an attorney of this Court.

The material facts are as follows: In January, 1931, a suit was filed in the Court of Small Causes at Bombay by certain plaintiffs, whose names are not material, against one Choithram Bharmal for the recovery of Rs. 120 for rent. The suit came on for hearing on February 24, 1931, before Mr. S. E. Kurwa, a Judge of the said Court of Small Causes, and an ex parte decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs. On August 11, 1931, the plaintiffs issued a notice against one Bharmal Tilokchand, the father of the defendant in the suit, to show cause why his name should not be brought on record as the real defendant and why the decree should not be amended under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, and why execution should not be issued against him. The allegation was that Bharmal had occupied the premises in question in the name of his son Choithram. In these proceedings several witnesses were examined on behalf of Bharmal of whom one was Karani. The Judge was unfavourably impressed with Karani's demeanour as a witness. He disbelieved his evidence and criticised it with some severity. The notice was made absolute and execution was ordered to be issued against Bharmal. He filed an appeal which was dismissed, and he also went in revision to the High Court but that application was dismissed on December 9, 1932.

On March 26, 1936, Karani served a notice under s. 80 of the Civil Procedure Code on Mr. Kurwa stating his intention to file a suit in the High Court against him for a declaration that the remarks passed by him as Judge of the Small Cause Court against him (Karani) in the judgment in the small cause suit were false, unjustified, malicious and irrelevant, that in passing those remarks Mr. Kurwa did not act honestly, judicially or in good faith, and for the reliefs that the said remarks should be expunged and that Mr. Kurwa should be made to pay the costs. On August 31, 1937, Karani served a further notice under s. 80 alleging that Mr. Kurwa had no jurisdiction to pass the ex parte decree in the small cause suit and that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under s. 151, also that he had no jurisdiction to make the false, unjustified, malicious and irrelevant remarks in his judgment.

On November 11, 1937, Karani filed a suit in the High Court on the grounds intimated in the two notices. Several preliminary issues were raised and one of them was tried first, viz., whether in the absence of the consent of the Governor of Bombay under s. 270(1) of the Government of India Act, 1935, the suit was maintainable. On January 25, 1939, Mr. Justice Blackwell held that the suit was not maintainable as the consent of the Governor of Bombay was not obtained. The suit was accordingly dismissed with costs. Karani appealed, but his appeal was dismissed on October 5, 1939. He then applied for leave to appeal to the Federal Court and this application was refused.

KARANI

Broomfield J.

On December 7, 1939, the Registrar of the Small Causes Court presented a petition to this High Court in its disciplinary jurisdiction. In the petition certain paragraphs from the notice of March 26, 1936, were set out.

"I may state that you were seriously prejudiced and biassed against me by the unwarranted attack made on me on September 11, 1931." (Karani was here apparently referring to certain remarks made about him by counsel appearing for the plaintiffs in the Small Cause Court suit). "The cumulative effect of your false remarks is that I had given false evidence. The aim of the said false remarks is to ruin my career as a legal practitioner. The language and style of the judgment is quite different from that of your own. Evidently you have played in the hands of some designing persons. You have not hesitated even to record my answers incorrectly. [He then referred to an instance of alleged misrecording of his evidence.] In what other ways you abused your powers as a Judge will be proved at the proper time and place. With a view to vindicate my honour and clear up the cloud cast by you on my character as a witness and also as a legal practitioner I have decided to file a suit against you in the High Court of Bombay for a declaration that the remarks passed by you against me are false, unjustified, malicious and irrelevant, that in the passing of the said remarks you did not act honestly, judicially or in good faith, that the said remarks be expunged from the judgment, that you be made to pay the costs of and incidental to the suit, and for such other reliefs as the Court may deem fit to grant."

The Registrar's petition averred that the said notice did not set out the true facts and was a most unbecoming, scandalous and libellous attack on a judicial officer, and prayed for an inquiry into the conduct of the said Karani and for proper disciplinary action against him.

In accordance with the rules of the High Court in these matters, the Chief Justice ordered an inquiry by the Chamber Judge. On March 19, 1940, a notice was issued to Karani to show cause why action under the disciplinary jurisdiction should not be taken against him. Karani put in an affidavit by way of defence but he did not appear in person. On June 25, 1940, which was the first date of hearing before the Chamber Judge, Mr. Justice B. J. Wadia, he was represented by a solicitor who, according to the Judge's note of the proceedings, applied for a week's adjournment in order to communicate with his client about the charges and to induce him to apologise. The adjournment was granted and on July 2, 1940, the second date of the hearing, Karani was again absent and his solicitor withdrew from the inquiry. The following formal charges were drawn up by the Chamber Judge :

1. That you Tulsidas Amanmal Karani, a solicitor of this Honourable Court, in your notice, dated March 26, 1936, addressed to Mr. S. E. Kurwa, a Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, did accuse the said learned Judge of acting with prejudice, bias and malice in the course of his judicial duties.

2. That you did also in the said notice accuse the said learned Judge of playing into the hands of some designing persons and of delivering a judgment different in language and style from his own.

3. That you did in the said notice accuse the said learned Judge of having abused his powers as a Judge and of not acting honestly, judicially or in good faith.

Mr. Justice B. J. Wadia held that all the charges had been clearly proved and reported accordingly. In accordance with the rules the Advocate General was then instructed by the Chief Justice and Judges to present the present petition.

The Advocate General in his petition submits that Karani has been guilty of conduct which makes him unfit to continue on the roll of attorneys of this High Court, and prays that his name be removed from the roll of attorneys or that he be suspended from practice.

The opponent was represented before us by counsel who has relied for the most part on the affidavit in reply to the notice issued before the inquiry by the Chamber Judge. Before dealing with his arguments a few words are necessary as to the nature of our jurisdiction. Under cl. 10 of the Letters Patent the High Court is empowered to remove or suspend from practice advocates, vakils or attorneys "on reasonable cause". The expression "reasonable cause" was considered by the Privy Council in S. B. Sarbadhicary, In re<sup>1</sup> and it was there stated (p. 45) :—

"Their Lordships will not attempt to give a definition of 'reasonable cause', or to lay down any rule for the interpretation of the letters patent in this respect. Every case must depend on its own circumstances. It is obvious that the intention of the Crown was to give a wide discretion to the High Court in India in regard to the exercise of this disciplinary authority."

In Advocate General of Bombay v. Three Advocates (O.S.): District Government Pleader, Kolaba v. Two Advocates (A. S.)<sup>2</sup> it was held that "reasonable cause" in this context means the same as professional or other misconduct under s. 10 of the Indian Bar Councils Act. There must be something which can fairly be described as misconduct; otherwise there can be no reasonable cause for taking disciplinary action. But "misconduct" itself is a sufficiently wide expression; it is not necessary, for instance, that it should involve moral turpitude. The learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment of the full bench pointed out that the Court has a right to expect a high standard of loyalty to the Court and co-operation from those who practise the profession of the law. (The full bench was concerned in that case with advocates and pleaders but the same thing applies to attorneys). Any conduct which in any way renders a man unfit for the exercise of his profession or is "likely to hamper or embarrass the administration of justice by this Court or any of the Courts subordinate thereto" may be considered to be misconduct calling for disciplinary action. "What we have to consider in all these cases is the conduct of the Advocate (Attorney) as it affects his position as an advocate (Attorney) and his relations to the Court."

The points urged by counsel before us on behalf of the opponent were (1) that the letter or notice complained of was written in the capacity of a

suitor and not as an attorney and the case is therefore covered by the authority of In re Wallace;<sup>1</sup> (2) that the letter was a step in judicial proceedings contemplated against Mr. Kurwa, being sent by way of notice under s. 80 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the opponent as a party was absolutely privileged; (3) that the opponent is prepared to substantiate his allegations against Mr. Kurwa, the truth of which has not been inquired into.

This last plea of justification may be very briefly disposed of. Assuming that it was open to the opponent to produce evidence in support of his allegations against Mr. Kurwa in these proceedings, he did not attempt to do so at the only time when, if at all, it would have been permissible, viz., at the formal inquiry before the Chamber Judge. He allowed his case then to go by default and the learned Chamber Judge in finding the charges against him proved has also held that there was no justification whatever for the allegations made by him. The rules relating to these disciplinary proceedings expressly provide that evidence cannot be given at the final hearing of the matter before a bench.

The other two points are inter-related and in connection with them it is necessary to refer in some detail to In re Wallace. The facts of that case were these. Wallace was an advocate and also an attorney practising in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. He was also a party in several cases in that Court. Supposing that he had reason to complain of the conduct of the Judges in dealing with those cases, he wrote a letter to the Chief Justice reflecting on the Judges and on the administration of justice generally in the Court. The Judges pronounced the letter to be a contempt of Court and issued a rule calling upon Wallace to show cause why he should not be suspended from practice as an attorney and barrister until he should make a suitable apology in writing, to be read in open Court, for his contempt. (It appears that he had offered a full verbal apology to the Chief Justice before the rule was issued but this was not considered sufficient). The rule was made absolute and Wallace appealed to the Privy Council.

The Judges of the Supreme Court had treated the matter as a case of contempt of Court. The Chief Justice in his judgment relied on authorities in contempt cases, and as regards the punishment to be imposed merely said "our right to substitute a suspension from practice for imprisonment is too clear to be disputed." The Judges may or may not have taken the view that Wallace's conduct rendered him unfit to practise, but if they did, they did not say so.

Their Lordships of the Privy Council disapproved of the order. Lord Westbury who delivered the judgment said that the letter written by Wallace was of a most reprehensible kind, a contempt of Court "which it was hardly possible for the Court to omit taking cognizance of." (It may be mentioned incidentally that Wallace accused the Judges of acting upon inadmissible evidence and private information. He did not allege, as Karani has alleged in the present case in so many words, prejudice, bias, malice and dishonesty).

Lord Westbury then went on to state the reasons why suspension from practice was an inappropriate punishment for the offence committed by Wallace,

O. C. J. and, as the judgment is really the main foundation of the opponent's defence 1940 in the present case, I cite the material part of it in full (p. 294) :—

In re
Broomfield J.

"It was an offence, however, committed by an individual in his capacity of a suitor, in respect of his supposed rights as a suitor, and of an imaginary injury done to him as a suitor; and it had no connection whatever with his professional character, or anything done by him professionally, either as an Advocate or an Attorney. It was a contempt of Court committed by an individual in his personal character only.

To offences of that kind there has been attached by law and by long practice a definite kind of punishment, viz. fine and imprisonment. It must not, however, be supposed that a Court of Justice has not the power to remove the Officers of the Court if unfit to be entrusted with a professional status and character. If an Advocate, for example, were found guilty of crime, there is no doubt that the Court would suspend him. If an Attorney be found guilty of moral delinquency in his private character, there is no doubt that he may be struck off the Roll.

But in this particular case, there is no delictum brought forward or assigned, except that which results from the fact of addressing an improper and contemptuous letter to the Chief Justice of the Court, in respect of something supposed to have been done unjustly to the writer in his private capacity as a suitor. We think, therefore, there was no necessity for the Judges to go further than to award to that offence the customary punishment for contempt of Court. We do not find anything which renders it expedient for the public interest, or right for the Court, to interfere with the status of the individual as a Practitioner in that Court. In that respect, therefore, we think that the Judges departed from the course which ought to have been pursued, by adopting a different description of punishment from the ordinary punishment for offences of this nature.

When an offence was committed which might have been adequately corrected by that punishment, and the offence was not one which subjected the individual committing it to anything like general infamy, or an imputation of bad character, so as to render his remaining in the Court as a Practitioner improper, we think it was not competent to the Court to inflict upon him a professional punishment for an act which was not done professionally, and which act, per se did not render him improper to remain as a Practitioner of the Court.

On this ground, therefore, we do not approve of the order. At the same time we desire it to be understood that we entirely concur with the Judges of the Court below in the estimate which they have formed of the gross impropriety of the conduct of the Appellant. But we are still of opinion his conduct did not require and did not authorize a departure from the ordinary mode and standard of punishment; and upon that ground, and that ground only, we shall advise Her Majesty to discharge the Order, in respect of its having substituted a penalty and mode of punishment which was not the appropriate and fitting punishment for the case in question."

The learned Chamber Judge in his report in this case says that In re Wallace was decided on its own facts and is no authority for holding that a legal practitioner could never be punished for professional misconduct committed by him in his personal capacity, however gross the offence may be. The same view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court in In the matter of a Pleader.<sup>1</sup> With respect we agree with this view. The effect of the judgment certainly seems to be that contempt of Court by an advocate or attorney, not in the exercise of his profession but in a private capacity, does not render him liable to be punished professionally unless it can further be said that his conduct in some way affects his fitness to be a member of the profession. But their Lordships found as a fact that Wallace's professional status and character was not affected by what he had done. Nothing was alleged against him except the fact of addressing an improper and contemptuous letter to the Court in respect of something supposed to have been done unjustly to the writer in his private capacity as a suitor and that it was held did not per se render him improper to remain as a practitioner of the Court. Those were the facts on which the judgment was based. Had the facts been different in that respect, the decision would no doubt have been different. Their Lordships did not say, and there is no reason to suppose that they meant, that contempt of Court when committed in a private capacity can never be of such a nature as to show professional unfitness.

Broomfield J.

It is difficult to see how there could be a grosser contempt than to allege that a Judge has acted with prejudice, bias and malice in the course of his judicial duties, that he decided a case not according to his own convictions but to please somebody else (that appears to be the meaning of the passage which is made the subject of the second charge) and that he abused his powers as a Judge and acted dishonestly and in bad faith.

Learned counsel for the opponent has argued that no offence was committed, not even contempt of Court, because these allegations were contained in a notice under s. 80, which the opponent was bound to submit before bringing a suit. But without very strong authority—and no authority has been cited in that connection—we are not prepared to say that a man merely by filing or threatening to file a suit and calling his communication a notice under s. 80 can insult and vilify a Judge in this manner. The opponent must have known, or ought to have known, being a practitioner of the law, that his suit was unmaintainable even apart from the technical flaw of want of sanction under the Government of India Act. No suit of the kind lies for anything said or done by a Judge in his jurisdiction or in a bona fide belief that he has jurisdiction, and there can be no sort of question but that a Judge has jurisdiction to criticise a witness. As for the allegation in the second letter denying the Judge's jurisdiction to make the orders which he made in the small cause suit, that was not a matter that concerned Karani who was not a party, and anyhow, in view of the result of the appeal and revision application, there was no substance in the point. The fact therefore that these scandalous allegations were contained in a notice under s. 80 does not in our opinion prevent them from being contempt of Court.

As for the plea of absolute privilege, that only means that the opponent could not be proceeded against for defamation, not that he is immune from any sort of penalty. The fact that Mr. Kurwa himself had no remedy against the opponent only makes the matter worse, and is indeed one of the strongest reasons why this Court should take action. As their Lordships of the Privy Council said in S. B. Sarbadhary, In re (p. 45) :

"...it is essential to the proper administration of justice that unwarrantable attacks should not be made with impunity upon judges in their public capacity."

The opponent in his affidavit has stated that the Chief Justice told him he ought to apologise to Mr. Kurwa and that he decided that he would not apologise but file a suit. He never has apologised in any shape or form or expressed the slightest regret. On the contrary he appears to be of opinion that his conduct was perfectly justified. We do not wish to lay too much stress on the absence of an apology, though that might be very material in ordinary proceedings for contempt of Court. But the fact that the impropriety of his conduct was pointed out to him at an early stage and that nevertheless he persisted in filing his suit, appealing against the dismissal of the suit and so on, is, we think, material because it seems to show a determination to harass the Judge which almost amounts to persecution.

O. C. J.

*In re*TULSIDAS

One of the points raised by the opponent in his affidavit was that there was great delay in instituting these proceedings. But his counsel did not urge this point, probably for the very good reason that the delay is entirely due to the pendency of the litigation which the opponent insisted on prosecuting as long as possible.

The learned Advocate General has submitted that the writing of these scandalous letters to Mr. Kurwa and the opponent's persistence in his entirely unwarrantable attacks on the Judge constitute conduct which shows him unfit to be an attorney. If such conduct is characteristic of him there could be no question about the matter, and the fact that he has shown himself to be capable of such conduct in this one instance raises grave doubts as to his being a fit person to cooperate with the Courts in the administration of justice. We think that in accordance with the principles which have been laid down as to the exercise of our disciplinary jurisdiction there is reasonable cause for taking action under cl. 10 of the Letters Patent.

We therefore suspend him from practice as an attorney for six months and direct that he pay the costs of these proceedings including the costs of the inquiry before the Chamber Judge.

In this altered constitution V. H. Desai's minor son (No. 3) and Nandkumar C. Munim (No. 6) were admitted as partners in the firm. For the purposes of assessment for the following financial year, viz., 1937-38 a further change was made in the constitution of the firm. A new partnership deed was executed on July 14, 1937, substituting V. H. Desai's mother's name as a partner in place of his wife and minor son. There were five partners and their shares as shown in the deed were as under:—

For the purposes of the assessment of the financial year 1937-38 the assessee submitted on August 30, 1937, a return showing an income of Rs. 68,066, and on the strength of the said new deed of partnership applied to the Income-tax Officer under s. 26-A of the Indian Income-tax Act for the registration of the firm. It was stated that the minor son and the wife of V. H. Desai had ceased to be partners and that instead Desai's mother, Vijayabai M. Desai, had been taken as a partner. The eight annas share belonging to V. H. Desai and his wife and his minor son was re-distributed between him and

On examination of the deed and other circumstances connected therewith, the Income-tax Officer came to the conclusion that the partnership purported to be shown as existing by the said deed was not a genuine partnership. The partnership deed was executed on July 14, 1937, i.e., shortly after the passing of Act IV of 1937 by which s. 16(3) was added to the Act, and the new partnership deed purported to drop out the very persons whose income would be included in that of the original sub-proprietor and to substitute in their place another person (the mother, who was not affected by the amendment to the Act). The application for registration was therefore rejected by the Income-tax Officer on the ground that the deed did not evidence a genuine partnership. Accordingly the firm was assessed to income-tax and super-tax as an unregistered firm.

An appeal against the order of the Income-tax Officer was thereupon made to the Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, by a petition dated October 18, 1937, and it was urged that the refusal to register the said firm was unjust and illegal. The Assistant Commissioner confirmed the decision of the Income-tax Officer, and held that the deed of partnership did not represent a genuine partnership. The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

The assessee thereupon approached the Commissioner in revision under s. 33 of the Act with a request to set aside the orders of the Income-tax Officer and the Assistant Commissioner refusing to register their firm. The Commissioner came to the conclusion that the registration of the deed of partnership had been rightly refused and declined to interfere.

The Commissioner was thereafter approached under s. 66(2) of the Act to refer the case of the assessee to the High Court. He however refused to refer the case.

The assessee thereupon applied to the High Court under s. 66(3) of the Act, and the High Court held that a question of law of the following nature in fact arose, namely, whether there was any evidence to justify the Income-tax Officer in refusing to register the firm alleged to have been constituted by exhibit No. 1 to the civil application No. 872/1938.

The following question was accordingly submitted to the High Court for decision :—

Whether there was any evidence to justify the appellate officers' finding of fact that the partnership stated to be in existence by the said deed was not a genuine partnership.

The opinion of the Commissioner on the question referred was thus expressed :—

"The assessee's argument merely amounts to this that ss. 2(14) and 26A of the Act coupled with rr. 2 to 4 framed under the Act, leave no option to the Income-tax authorities to refuse registration, once an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners is presented to them by the assessee. The instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners referred to in s. 26-A must, however, mean a genuine partnership, and if there is evidence, direct or circumstantial, showing the bogus nature of the alleged partnership or that the alleged partnership is not a genuine partnership it is submitted that it is open to the Income-tax authorities to refuse registration of the firm in question. The finding of the Assistant Commissioner in the present case was not based merely on the fact that the mother's name had been substituted for the names of the wife and the minor son. In order to test the genuineness of the partnership, he called for the accounts of the assesseees and examined them to find out how far the new deed embodied a genuine change in the partnership. As stated by the Assistant Commissioner in his appellate order, the assesseees failed to prove the allegation made by them that the mother had been made a partner in consideration of capital brought by her into the business and the allegation that the minor partner had been paid off. The story of bringing in further capital by the mother when obviously there was no necessity for it in view of the fact that there was a balance of more than a lakh in the beginning of the year 1937, with the principal partner, coupled with the failure to prove the source from which the money was brought, was rejected by the Assistant Commissioner. The entries made in the accounts to lend colour to the story as regards the alleged bringing in of capital by the new partner have also been held by the Assistant Commissioner in his order to be mere book-entries and not a genuine transaction. The new deed appeared to have been executed merely in order to circumvent the provisions of the amended s. 16(3) and the Income-tax authorities were justified in the view that they took as to the nature of the alleged new firm in that it had no purpose or meaning except to enable the assessee to avoid the liability to income-tax and super-tax and that it was not a genuine firm. The Assistant Commissioner's finding that the said deed did not represent a genuine partnership was an inference based inter alia on the following facts, viz., (1) the existence of a large cash balance of Rs. 1,44,546 making it unnecessary and useless to have a financing partner, (2) the giving to the alleged new partner a larger share in the profits than was kept for the principal partner without any adequate consideration and any sufficient reason, (3) failure to prove whence the so-called financing partner obtained the money which was credited to her account, and (4) the introduction of s. 16(3) in the Act making the assessee liable in respect of the shares in profit of his wife and minor son. It is submitted that the question whether such an inference has been properly drawn is not a question of law but of fact (see 4 I. T. C., p. 111). Attention of your Lordships is also respectfully invited to the cases of (1) Sookinabhoy Salebhoy v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay (VI I. T. C., 13), (2) Bhagwandas Harkisondas v. The Commissioner of Income-tax, Central and United Provinces (I. T. R., Volume VI, p. 177), and (3) Haji Ghulam Rasul Khuda Baksh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal (5 I. T. R., 507 and I. L. R. 57 Cal. 1336). As observed by Abdul Rashid J., in 5 I. T. R. at p. 509, 'the principle underlying all these rulings is that it is open to the Income-tax authorities to go into evidence, both circumstantial and direct, to determine whether the instrument of partnership is a genuine document or whether it merely embodies a bogus transaction for the purpose of evading tax.' As pointed out by Pollock and Digby JJ. 'A deed is not a magical talisman,' and every deed has to be examined in the light of the evidence available to see whether it represents a genuine partnership. For these reasons, it is submitted that the Income-tax authorities had in fact evidence before them to justify their refusal to register the firm and that their refusal to register the firm is based on a finding of fact on evidence before them that the instrument of partnership did not represent a genuine transaction."

The assesseees are a firm carrying on business in the name of Central Talkies Circuit, Matunga, and down to the partnership deed of July 14, 1937, the partners were : V. H. Desai with three annas share, (he is described as the original sub-proprietor), his wife with three annas share, his minor son with two annas and his major son two annas and two outside partners. As from April 1, 1937, an amendment was introduced into the Indian Income-tax Act by the addition of s. 16(3) under which the share of a wife or minor son in a partnership has to be included in the income of an assessee. Having that provision in mind, a partnership deed of July 14, 1937, was executed, under which the mother of V. H. Desai was substituted for his wife and minor son, and she was given four and a half annas. That is to say, the five annas, which had previously been divided between the wife and the minor son, were distributed as to half anna for V. H. Desai and four and a half annas for the mother, who thus became entitled to the largest share in the firm. It is, of course, not disputed that the object of the alteration was to avoid the effect of s. 16(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act.

On an application to register the firm, the Income-tax Officer refused registration on the ground that the partnership deed produced was one prepared only to avoid what he calls "proper taxation" owing to the operation of the new s. 16(3) of the Act. That is not a good ground for refusing to register. I do not like the expression "proper taxation." Taxation is either legal as falling within the terms of the taxing Act, or non-existent. As has been pointed out many times by this and other Courts, any one is entitled so to conduct his affairs within the law as to avoid incidence of taxation, and if a man finds that he will suffer less in taxation by carrying on business in partnership with his mother rather than his wife, he is entitled to select his mother. But the partnership must be a genuine partnership. The Assistant Commissioner, no doubt, appreciated that the Income-tax Officer had not put his case on the right ground, and he called for the books of the alleged partnership and came to the conclusion that there was no genuine partnership, and with that conclusion the Commissioner agrees. He relies on the fact that a large cash balance of nearly a lakh and a half existed in this partnership in 1937, which made it unnecessary to secure a new financing partner, and that it is not proved that the mother has in fact brought in any capital, nor is it proved that she had any capital to bring in. I think he might also have relied on other evidence of a negative character, namely, that there was no evidence that the mother knew anything about the business, or had assisted in the conduct of the business in any way. The contention of the assesseees is that the evidence produced before the Assistant Commissioner was not such as could possibly justify him in refusing to register the firm.

By s. 26-A of the Indian Income-tax Act, application may be made to the Income-tax Officer on behalf of any firm, constituted under an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners, for registration for the purposes of the Act, and then under sub-s. (2) rules may be made. Under the rules, which were in force down to April 1, 1939, it is provided in r. 2 that any firm constituted under an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners may register with the Income-tax Officer the particulars contained in the instrument. Then it is provided that the application must contain certain particulars, including the names of the partners in the firm with the shares of each in the business. Then r. 4 provides that on the production of the original instrument of partnership or on the acceptance by the Income-tax Officer of a certified copy thereof, the Income-tax Officer shall register the instrument and issue a certificate. Since the coming into operation of the Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, r. 4 has been altered, and it now reads : " If, on receipt of the application referred to in r. 3, the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that there is a firm in existence constituted as shown in the instrument of partnership," then he has to register. Having regard to the authorities on the old rule, I think that the new rule really does not alter the law as it previously existed; it only makes the true effect of r. 4 clearer than it was under the previous wording. Under the old rule the Courts held that the Income-tax Officer was entitled to consider whether the deed produced for registration really constituted a partnership as alleged. Under r. 2 the only person who can apply for registration is a firm constituted under an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners, which must, of course, mean specifying correctly the individual shares of the partners. I think it is open, whether under the old rule or the new rule, to the Income-tax Officer to say that the shares which appear in the deed are not the true shares of the partners, and therefore there is no proper application by the requisite firm. Speaking for myself, I should say that if it were shown that one of the partners was only a nominee of a share allotted to him or her for another partner, the deed would not then specify correctly the individual shares. I think it must specify correctly the individual and beneficial shares, because that is a matter which is relevant from the point of view of the Income-tax authorities. If the Assistant Commissioner had any evidence before him to lead to the conclusion that the mother in this case was not really entitled to a beneficial interest of four and a half annas share, I think he was justified in refusing to register the deed.

The only question before us is whether there was any such evidence. If there was, his conclusion must stand, as we are not sitting in appeal on the Assistant Commissioner. I am not prepared to say in this case that there was no evidence before the Assistant Commissioner on which he could find that this partnership was not proved to exist in the terms specified in the deed sought to be registered. The grounds on which he relies, coupled with the absence of any evidence that the mother really was for any purpose,—finance, working or otherwise—, a partner in this firm do afford some ground on which the Assistant Commissioner could hold that this never was a genuine partnership, that it was a mere device to escape payment of income-tax, and that it was not an effective means of evading such payment.

In my opinion, therefore, the question raised must be answered in the affirmative. The assessee to pay costs.

KANIA, J. In this matter an application was made for the registration of the firm for the year 1932-33 disclosing therein the names of the following persons as partners with the shares mentioned against their names :—

Thereafter there came the amendment of s. 16(3) of the Income-tax Act, in respect of shares standing in the name of a wife and minor son of a partner. On that provision being made in the Income-tax Act, a new partnership deed dated July 14, 1937, was executed. The partners therein mentioned were V. H. Desai with three and a half annas share, his mother, (Vijayabai M. Desai in place of T. V. Desai and M. V. Desai) with four and a half annas share, and the remaining partners with their shares as in the previous deed. It is not disputed that this reshuffling of the shares was made because of the amendment of the Income-tax Act. The Income-tax Officer, before whom the matter came first, rejected the partnership deed dated July 14, 1937, as the motive was to get round the amendment. That was wrong. The motive of a person in making alterations in the mode of his doing business is no ground for rejecting the registration of a firm. As has been pointed out repeatedly, if any subject could manage his business affairs as to pay the least tax which he might be liable to, he may do so provided the whole action is within the law.

In the present case when this partnership deed was put before the Income-tax Officer, he had to inquire under s. 26-A, read along with rr. 2 to 4, whether the firm constituted under the instrument of partnership and stating the particulars contained in the instrument was a genuine partnership. The rule, as amended by the Act of 1939, in terms gives power to the Income-tax authorities to make the inquiry and determine whether the deed is genuine and also whether the partnership is constituted as stated in the deed. The words of old r. 2 are also sufficiently wide enough to include such an inquiry. The question whether the taxing authorities had the right to inquire whether the deed was a genuine one or not came to be considered in In re Bisweswarlal Brijlal and a bench of Judges held that they had that authority. No reference to r. 2 is found in the judgments there, but it is based on general principle of law. Rule 2, as it existed before April, 1939, in my opinion, supports that conclusion. A number of cases, which have been cited to us, show that the power to make the inquiry about the genuineness of the deed is recognised and affirmed by the Courts.

The question, then, is whether in the present case the Commissioner was right in holding that there was evidence on which he could come to the conclusion that the partnership deed as put forth was not genuine. The contention involves the question whether the statement of shares of the individual partners as mentioned in the deed is also correct. No particular reported case has been cited to us in which this last mentioned question has been specifically raised. It appears to me that if it is conceded that the Commissioner has the power to inquire whether the partnership deed as put forth by the applicants is genuine or not, it does involve a consideration whether the share of an individual partner as mentioned therein is also correctly stated or not. For example, if the share of a partner were stated to be five annas, and on inquiry and taking evidence the Commissioner definitely came to the conclusion that the share was four annas, the partnership agreement as put forth by the applicants would not be correct, and there appears to be little doubt that the Commissioner would be entitled to hold that the deed executed by the applicants was not a correct partnership deed. "Partnership," as defined by the Partnership Act, and which definition is adopted by the Indian Income-tax Act, is a relation between persons who have agreed to share the profits of a business carried on by all or any of them acting for all. It is that relationship, as set out in the partnership deed, which, the Commissioner has to determine, exists or not.

Approaching the question from that point of view, in the present case the applicants stated that Vijayabai was admitted as a partner with four and a half annas share in consideration of capital brought by her into the business. That is the only ground set up by the applicants in support of their allegation that this lady was given the share. The Assistant Commissioner made inquiries about this allegation. He looked into the books of account. The books contained two entries showing the total sum of about Rs. 20,000 credited to her. On considering the other entries the Assistant Commissioner came to the conclusion that those were mere book entries. It is not open to this Court to inquire whether that conclusion of the Assistant Commissioner is right or wrong. On looking into the evidence, which consists of the books of account of the partnership, he held that the only ground alleged by the applicants for giving this lady this large share in the partnership was not proved. In arriving at that conclusion, it is not possible for this Court to say that there was no evidence. He had jurisdiction to hold that the only motive alleged for giving her this share was not proved to exist, and, therefore, in his opinion the statement that Bai Vijayabai was entitled to a four and a half annas share in this partnership was not proved.

It is not the case of the applicants here that Vijayabai was a trustee in respect of this share for Desai or for any other partner. If that case had been urged, it would have been inquired into, and I express no opinion as to what the result of the inquiry would have been. The applicants went to the Assistant Commissioner on the footing that a four and a half annas share was given to Vijayabai as a capitalist partner. The Assistant Commissioner found that the evidence was not satisfactory and came to a conclusion against the applicants. Under the circumstances it is not possible to say that there is no evidence for coming to the conclusion that the partnership agreement as put forth did not correctly represent the state of affairs, and, therefore, the reference fails.

THE BANK OF MORVI, LIMITED

v.

September 3.

R. P. WAGLE &amp; CO.*

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Order XXI, rr. 11, 16 and 22—Decree—Assignment of decree—Application by transferee for execution of decree—Establishment of title—Right acquired by transferee to execute decree—Stage at which objections of judgment-debtor to decree may be considered—Revival of decree—Notice—Procedure.

Where an application for execution of a decree is made by a transferee of the decree, he has to establish his title, and he has therefore to make an application under O. XXI, r. 16, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, to the Court that passed the decree. On a notice being issued on this application, the Court has to decide whether the applicant is the person entitled to execute the decree. The extent of his right and the conditions on which the assignee may proceed with the execution are not touched by this decision; nor does the Court decide how far the decree can be executed or the objections, if any, to the decree being executed. If the notice under O. XXI, r. 16, is made absolute the transferee acquires a right to execute the decree in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as the decree-holder himself had. Any objections raised by the judgment-debtor as to the execution of the decree cannot be considered at that stage. The transferee has then to apply for execution of the decree under O. XXI, r. 11, Civil Procedure Code, when the objections, if any, of the judgment-debtor will be considered.

Where the decree has to be revived under O. XXI, r. 22, Civil Procedure Code, the objections of the judgment-debtor to the execution of the decree will be considered when notice under that rule is issued and comes for decision.

EXECUTION.

On November 11, 1924, a decree by consent was passed in a suit brought by the Bank of Morvi, Ltd., as plaintiffs, against one Wagle & Co. (defendant No. 1) and Nagindas Bhagvandas (defendant No. 2). Under that decree defendant No. 2 was to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of Rs. 15,000 in full satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim in two instalments: Rs. 10,000 on February 1, 1926, and Rs. 5,000 on February 1, 1927. If defendant No. 2 failed to pay the instalments on the due dates, then interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum was to be paid on each of the instalments from the respective due date thereof.

On February 7, 1926, defendant No. 2 died and his estate was managed by his two executors, Ranchhoddas Gordhandas Kanakia and Damanlal Umiram Mehta.

On December 7, 1931, the decree was assigned to the Universal Trading Co., and on March 19, 1935, they assigned it to one Chhotalal Ishwardas Parekh.

Chhotalal made an application for execution of the decree under O. XXI, r. 16, Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

Ranchhoddas, one of the executors of the will of defendant No. 2 who had since died, opposed the application stating inter alia that the application was bad and misconceived as (1) the mode of execution as prescribed or required had not been specified therein, (2) the particulars in the application were not in accordance with the record of proceedings, (3) notice under O. XXI, r. 22, Civil Procedure Code, had not been issued and served, (4) the execution of the decree was time-barred and (5) satisfaction of the decree had been effected but was not certified on the decree.

KANIA J. This is an application under O. XXI, r. 16, Civil Procedure Code, by the assignee of the decree.

The decree was originally passed in November, 1924, for Rs. 15,000, payable by two instalments of Rs. 10,000 on February 1, 1926, and Rs. 5,000 on February 1, 1927. Defendant No. 2 died on February 7, 1926. The decree was assigned to the first assignees on December 7, 1931, who in their turn assigned it to the second assignee on March 19, 1935. On the decree a payment of Rs. 100 made on July 2, 1936, and another of Rs. 500 made on February 27, 1939, are certified. The assignee has made his application under O. XXI, r. 16.

From the facts it is clear that another application under O. XXI, r. 22, is required to be made before an order can be made for execution in respect of the application made under O. XXI, r. 11.

The fact of the assignment and the right of the assignee to execute the decree by virtue of his assignment are not disputed. Various objections were raised by the legal representatives of the second defendant. They are summarised in para. 2 of his affidavit to show cause. It is also contended that execution of the decree is now time-barred, and that satisfaction of the decree has been effected which is not certified on the decree. In my opinion the different objections raised against this application cannot be entertained at this stage.

When an application for execution is made by a transferee, not being a person in whose favour the decree is passed, he has to establish his title in the first instance. Order XXI, r. 16, therefore, requires that he must make an application to the Court that passed the decree, as distinct from the Court which would execute the decree. The rule is that the transferee may apply for execution of the decree to the Court which passed it. Although the words do not expressly say so, it means that on the notice being issued on this application the Court will decide if the applicant is the person entitled to execute the decree. The extent of his right and the conditions on which he may in fact proceed with the execution are not touched by this decision. This fact is emphasized by the last sentence in the first part of r. 16 of O. XXI which runs as follows: "...and the decree may be executed in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application were made by such decree-holder." It is therefore clear that by the notice being made absolute the Court does not decide how far the decree can be executed or the objections, if any, to the decree being executed. It only decides that the decree may be executed as if the application were made on behalf of the decree-holder himself. The reported decisions show that whilst deciding the application under O. XXI,

r. 16, the Courts have heard and decided objections to the application for execution under O. XXI, r. 11. Bearing in mind that the judgment-debtor is entitled to be heard and his objections decided at some stage before the Court permits an administrative order to be made on the application under O. XXI, r. 11, it appears that the Courts proceeded to decide the questions when disposing of the application under O. XXI, r. 16. In the present case the situation is different. On this notice being made absolute the only right which the transferee will acquire will be the same as if the application for execution were made by the decree-holder. He will be permitted to execute the decree in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application were made by the decree-holder himself. As the decree has to be revived under O. XXI, r. 22, all the objections of the judgment-debtor to the execution of the decree will be considered, when the notice under O. XXI, r. 22, is issued to him and comes for hearing. If the decree-holder himself were making the application to-day under O. XXI, r. 11, the objections of the judgment-debtor would not be disposed of on any application except the one made under O. XXI, r. 22, and of which notice would be given to the judgment-debtor. The fact that the transferee wants to execute the decree does not in any way alter the position. The objections to the execution of the decree will be heard and disposed of when notice under O. XXI, r. 22, is issued and comes for decision. In Bajinath v. Binraj: In re Jankiprasad<sup>1</sup> B. J. Wadia J. had occasion to consider the effect of O. XXI, rr. 11, 16 and 17; and the learned Judge observed as follows (p. 544) :

"In my opinion the procedure to be followed in making an application under Order XXI, r. 16, falls under two heads. The transferee must first apply for execution of the decree to the Court which passed it, and pray that the usual notices do issue. After the objections have been heard and the notice is made absolute, the decree may be executed by the transferee in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application was made by a decree-holder. The transferee must then apply for execution of the decree under Order XXI, r. 11, specifying the mode or modes in which assistance of the Court is required."

These observations clearly show that after the notice under O. XXI, r. 16, is made absolute the transferee acquires a right to execute the decree in the same manner and subject to the same conditions (which are the words used in rule 16) as the decree-holder himself had.

Mr. Desai referred to certain observations in cases where it appears to be stated that the effect of r. 16 is to bring the transferee on record. Expressions used in judgments, as has been repeatedly observed, have to be read with the facts of that case. In spite of his best endeavours counsel has been unable to point out any case in which two steps, as in the present case, had to be taken by the transferee before he could obtain an order for execution.

The result is that this notice under O. XXI, r. 16, is made absolute. The objections of the legal representatives of the original second defendant raised on this application will be considered and dealt with when the notice under O. XXI, r. 22, comes to be disposed of. There will be no order as to costs.

Held, on the true construction of the terms, that the word “or” was to be strictly construed, and that once the constituent had done business to the limit mentioned in any one of the commodities specified, if he wished to do business in any of the other commodities, he must, so long as the business already done to the limit mentioned was outstanding, pay deposit in respect of the further business.

Contracts effected in different markets for different quantities of particular commodities with different delivery dates, evidenced by separate memoranda, are for all purposes distinct, and the liabilities of the parties thereof in respect of each are separate.

Where there are separate outstanding transactions with different provisions as to initial deposit and margin money, the pakka adatia, if he wants to insist upon the payment of margin, so as to give him a right to close any transaction for non-compliance with the demand, must specify to the constituent in respect of what outstanding transaction the demand is made, and what is the amount of the demand in respect of it. The constituent may wish to comply with the demand in respect of some transactions so as to keep them alive, and not wish to comply with it in regard to others. Where the pakka adatia makes one general demand for an amount of margin money in reference to all the outstanding transactions, he is not entitled to close all those outstanding transactions on the ground that the demand has not been complied with.

Where a pakka adatia wrongfully closes his constituent's outstanding contracts before due dates, the constituent is entitled, owing to the special obligation imposed by custom on the pakka adatia, to close at any time upon instructions before the due dates, and to have an account taken on the footing of the prices prevailing in the market on the date on which the constituent instructs him to close the contracts.

NAGARMAL

BLACKWELL J. The plaintiff, who carried on business at Delhi, employed the defendants, who carry on business in Bombay, as his pakka adatis to effect for him forward transactions in gold, silver, cotton and linseed. Certain transactions were outstanding on October 5, 1939, and the plaintiff says that on that date the defendants wrongfully closed those transactions. He gave to the defendants instructions to close those transactions upon the footing that they were still outstanding on October 14, 1939, and says that if the defendants had carried out those instructions, as they were bound to do, a sum of Rs. 4225-10-9 would have been found due to him on taking the accounts between the parties. The defendants, on the other hand, say that they were entitled to close the outstanding transactions on October 5, 1939, and that, upon the footing that they were so entitled, a sum of Rs. 67-5-3 is payable to them by the plaintiff on taking the accounts on that day, and they counter-claim for that amount.

It is necessary to ascertain what terms were arrived at for conducting the business between the parties, this being in dispute. The plaintiff before employing the defendants had previously employed Messrs. Dhanpatmal Diwanchand to effect his forward transactions. One Ramnarain Jauhar was a partner in that firm. According to the plaintiff, he had arranged terms with Ramnarain Jauhar upon which the business was to be done including the payment of deposit and margin in respect of the various commodities. Ramnarain Jauhar joined the defendant firm. In the correspondence, to which I shall presently refer, he described himself as a partner in the defendant firm. According to the evidence of the defendants he was not a partner, but was employed for the purpose of introducing business with a possible partnership in view. This makes no difference, because although he has, according to the defendants, improperly signed the letters, to which I shall refer, as a partner, the defendants accept responsibility for them.

On August 12, 1939, the defendants by Ramnarain Jauhar wrote to the plaintiff asking him to place his business with them. In reply the plaintiff by his letter of August 14, 1939, asked the defendants to let him know their commission charges and lowest rates, and also upon what basis they would do business with him. In reply the defendants by Ramnarain Jauhar wrote a letter dated August 16. In that letter the defendants first set out the various charges which they would make for adat. They then said as follows :—

"We shall do forward business for four lots of wheat or linseed or one hundred bales of cotton or ten or twelve bars of silver without any deposit. Deposit will be necessary for more business (than this). As regards the business done without deposit, God forbid, if there is any loss in such transactions, you shall have to pay the same here at the same time."

The letter went on to say that the limit there mentioned could be increased or decreased when the business was done fairly, and it requested the plaintiff to send them business.

The plaintiff maintained that the whole of the terms upon which he was to do business with the defendants were contained in this letter. He conceded, however, that some arrangement would have had to be come to in regard to the amount of deposit for business exceeding the limits mentioned in the letter. In order to get over this difficulty, after referring to the arrangement previously made between him and Ramnarain Jauhar on behalf of the firm of Dhanpatmal Diwanchand as to the rates of deposit, he said that he assumed that those rates would be applicable to the business done between himself and the defendants. He did not profess to say that any such arrangement was come to with the defendants, and it was not suggested that there was any oral interview, the matter depending merely upon the letter of August 16, 1939. In fact whenever the plaintiff placed an order with the defendants they sent him with a covering letter written contracts in duplicate, one part signed by themselves, and they requested the plaintiff in the covering letter to sign the other part and return it to them. Thus in the defendants' letter of August 27, 1939, with reference to the initial transactions, the defendants referred to a telegram which they had sent to the plaintiff intimating to him that they had carried out his instructions, and stated that he must have received the telegram and noted the transactions. Then they said that they enclosed three contracts in respect of the transactions in question and requested the plaintiff to send to them the confirmation notes duly signed by him. In every case, except the last linseed contract of October 2, to which I shall refer later, the plaintiff received such contracts, signed the confirmation notes, and returned them to the defendants. He said in his evidence that he treated those confirmation notes merely as confirmation of the amount of goods bought or sold and the rates, and paid no attention to the terms, and that he was not obliged to do so. I do not believe him. I think that he knew perfectly well that the terms were contained in the contracts sent to him, but whether he knew that or not his conduct in signing those confirmation notes, in my opinion, makes the terms therein contained binding upon him. The result is that I hold that the business was done on the terms contained in the various contracts sent by the defendants to the plaintiff, except so far as those terms were cut down by what was contained in the letter of August 16 in reference to commission and the right given to the plaintiff to do forward business up to a certain limit without deposit.

A further question arising is as to the proper construction to be placed upon the paragraph in that letter, which I have already quoted in full, in regard to the plaintiff's right to do forward business without any deposit. According to the defendants, the word "or" in that paragraph means what it ordinarily would mean, viz., that it gave to the plaintiff alternative rights to do business in respect of the different classes of commodities mentioned up to the limits mentioned. According to the defendants, if the plaintiff did business in four lots of linseed, for instance, he would not be entitled, while such a contract was outstanding, to do business in any of the other commodities without paying a deposit. For the plaintiff it was argued that the word "or" should be given an inclusive or non-alternative sense. It was contended that it was the intention of the parties to do business in various commodities which are mentioned in the letter, and that the intention was to give the plaintiff the right to do business in any of those commodities up to the limit mentioned. If this had been the intention, I should have expected the word used to be either "and" or "and/or". I have to remember that a pakka adatia, who.

does forward business without an initial deposit, may incur a considerable risk if the market suddenly drops. In construing this part of the letter, therefore, I feel bound to give a strict meaning to the use of the word "or". I accept, therefore, the construction contended for by the defendants, and hold that once the plaintiff has done business to the limit mentioned in any one of the commodities specified, if he wishes to do business in any of the other commodities, he must, so long as the business already done to the limit mentioned is outstanding, pay deposit in respect of the further business.

In order to see what the position was on October 5, 1939, when the defendants closed the transactions of the plaintiff which were then outstanding, because he failed to comply with a demand to remit the sum of Rs. 2000, I propose to review the transactions briefly. On August 25, 1939, the plaintiff instructed the defendants to sell 500 tolas of gold for Aso delivery. The contract relating to that sale is exhibit (C). This form of contract applies both to this gold transaction and to the various silver transactions which the plaintiff effected. Clause 3 is the clause which deals with initial deposit and further margin, and it will therefore be useful to refer to it once and for all in connection with the gold and silver transactions. It is in the following terms:—

"I/we hereby agree to place with you a deposit for margin at the rate of Rs. 100/- after one Peti silver and Rs. 250/- for 250 tolas of gold and I/we agree to maintain such deposit and to forthwith deposit with you in Bombay such further sum or sums of money as you may from time to time require as further margin and I/we agree that the amount of such further margin from time to time required by you shall be in your absolute discretion. Interest at 6% per annum will be credited to me/us on the amount of the margin for the time being standing with you. If I/we fail to pay you the required margin within the time given after demand by letter or telegram addressed to my/our usual or last known residence or place of business, it shall be lawful for you without any notice to me/us to close my/our contract or to act as advised on my/our risk and on my/our account."

It will be observed that this clause imposes an obligation upon the constituent to deposit without demand the initial deposit mentioned and to maintain such deposit. As regards the further margin it will also be observed that the constituent is to pay such further margin as may be required, i.e., he is not bound to pay further margin in respect of gold and silver unless and until a demand is made upon him to do so. Further the right to close is made conditional upon a demand by letter or telegram and a requirement to pay margin within the time given in that letter or telegram. It is important to bear this point in mind having regard to what happened later in this case and to a contention by the defendants that they were entitled to treat a fall in the silver market of Rs. 630 on a silver contract then outstanding as included in a general demand for Rs. 2000 without making any specific demand for further margin in reference to the outstanding silver contract.

On the sale of gold effected on August 25, there was an obligation upon the plaintiff by virtue of this clause to pay Rs. 500 as initial deposit. That sum was not paid. The defendants did not ask for payment, nor did they even debit that amount to the plaintiff. At the time when this sale was effected the plaintiff also applied nazrana at the rate of eleven annas per tola on five hundred tolas for the Aso vaida in respect of which he became liable to pay a premium of Rs. 364-1-9. The plaintiff contends that he was under no obligation to pay the sum of Rs. 500 the initial deposit, because he had effected the nazrana transaction ; but by virtue of the double option he could at the due date declare himself either a buyer or a seller, and it by no means followed that he would declare himself a buyer against the sale of five hundred tolas of gold. The defendants contend that these transactions were independent and that they were under a risk having regard to possible fluctuations in the market in respect of the sale of 500 tolas of gold, because the plaintiff might not have declared himself a buyer and closed that transaction by a purchase, but might, on the contrary, have declared himself a seller. In my opinion the defendants' contention is right. I hold that Rs. 500 were payable and maintainable. The defendants, however, were entitled to waive payment of that sum for as long as they pleased, and as they did not even debit the amount to the plaintiff and inform him that they had done so, I think that they must be treated as having waived payment up to October 5, and that the plaintiff was entitled to assume that they had done so ; but, when October 5 arrived, I think that the defendants were entitled to bring that sum into account in considering what the credit and debit relationship between them and the plaintiff was, but to enable them effectually to do so I think that it was incumbent upon them, if they were going to call for margin on that date, upon the basis that they were bringing that sum into account, to inform the plaintiff clearly as to what the position then was.

As regards the sum of Rs. 364-1-9, the premium payable on the nazrana, the plaintiff contends that that sum was not payable by him until the due date, viz., October 31, 1939. With their letter of August 27, 1939, the defendants sent to the plaintiff a bill debiting that amount to the plaintiff and requesting him to credit the same to their account. The plaintiff did not object, and I hold that that amount became payable by him as from August 26, 1939.

The first transaction in silver was a purchase of ten bars on August 25, 1939. That being the first transaction no initial deposit was payable in respect of it. On September 2, 1939, the plaintiff purchased a further lot of ten bars of silver. The plaintiff recognised his obligation to pay a deposit in respect of that purchase in his telegram to the defendants of September 2, 1939, in which he said that he was sending money. By their telegram of September 3, 1939, the defendants requested him in reference to that purchase of silver to remit Rs. 1000. But the payment of that deposit was not insisted upon, no doubt because the market rose. It was not debited to the plaintiff by the defendants, and the purchases of August 25 and September 2 were closed by two contracts of sale dated September 19 and 26, 1939. As the result of this closing there was a profit to the plaintiff of Rs. 2344-11-3 and Rs. 1757-4-3 amounting in all to Rs. 4101-15-6. The defendants credited those sums to the plaintiff on September 20 and 27, 1939, and sent with their letter of October 3 bills showing those credits. It is to be observed that there is no debit in those bills for any initial deposit. The defendants' manager first said with regard to this that the defendants had no right to look to the plaintiff for the deposit of Rs. 1000 of the purchase of September 2 after the closing. After the overnight adjournment, however, he changed his evidence and said that the defendants notwithstanding the closing had the right to retain a deposit of Rs. 1000 up to the due date, viz., October 13, 1939. He said this although that sum had not been paid, nor debited, nor demanded. I hold that the defendants had no right to this deposit after those transactions were closed.

The plaintiff purchased one hundred bales of cotton on September 16, 1939, at the rate of Rs. 220 per candy, and a further one hundred bales of cotton on September 26, 1939, at the rate of Rs. 198-8 per candy, the delivery date in each case being April/May, 1940. The contracts relating to those purchases are exhibits (E) and (H). The contracts contain a provision for the payment of margin to be paid and maintained by the plaintiff until completion of the contract. The amount payable is, however, left in blank. Counsel for the defendants, after the plaintiff's case was closed, asked for leave to amend paragraph 4 of his points of defence by adding at the end thereof the following words :—

“Although in the contract for cotton the amount of rupees for margin is kept blank, according to the custom and usage of the market well known to the plaintiff the said amount was Rs. 500 for 50 bales or Rs. 1000 for hundred bales.”

The defendants' attention had been specifically drawn to the point in paragraph 2 of the points of reply, and he had made no application to amend his written statement. I refused leave to amend both because I thought that it was too late after the plaintiff's case was closed, and because where the contract itself makes provision for the payment of margin but the amount is left blank, I thought that there was no room for the application of a custom or usage of the market and that if the parties had not chosen to fill up the blanks they must be treated as having agreed that no initial deposit as contemplated by the written contract should be paid. I hold that no initial deposit was payable in respect of either of these contracts. Each contract contains a further provision that difference between the contract price and the market price arising against the constituent owing to fluctuations of the market was to be paid by the constituent in cash to the defendants in Bombay as and when they arise. That imposed an absolute obligation upon the plaintiff to pay, and it is common ground that the sum of Rs. 1975 was payable owing to fluctuations in the market in respect of both these purchases of cotton on October 5, 1939.

On October 2, 1939, the plaintiff purchased a further ten bars of silver for the Aso vaidā at Rs. 59-4. An initial deposit of Rs. 1000, in my opinion, became payable and maintainable by him having regard to the construction which I have placed on the provision as to the limit up to which commodities could be purchased without deposit in the letter of August 16, 1939. That sum was not paid, nor was it debited by the defendants to the plaintiff, nor did they call upon him to pay it, but he remained liable to pay it on October 5, 1939.

On October 2, 1939, the plaintiff purchased from the defendants seven lots of linseed, 3500 maunds, at Rs. 6-4-6 per maund. Exhibit (J) is the contract. Clause 5 provides for the payment on demand of an amount equivalent to twenty-five per cent. of the price of the contract of each transaction as an initial deposit and margin, and that margin was to be retained by the defendants until the completion of the contract. Clause 6 provides for the payment of the requisite amounts of money covering the difference due to fluctuations of the market, from time to time, as and when the same arise. These latter amounts are payable without demand. This was the first transaction which the plaintiff put through with the defendants in linseed. The contracts for this and the purchase of the silver of October 2, 1939, were enclosed in the defendants' letter to the plaintiff of October 3, 1939. He did not receive that letter till October 5 or 6, 1939. It was argued for the plaintiff that until he received the contracts he would not know what the amount of initial deposit payable was. He has, however, conceded that he knew that linseed transactions were all made subject to the articles and bye-laws of the Marwadi Chamber of Commerce, and twenty-five per cent. of the contract price is the amount required to be paid as initial deposit according to those articles and bye-laws. I think that the plaintiff must be treated as having agreed to pay that amount, but under cl. (5) of the contract no initial deposit is payable until a demand is made and no specific demand was made for such deposit. No initial deposit, therefore, was payable. It is common ground that Rs. 765 was payable by the plaintiff in respect of the fall in the market on this linseed contract by October 5, 1939. Although he had not received the contract by the morning of October 5, he knew from the letter of August 16, 1939, that he was liable to make payments in respect of a fall in the market.

On the morning of October 5, 1939, the position therefore was as follows :— The plaintiff had standing to his credit Rs. 4101-15-6, the profit on his closed silver transactions and was liable to pay to the defendants Rs. 364-1-9 the premium on the nazrana, and Rs. 1,975 and Rs. 765 in respect of the fall in the market on cotton and linseed. On that footing he had to his credit Rs. 997-13-9. At the same time he was under an obligation to pay Rs. 500 in respect of the sale of gold effected on August 25, and Rs. 1,000 in respect of the purchase of silver effected on October 2, 1939, unless the defendants waived compliance with that objection. As I have already pointed out, it was open to the defendants, if they chose to do so, to waive payment of initial deposits. If they thought that their constituent was a substantial party they might very well waive compliance with that requirement of the contract. It is important to bear this in mind, because when the defendants made, as I shall presently point out, a demand for Rs. 2,000 on October 5, while the plaintiff must be taken to have known that he was liable to pay the premium on the nazrana and the loss in respect of the fall in the market on the cotton and the linseed transactions, it by no means follows that he must be taken to have known that the defendants were also insisting upon payment of Rs. 500 on the sale of gold in August and Rs. 1,000 in respect of the purchase of silver on October 2. He may very well have thought, the defendants not having debited him in fact with either of those sums, and not having asked for payment or informed him that they had debited him, that the defendants were not insisting upon payment of those sums, and that he was in credit with the defendants to the extent of Rs. 997-13-9. In his evidence he said that he looked into the accounts and found that the demand for Rs. 2,000 was not justified.

On October 5, 1939, there was also a fall in silver to the extent of Rs. 630 and a fall in gold to the extent of Rs. 2,125, but both these sums were payable only if required, and no demand had been made. If a demand had been made, under the terms of the contracts, the defendants would only have been justified in closing the gold and silver transactions if they had given a time for payment of the required margin, and it had not been paid within the time required. This must be borne in mind in considering the demand made on October 5, and the terms in which it was couched.

On October 3, 1939, the defendants sent to the plaintiff a telegram quoting rates, and they sent a similar telegram on October 4. The contention of the defendants is that the plaintiff ought to have known from these telegrams that the defendants were drawing his attention to the fall in the market with the object of his providing them with margin in consequence of that fall. Neither of those telegrams, however, makes any demand for margin.

On October 5, 1939, the defendants sent off at 7-15 a.m. a telegram to the plaintiff, which was received at the telegraph office in Delhi at 8-43, giving the rates and saying "Remit two thousand wire." It is not in evidence at what time that telegram was delivered at the plaintiff's office at Delhi, but he admitted that it must have been received at his office by 10-30 a.m., and was read by his son, but he stated that he did not see it himself till about 11-30 a.m. He said further that after attending to other business he looked into the figures and came to the conclusion that the demand for Rs. 2,000 was not justified, and that he made up his mind to telephone to the defendants in Bombay after 8 p.m. that night, when he could do so for half rates.

The defendants not having heard from the plaintiff closed his outstanding transactions at about 3-15 p.m., on October 5, 1939, and sent a telegram to the plaintiff informing him of the rates at which they had closed.

It is in controversy as to whether the plaintiff telephoned to the defendants on that night or not. He said that he did so and spoke to Ramnarain Jauhar and told him that the closing was unjustified. I do not think it makes any difference whether the plaintiff telephoned that night or not, and therefore I do not go into that question.

On October 6, 1939, in the evening the plaintiff sent a telegram to the defendants in which he acknowledged the receipt of their last telegram and said "No right to close buy same difference of rates if any will be settled afterwards". It is contended that this telegram is an acceptance of the closing by the defendants. No acceptance of the closing was pleaded. An application was made for leave to amend paragraph 11 of the points of defence by adding after the words "on the said October 5, 1939" the following words :

"The plaintiff accepted the said alleged breach by his conduct in remaining silent till the night of October 6, 1939, and by sending his telegram on the night of October 6, 1939, containing the words 'Received—no right to close buy same—difference of rates if any will be settled afterwards,' on that ground and also in law."

I refused leave. The proposed amendment introduced questions of fact. The plaintiff's case was closed and he had had no opportunity of tendering any evidence which might have been necessary if acceptance of the breach had been pleaded. As a matter of construction I am clearly of opinion that the telegram of October 6, 1939, was not an acceptance of the closing. It states in terms that the defendants had no right to close. The request which follows to the defendants to buy a like quantity of the commodities, in my opinion, was an offer by him to the defendants to restore the status quo ante, and as an inducement the plaintiff offered in the telegram to pay differences in rates if any there were. I am quite unable, as the defendants would have me do, to construe this telegram as meaning that he accepted the defendants' right to close and was requesting them by that telegram to do fresh business independently of the closing. As to the submission made on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff accepted the closing by doing nothing till the night of October 6, 1939, this was not pleaded, and quite apart from that the plaintiff in my opinion was entitled, if he chose, to say nothing. Unless he accepted the closing, he was, I think, in law entitled to look to the defendants to carry out the contracts at the due date. He made it clear, I think, that he did not accept the closing by his telegram of October 6, 1939. By their telegram of October 6, 1939, the defendants placed upon the plaintiff's telegram the construction which I place upon it. In that telegram they insist that they had closed right-fully and that they could do fresh business only against margin. Thereafter the plaintiff did nothing until October 14, 1939, when he sent a telegram to the defendants instructing them to close the purchases which he considered to be still outstanding by selling equivalent quantities. This the defendants declined to do.

Were the defendants justified in closing because the plaintiff did not comply with their demand to remit Rs. 2,000 made on October 5, 1939? In my opinion they were not. As was pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Diwanchand v. Weld & Co.,<sup>1</sup> contracts, effected in different markets for different quantities of particular commodities with different delivery dates, evidenced by separate memoranda, are in law for all purposes distinct the one from the other, and the liabilities of the parties thereof in respect of each are separate. I have drawn attention to the different provisions in the different contracts as to the liability of the plaintiff to pay initial deposit or margin. In some cases a demand is required, in some cases it is not. I have pointed out that, apart from the initial deposit of Rs. 500 in respect of the gold transaction and Rs. 1,000 in respect of the outstanding silver transaction, the plaintiff was still in credit with the defendants on October 5, 1939, in the sum of Rs. 997-13-9. I have also pointed out that, the defendants being entitled not to insist upon the payment of initial deposit, if the plaintiff did not pay it and the defendants neither debited him with the amount to his knowledge, nor made any demand, the plaintiff was in my opinion entitled to assume that the payment of initial deposit was not for the time being insisted upon. This being the position, the defendants made a demand upon the plaintiff to remit Rs. 2,000 without specifying what it was for. It is true that the market was falling heavily and that on the morning of October 5 the defendants could have insisted not only upon the payment of initial deposits, if they had asked for them, but also upon payment of a loss of Rs. 630 in silver and Rs. 2,125 in gold if they had asked for payment of these losses, in addition to the losses in cotton and linseed which I have taken into account in stating in what amount the plaintiff was at that moment in credit. I am, however, clearly of opinion that where there are separate outstanding transactions with different provisions as to initial deposit and margin, the commission agent, or pakka adatia, if he wants to insist upon the payment of margin, so as to give him a right to close any transaction for non-compliance with the demand, must specify to the constituent in respect of what outstanding transaction the demand is made, and what is the amount of the demand in respect of it. The constituent may wish to comply with the demand in respect of some transactions so as to keep them alive, and not wish to comply with it in regard to others. Quite apart from the question what exact amount was due by the plaintiff to the defendants on October 5, 1939, in my opinion the defendants, having made one general demand for Rs. 2,000 in reference to all the outstanding transactions, were not entitled to close all those outstanding transactions, that demand not having been complied with.

Even, if the demand for margin, made in the form in which it was made, had been justified, I am of opinion that the time allowed by the defendants to the plaintiff to comply with it was wholly unreasonable, assuming that the telegram making the demand is taken to have been received by the plaintiff by 10-30 a.m., on October 5, 1939. It was in my opinion wholly unreasonable for the defendants to close all the outstanding transactions by 3-15 p.m., in the afternoon as they did. The period between 10-30 a.m., and 3-15 p.m., in my opinion was not sufficiently long to give to the plaintiff an opportunity of complying with the demand if he had been minded to do so.

My attention was drawn, in support of the plaintiff's argument that the closing was wrongful, to Ganpat Mal-Sundar Das v. Kehr Singh-Balwant Singh & Co.,<sup>1</sup> where the facts were somewhat similar to the present case. On the facts of the present case I hold that the closing was wrongful.

The next question arising is, what is the result in law of a wrongful closing by a pakka adatia of his constituent's outstanding contracts. I was referred to Michael v. Hart & Co.<sup>2</sup> In that case the defendants, a firm of stock brokers, in pursuance of a contract in that behalf bought shares on the Stock Exchange on behalf of a principal, and contracted that they would at any time before the settling day, if so directed, sell the same upon the principal's behalf. Before the settling day arrived the defendants in breach of their contract sold the shares without the principal's consent. Wills J. held that in an account taken between the defendants and the principal the latter was entitled to be credited, in respect of the shares so wrongfully sold, with the highest price that the same might have realised in the market at any time between the date of the sale and the settling day. The case went to the Appeal Court and is reported in [1902] 1 K. B. 483. Collins M. R., in the course of his judgment, pointed out that where there has been an anticipatory breach of a contract that has not of itself the effect of rescinding the contract, for there must be two parties to a rescission. It gives the other party to the contract the right if he chooses to treat the contract as rescinded; on the other hand, he may refuse to treat the contract as rescinded and hold the party repudiating the contract to his obligation when the time for performance arrives. Having regard to the opinion expressed by the Appeal Court in that case in the course of the hearing, the parties came to an agreement and the case was decided upon the footing that the plaintiff was entitled to insist on performance of the defendants' contract at the end of the May settlement, and to measure his damages with reference to the prices of the stocks at that date. The question whether the plaintiff had a right to have the damages estimated with reference to the highest prices at which the stocks had stood in the interval between the closing of the plaintiff's account and the end of May, as Wills J. had decided, was left open. On the authority of that case, if the defendants had been merely commission agents, I should have held that the plaintiff, not having accepted the closing of the contracts, was entitled to treat them as if they had not been closed and to look to the defendants to carry them out on the respective due dates of the contracts.

The defendants, however, are not ordinary commission agents, they are pakka adatias, and I have to consider whether that fact makes any difference. In Kanji v. Bhagvandas,<sup>1</sup> (and on appeal at p. 611), Chandavarkar J. drew attention to the custom that when a pakka adatia receives a second order from his constituent to enter into a cross-contract and cover his first order against the due date, the pakka adatia is not bound to carry out the second order in case owing to loss of credit he is unable to do so, and all that he is bound to do is to inform the constituent accordingly so as to enable the latter to put through his order through some other pakka adatia. In Baldeosahai Surajmal & Co. v. Radhakishan Joharilal,<sup>2</sup> I expressed the opinion that the judgment in the case of Kanji v. Bhagvandas, by necessary implication, involved a positive custom that when a pakka adatia receives a second order from his constituent to enter into a cross-contract to cover his first order, the pakka adatia is bound to do so unless circumstances exist which relieve him from that obligation. The case of Baldeosahai Surajmal & Co. v. Radhakishan Joharilal went to the Appeal Court, and neither of the Judges in the course of their judgments appear to have thrown any doubt upon my view of that custom. Having regard to the opinion which I have expressed, I approach this case as if the defendants had not wrongfully closed the outstanding transactions. If they had not closed the outstanding transactions it was open to them at any time to insist upon payment of any initial deposits unpaid, or to demand payment of margin by a proper notice or notices in that behalf and to close the plaintiff's outstanding transactions if he failed to comply with specific demands made in reference to the specific contracts in that behalf. The defendants made no such demands but maintained the position that they had rightfully closed the transactions. The plaintiff by his telegram of October 14, 1939, called upon the defendants to close his outstanding transactions. In my opinion he was entitled to do so. He had not failed to comply with any lawful demand for margin, and when the plaintiff gave the defendants instructions to close they did not rely upon any ground which could properly relieve them from the ordinary obligation of a pakka adatia to act on the instructions to close before the due date; all that they said was, in their telegram in reply, that they could do fresh business against deposit. I have come to the conclusion that the transactions must be treated as still outstanding, that the plaintiff was entitled to give the order to close, that the defendants ought to have acted upon that order, and that the plaintiff is entitled to be put in the position in which he would have been placed if they had carried out his instructions. This case in my opinion differs from that of Michael v. Hart & Co.,<sup>3</sup> because of the peculiar obligation imposed upon the commission agent to close at any time upon instructions before the due date. But for that special obligation, I should have held that the plaintiff's right to an account would have depended upon the prices reigning at the due date. But, because of the special obligation imposed by custom on a pakka adatia, my view is that the plaintiff is entitled to have an account taken on the footing of the prices prevailing on October 14, 1939. The figures upon that basis are set out in exhibit (H) to the plaint. Upon the figures prevailing in the market on that day, the plaintiff sustained a loss of Rs. 525 in cotton, he made a profit on the silver transaction of Rs. 630 and on the linseed of Rs. 382-13-0. Bringing into account those two last sums and his original profit on the previous silver transactions and deducting therefrom the loss in cotton and the sum of Rs. 364-1-9 for the premium on the gold, the amount due and payable by the defendants to the plaintiff on October 14, 1939, if the plaintiff's instructions had been acted upon, would have been Rs. 4,225-10-9.

The plaintiff, in my opinion, is entitled to recover that sum and the defendants fail on their counter-claim.

[After recording findings on the issues his Lordship concluded :]

I pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 4,225-10-9 with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum from the date of the filing of the suit, viz., February 3, 1940, till judgment. The plaintiff will also have the costs, including costs of the Chamber Summons for directions, and interest on judgment at six per cent. per annum. The counter-claim is dismissed with costs. Having regard to the strenuous manner in which this suit has been contested and the length of time it has taken, I do not think it proper to quantify the costs, but allow them to be taxed in the usual way.

CHAMBER summons for discovery.

Suit for injunction and recovery of damages.

The plaintiff firm of Dwarkadas Dhanji were the registered proprietors of a certain design for being printed on textile goods. The design was registered under the Indian Patents and Designs Act, 1911, and a registration certificate of the design was issued to the plaintiffs on March 23, 1939.

The plaintiffs complained that the defendants Chhotalal Ravicarandas & Co. were recently selling in Bombay certain class of cotton textiles bearing a design which was an imitation of the plaintiffs' design.

On April 6, 1940, the plaintiffs filed this suit to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from selling any textile goods bearing an imitation of the plaintiffs' design, for an order on the defendants to hand over to the plaintiffs for destruction all goods in their possession bearing the same design, to obtain account of profits made by the defendants from the sale of such goods, and to recover damages from the defendants for sale of the goods bearing the imitation design.

The defendants contended in their written statement that they were unaware of the design registered by the plaintiffs, and they denied that the plaintiffs had any exclusive right to the use of the design. They further contended that they had never used any design which was an imitation of the design claimed by the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs' design was not a new or original design at the date of registration by the plaintiffs, and that the registration being invalid did not confer any exclusive rights upon the plaintiffs to use the design.

On July 31, 1940, the defendants took out a chamber summons for an order calling upon the plaintiffs to produce and disclose certain documents to substantiate the defence.

The summons was heard.

C. K. Daphtary, with J. A. Shah, for the plaintiffs.

M. C. Setalvad, Advocate General, with S. T. Desai, for the defendants.

Setalvad. The defendants asked the plaintiffs to disclose certain documents in order to prove their case of publication by the plaintiffs of their design prior to registration. They have taken out the present chamber summons on the plaintiffs refusing to do so. The summons was argued before the Prothonotary and Senior Master and was adjourned by him to the hearing of the suit.

[B. J. Wadia J. Have the defendants applied for cancellation of the design under s. 51 (a) of Indian Patents and Designs Act?]

It is not necessary for the defendants to do so as the defendants can raise the plea that the design is invalid by way of defence. Section 2(14) defines: "Proprietor of a new or original design." Hence, when a certificate of registration is granted to the proprietor of the design under s. 45 of the Act it

O. C. J. is assumed that the design was new and original. Again, under s. 46(3) the rebutted.

v.

CHHOTALAL

DAS & CO.

Section 51A provides for cancellation of registration by a person interested under certain circumstances, and s. 53 of the Act gives right to the registered proprietor to start legal proceedings in case of piracy of the design.

There are parallel sections in the Act for registration and revocation of registration of a patent. Section 26 of the Act refers to petition for revocation of patent and provides under what circumstances revocation may be obtained, and s. 29 provides for a suit by a patentee in case his patent is infringed. Sub-section (2) of the section further provides that every ground on which a patent may be revoked under s. 26 shall be available by way of defence to a suit for infringement.

Notwithstanding there being no similar provision with respect to designs as in s. 29(2), all grounds on which a design may be revoked can be taken by way of defence. I rely on Muhammad Abdul Karim v. Muhammad Yasin,<sup>1</sup> which also cites with approval Bahal Rai v. Sumer Chand.<sup>2</sup> It is also cited with approval in Sapru's Encyclopaedia of Indian Law, Vol. VII, p. 378. In Halsbury's Laws of England (2nd edition), Vol. XXXII, p. 696, § 1006, defence by way of an attack on the validity of registration is not ruled out. Even under the English Patents and Designs Act such a defence is not prohibited. I also rely on Birch v. Harrah and Co.<sup>3</sup>

Under s. 77(a) of the Indian Patents and Designs Act the Central Government has power to make rules. Certain rules have been framed for procedure of registration of patents and designs. I rely on rr. 39 to 43 which are given in Patent Office Handbook published by the Government of India. It will be seen from those rules that although the Registrar can refuse to register a design, no enquiries are made at the time when it is registered. The general public has no opportunity of knowing the fact of registration. It is different in case of patents.

Daphtary. The defendants have not given any particulars about the date of publication of the design by plaintiffs and the enquiry sought by the further discovery is in the nature of a fishing enquiry, and therefore it should not be allowed.

When a design is registered the registered proprietor has a copyright in the design during five years from the date of registration (s. 47) and the defendants are not entitled to go behind the validity of such registration. The Indian Patents and Designs Act has been purposely divided into two parts : one part relating to patents and the other relating to designs, with certain sections common to both. In the sections which relate to the patents it has been specifically provided that all grounds on which registration of patent can be cancelled can be raised by way of defence ; but there being no similar provisions in respect of designs, it must be presumed that such a defence is not allowed under the Act. The language of s. 54 of the Act is very significant. By implication it clearly excludes the defence of prior

Setalvad, in reply. The defendants are not debarred from raising the plea if it is not specifically prohibited under the Act. The other side has raised the point that the defendants have not given any particulars; but I say that the defendants cannot give such particulars. These particulars are in possession of the plaintiffs themselves. This is one of the cases where discovery should be given before particulars can be ordered to be given. See Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, pp. 533 to 534. I also rely on Woolfe v. Automatic Picture Gallery, Ltd.<sup>1</sup> where the defendants sought to have discovery before delivery of defence, but it was refused on the ground that defence should be filed first. The judgment however goes on to say that the plaintiffs cannot resist such discovery once the written statement is filed.

DWARKADAS.
DHANJI
v.
CHHOTALAL
RAVICARAN-
DAS & Co.

B. J. WADIA J. This is a chamber summons taken out by the defendants for further discovery.

The plaintiffs claim to be the registered proprietors of a certain design for being printed on textile goods registered under the Indian Patents and Designs Act (II of 1911), and have filed this suit against the defendants for restraining them from infringing the design under the circumstances mentioned in the plaint, and for accounts, damages, costs and other reliefs. In their written statement the defendants allege that prior to the registration of the design it was published in British India by the plaintiffs themselves as well as by other merchants. They also contend that the design was not new or original at the date of the registration, and that the registration is invalid and does not confer any specific right upon the plaintiffs to exclusively use the same. In order to substantiate these defences, the defendants pray for an order for discovery and inspection of the documents mentioned in the summons, viz.,

- (1) The first shipment samples of the goods in dispute received by the plaintiffs from Japan,
- (2) Copy of the first order placed by the plaintiffs in respect of the said goods,
- (3) Correspondence between the plaintiffs and the Japanese firms from whom the plaintiffs imported the said goods prior to and up to first importation of the goods by plaintiffs,
- (4) The original invoices and papers in respect of the first importation of the said goods by the plaintiffs together with the covering letters with the invoices,
- (5) Entries in the plaintiffs' books of account as to when they received the first lot of such goods, and
- (6) Counterparts or copies of the contracts made by the plaintiffs with the merchants in India regarding the sale of the goods in dispute.

The suit is brought under s. 53(2) of the Indian Patents and Designs Act of 1911. This Act is based upon the English Act, the Patents and Designs Act of 1907. Under Act II of 1911, Part I up to s. 42 refers to patents,

O. C. J. Part II from s. 43 to s. 54 refers to designs, and Part III is general. The 1940 design in dispute has been registered under the provisions of the Act of — 1911 and the Indian Patents and Designs Rules of 1933. Section 43(1) DWARKADAS provides that the Controller may, on the application of any person claiming DHANJI to be the proprietor of any new or original design not previously published
 v. in British India, register the design under Part II of the Act. Section 43(4) CHHOTALAL in British India, register the design under Part II of the Act. Section 43(4) RAVICARAN- provides that the Controller may, if he thinks fit, refuse to register any DAS & Co. design presented to him for registration, but that any person aggrieved by — any such refusal may appeal to the Central Government. Rule 39 of the B. J. Wadia J. Indian Patents and Designs Rules, 1933, which came into force on April 1, 1933, also provides that the Controller shall consider the application for registration and may accept it if he considers that there is no objection to the design being registered. Section 45(1) enables the Controller to grant a certificate of registration to the proprietor of the design when registered.
 Under s. 46(1) a book called the Register of Designs is kept at the Patent Office, "wherein shall be entered the names and addresses of proprietors of registered designs, notifications of assignments and of transmissions of registered designs, and such other matters as may be prescribed." Section 46(3) provides that the register of designs shall be prima facie evidence of any matters by the Act directed or authorised to be entered therein.

The plaintiffs contend that the defendants are not entitled to go behind the certificate of registration, and that therefore the documents of which inspection is asked for are not relevant to the matters in dispute between the parties. The important question therefore for consideration is whether the certificate of registration is final and conclusive, or whether it is open to the defence to raise the pleas that the design had been previously published and was not new or original at the date of the application for registration and that the plaintiffs are therefore not the proprietors thereof.
 Under s. 2(14) a proprietor means a proprietor of a new or original design.
 Formerly the words were "new and original", but by Act VII of 1930 the words "new or original" have been substituted. From the words of the sections which I have referred to before it will be seen that the only person who can have a design registered under the Act is the proprietor for the time being of the design and that the design must be a new or original design and must not have been previously published in British India. Plaintiffs' counsel argued that it was open to any interested person under s. 51A at any time after the registration to present a petition to the High Court for cancellation of the registration of the design on the ground of previous publication or also on the ground that it was not a new or original design. Such a petition could also within one year from the date of the petition be presented to the Controller subject to an appeal to the High Court. Section 64 of the general portion of the Act also provides for any person making an application for rectification of the register of patents or designs on the ground that any entry was wrongly made in the register.
 Counsel further argued that in the absence of any such cancellation the register of designs which contains the name of the proprietor of the registered design was conclusive on the point that the person registered as proprietor was the proprietor of a new or original design. The words of

s. 46(3), however, are that the entry with regard to the name and address of the proprietor or proprietors of the registered design is prima facie evidence to that effect. That means in my opinion that there is a prima facie presumption that the person whose name is registered as the proprietor is the proprietor of a new or original design, but the entry in the register is not conclusive proof thereof, and the presumption can be rebutted. It is true that under s. 43 no registration can be effective unless the design sought to be protected is new or original and not of a pre-existing common type. But the certificate is not conclusive, and there is nothing in the Act which prevents the defendant in a suit for damages for infringement of a registered design under s. 53 from raising in defence the plea that the design was previously published and was neither new or original: see Muhammad Abdul Karim v. Muhammad Yasin.<sup>1</sup> It was pointed out that unless it was final and conclusive there was no advantage in having a certificate of registration. The advantage is that if no evidence is led by the defendants to the contrary, the certificate is sufficient evidence that the plaintiffs are the proprietors, that is proprietors of a new or original design. If evidence is led, it is for the Court to come to its finding on the question. A further advantage is that as the register is prima facie evidence of the matters contained in it, the onus ordinarily will be on the defendants to show that the plaintiffs are not the proprietors of the registered design in question.

Counsel for the plaintiffs also drew the attention of the Court to the several corresponding sections of the part of the Act dealing with patents. It is provided under s. 20(3) that the register of patents shall also be prima facie evidence of any matters by the Act directed or authorized to be inserted therein. Section 26 provides for the revocation of a patent on any of the grounds stated therein. Section 29(1) provides for the institution of suits for infringement of patents. It is provided by s. 29(2) that every ground on which a patent may be revoked under the Act shall be available by way of defence to a suit for infringement. Counsel pointed out that there was no corresponding section in the portion of the Act dealing with designs, nor was s. 29(2) made applicable in the matter of designs under s. 54 of the Act. It was therefore argued that as there was no section in regard to designs corresponding to s. 29(2) in regard to patents, the Act did not contemplate such a defence in the case of registered designs. I do not accept that argument. It might be that the reason for not making a specific provision in s. 53 similar to the provision in s. 29(2) was as is pointed out in Muhammad Abdul Karim v. Muhammad Yasin.<sup>2</sup> But what is really significant is that the Legislature has not definitely provided anywhere in the Act that the certificate of registration until cancellation is conclusive proof of the fact that the grantee of the certificate is the proprietor of the design, that is to say, the proprietor of a new or original design. I do not think that the Legislature would have left such an important point merely for inference. Nor is it provided in the Act that the only remedy of an aggrieved party is under s. 51A and s. 64 of the Act, and that if no such application is made the aggrieved party cannot urge his grounds of defence in a suit brought by the registered proprietor under s. 53(2) of the Act. My attention was drawn to the observations of Halsbury, Hailsham's edn., Vol. XXXII, p. 696, para. 1006, in which it is stated that it seems to be doubtful whether the validity of the registration can properly be raised by way of defence in a suit for infringement of a design, and whether it should not rather be sought by means of a motion for rectification of the register. It is, however, also pointed out that the former course has often been adopted, though it may be by consent of the parties. I, however, agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court in Muhammad Abdul Karim v. Muhammad Yasin, that the defendant to a suit under s. 53 (2) is not confined to his remedy laid down by those particular sections of the Act, and that the points pleaded in the written statement by the defendants are points which can be raised in a suit like the present.

Plaintiffs' counsel lastly urged that no order should be made on the chamber summons for inspection as the inspection asked for was on a fishing enquiry, not based on any particulars, but merely on defences which are taken up as general defences to the suit. Those defences may have been based on information and belief. The only question is whether the documents are relevant and whether they are in the plaintiffs' possession, power or control. In my opinion they are relevant, and it is nowhere definitely stated that they are not in the plaintiffs' possession. The correspondence annexed to the affidavit in support of the summons seems to indicate that they are. If any of these documents are not in the plaintiffs' possession, the plaintiffs can say so on oath.

In the result, the summons is made absolute with costs. Costs to be taxed. Counsel certified. The plaintiffs to make the supplemental affidavit of documents disclosing the documents referred to in the summons or such of them as are in their possession within a week and to give inspection to the defendants forthwith thereafter. Suit to be placed on board for hearing as a part heard on January 13, 1941.

December 13.

Right of suit—Cause of action—Suit filed in anticipation of criminal complaint—High Court—Inherent jurisdiction—Injunction in personam against party restraining him from proceeding with criminal complaint in Court outside High Court's jurisdiction—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 151.

The mere fact that A is supposed to contemplate the bringing of an action against B or that A may have stated that he has grounds for such an action, does not entitle B to institute an action against A to have it declared that A has not a good cause of action against B.

The High Court has jurisdiction, under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, to grant an injunction in personam against a person who has submitted to its jurisdiction to restrain him from proceeding with a criminal complaint in a Court which is not subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court; but the jurisdiction should be exercised with extreme caution.

Accordingly, the High Court of Bombay refused to grant an injunction in personam against a defendant, who had submitted to its jurisdiction, restraining him from proceeding with the complaint filed by him against the plaintiff in the Court of the City Magistrate at Benares, praying in effect that the defendant had no cause of action against him as regards the subject-matter of the complaint.

Notice of motion.

The plaintiff Kanhaiyalal was the brother of the wife of the defendant Mohanlal. The plaintiff lived in Bombay. The defendant lived at Benares, in the United Provinces.

The plaintiff alleged that he had paid Rs. 2,000 to the defendant by way of loan on February 10, 1939, when he (plaintiff) had gone to Benares on the occasion of his sister's demise.

On January 19, 1940, the defendant's advocate Jagdish Prasad wrote a letter from Benares to the plaintiff in Bombay, in the course of which he demanded payment of Rs. 4,600 left in deposit with the plaintiff, and stated :—

"That you were entrusted with ornaments worth over Rs. 7,600, details of which are given hereunder, by my client on your assurance that they would be returned to my client whenever my client would desire the return of the same.

"That in spite of repeated demands for the return of the said ornaments you have been evading the return of the same by making lame excuses like pain in stomach, ill-health etc., and it appears that in view of the enormous increase now in the rates of gold and other ornaments you have dishonestly misappropriated the said ornaments with the intention to make wrongful gain for yourself and to cause wrongful loss to my client.

"That under the circumstances you are hereby required to return all the ornaments entrusted to you by my client the details of which are given below within

On January 31, 1940, the plaintiff filed a suit against the defendant in the Bombay High Court praying :—

(a) that the defendant may be ordered and decreed to pay to the plaintiff Rs. 2,000 with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum from February 10, 1939, till judgment ;

(b) that it may be declared that the plaintiff had not and has not got and is not liable for any ornaments of the defendant's wife and that the defendant has no moneys in deposit with the plaintiff."

He alleged in the plaint that :

"All the ornaments of the defendant's wife always remained at the defendant's place. The plaintiff had at no time any ornaments of the defendant's wife. The plaintiff denies the allegations made in the defendant's said advocate's letter that the plaintiff wrote several letters assuring the defendant the return of any ornament. In view of the defendant's conduct and claim the plaintiff submits that he is entitled to a declaration that he is not in possession of any ornaments of the defendant's wife and that the defendant has no moneys in deposit with the plaintiff."

On February 1, 1940, the plaintiff made a formal reply to the defendant's letter of January 19, 1940, denying all statements made in that letter and putting forward his claim to Rs. 2,000.

On February 14, 1940, the defendant filed a complaint in the Court of the City Magistrate at Benares charging the plaintiff with an offence punishable under s. 406 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860.

On April 14, 1940, the plaintiff appeared in the Benares Court and made an application to have the complaint dismissed on the ground that the case was purely of a civil nature, that no offence of criminal misappropriation was committed, and that the Benares Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint. The application was dismissed. The plaintiff applied in revision to the District Magistrate at Benares, who dismissed it on August 16, 1940. He next applied to the Allahabad High Court.

Meanwhile, on June 26, 1940, the defendant filed his written statement and counter-claim. He denied in his written statement his liability to pay Rs. 2,000 to the plaintiff, and counter-claimed for the ornaments valued at Rs. 7,600 and cash amounting to Rs. 4,600.

On November 12, 1940, the plaintiff put in a reply in which he denied the defendant's counterclaim.

Then on November 13, 1940, the plaintiff took out a notice of motion for an order :—

"That the defendant may be restrained by an order and injunction of this Hon'ble Court from proceeding with the complaint being case No. 232 of 1940 filed by him in the First Class Magistrate's Court at Benares."

The defendant opposed the notice of motion.

K. A. Somjee, for the plaintiff.

M. V. Desai, with V. K. Chhatrapati, for the defendant.

BLACKWELL J. This is a notice of motion taken out by the plaintiff on November 13, 1940, for an order that the defendant may be restrained from proceeding with a complaint filed by him in the First Class Magistrate's Court at Benares. That complaint was filed on February 14, 1940.

By a letter dated January 19, 1940, the defendant's advocate alleged that the plaintiff had been entrusted with ornaments by the defendant worth over Rs. 7,600, a list of which was appended to the letter, on the plaintiff's assurance that they would be returned to the defendant whenever required, that the plaintiff had written several letters to the defendant assuring him that he would return the same, that in spite of repeated demands he had not done so, and had dishonestly misappropriated the ornaments. The letter demanded the return of the ornaments within a week of the receipt of the notice, and stated that in default the defendant would be constrained to take steps for the prosecution of the plaintiff under s. 406 of the Indian Penal Code. That letter was not in fact received by the plaintiff until January 29, 1940. Without replying to that letter the plaintiff on January 31, 1940, filed this suit. In the plaint he alleges that on or about February 10, 1939, he lent Rs. 2,000 to the defendant who promised to pay that amount in Bombay with interest at six per cent. after a month or two, that payment had been demanded and the defendant had refused to pay and by his advocate's letter of January 19, 1940, to which I have referred, and which is exhibit (A) to the plaint, put forward a false claim against the plaintiff. The plaint goes on to allege that the plaintiff had at no time any ornaments of the defendant's wife, and submits that the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that he is not in possession of any ornaments of the defendant's wife, and that the defendant had no moneys in deposit with the plaintiff, that fact having been alleged both in the letter of January 19, 1940, and in the plaint.

It is to be observed that the first cause of action alleged in the plaint is in respect of an alleged loan by the plaintiff to the defendant of Rs. 2,000. The declaration is asked for with the object of getting a decision that the plaintiff had not in his possession at any time the ornaments of the defendant and that he had no moneys on deposit with him from the defendant. I do not express any opinion as to whether that declaration is well founded in law, or not, inasmuch as it will fall to be decided on the hearing of the suit, and it would not be proper for me to do so. I do, however, refer to some observations made by Mr. Justice Joyce in North Eastern Marine Engineering Company v. Leeds Forge Company.<sup>1</sup> That case arose out of s. 32 of the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, but the learned Judge made some observations of a general character, with which I respectfully agree, that seem to be pertinent to the declaration asked for in the present plaint. The learned Judge said (p. 329):—

"Speaking generally, in simple cases not within s. 32 of the Act, the mere fact that A. is supposed to contemplate the bringing of an action against B., or that A. may have stated that he has grounds for such an action, does not, in my opinion, entitle B. to institute an action against A. to have it declared that A. has not a good cause of action against B. I think that is so whether the result depends merely upon questions of law, or upon facts, as to which there would, or might be, a conflict of evidence and a protracted trial. No doubt delay may in certain cases furnish a good ground for defence; but, ordinarily, an intending plaintiff may

KANHAIYA- I am by no means satisfied that that declaration was not asked for in the LAL hope that it might induce the defendant not to launch criminal proceedings, HARKARAN- as in my opinion he was clearly entitled to do, and in the hope that he DAS would be persuaded to deal with the matter by way of counter-claim in the
v. present suit.

MOHANLAL Having launched that suit the plaintiff replied to the letter of January 19
RAM- by a letter from his attorneys dated February 1, 1940, in which he referred VALLABH to the claim put forward by the defendant as a bogus demand intended to Blackwell J. forestall the plaintiff's claim for Rs. 2,000. The letter goes on to inform the defendant that the plaintiff has filed a suit to recover the amount lent and advanced and for a declaration that the claim for the ornaments and moneys made by the defendant was not justified.

The criminal complaint was filed by the defendant in the Court of the City Magistrate, Benares, on February 14, 1940. A copy thereof is set out in exhibit B to the plaintiff's affidavit of November 12, 1940. It is a complaint made not only against the plaintiff but also against a second accused, who is alleged to be the munim of the plaintiff. That complaint alleges dishonest misappropriation and conversion of ornaments entrusted by the complainant to the munim on the plaintiff's behalf.

There appears to have been some delay in serving the criminal process upon the plaintiff. He had certainly been served before May 18, 1940, because on that date he filed a petition to quash the criminal proceedings on the ground that the matter was merely a civil dispute and that the Court had no jurisdiction. The Court dismissed that application, there was an application in revision which was dismissed by the District Magistrate on August 16, 1940, and the matter has now gone to the High Court of Allahabad and is still pending before that Court.

Mr. M. V. Desai, who appears for the defendant, concedes that this Court has got the power to make an order in personam against his client to restrain him from proceeding with that criminal complaint, if in the exercise of its discretion the Court thinks proper to do so. A number of authorities were cited to me, but in view of that concession it is, in my opinion, unnecessary to refer to any of them. The grounds upon which the order is asked for are set out in the said affidavit of the plaintiff. In paragraph 3 thereof it is alleged that the complaint filed by the defendant at Benares is only for the purpose of stifling this suit and to put the plaintiff to unnecessary harassment, annoyance and costs, and the same is of a blackmailing character, and that it has been filed for the purpose of bringing undue pressure upon the plaintiff, and similar allegations are made in paragraph 5 of the affidavit.

I have to consider whether the complaint was filed for that purpose. I have already drawn attention to the fact that by the letter of January 19, 1940, written on behalf of the defendant to the plaintiff, the claim was made for the return of the ornaments and for payment of moneys alleged to have been deposited, and that letter contains a statement that it was then the intention of the defendant, if his demand was not complied with, to file a criminal complaint for misappropriation. The intention to file that complaint was made before any demand had been put forward on behalf of the plaintiff in respect of the alleged loan of Rs. 2,000 and without even replying to the letter this suit was filed, the curious declaration to which I have drawn attention was inserted and I am now asked to say that the object of that criminal complaint was to stifle a suit which had not even been threatened and in respect of which it had not been suggested that there was any cause of action. I entirely decline to accede to such a suggestion. In my opinion the boot is on the other leg, and the civil suit was filed and that curious declaration was inserted with the object and in the hope of forestalling and if possible preventing the threatened criminal proceedings.

I have been strongly pressed by Mr. Somjee, the plaintiff's counsel, to grant an injunction restraining the criminal proceedings upon the ground that the issues are the same and that it is a great hardship upon the plaintiff to have two Courts trying issues of a similar character. Mr. Desai for the defendant, without prejudice to his submission that the motion was unjustified and ought to be dismissed with costs, offered to have the counter-claim stayed pending the hearing and final determination of the criminal proceedings. Mr. Somjee for the plaintiff is unwilling to accede to that suggestion, and that being so, I shall not make any order staying the counter-claim. Mr. Somjee, on the other hand, has pressed me to expedite this suit with the object of getting the issues arising out of the counter-claim decided if possible before the criminal case comes up for hearing.

I here point out that this motion was not taken out until November 13, 1940, although the criminal proceedings were instituted on February 12, 1940. After he had been served with the criminal process, instead of applying promptly if so advised to the criminal Court for a stay of the criminal proceedings pending the trial of this suit in which the plaintiff had asked for the declaration to which I have referred, and which according to his contention would have justified an application to the criminal Court for a stay even before the counter-claim was filed, he chose to wait until November 13, 1940, and in the meantime to put the defendant to considerable costs by applying to the criminal Court to quash those criminal proceedings upon the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction. In my opinion, the factor of delay is one that I should consider. On an application of this character, and quite apart from the merits of the matter, I should not have been disposed to make an order on this motion after such a long period of delay.

On the merits I am of opinion that the plaintiff makes out no case of harassment. I have already drawn attention to the fact that it does not lie in his mouth to suggest that the complaint was filed for the purpose of stifling this suit which at the time the notice of intention to file such a complaint was given had not even been suggested; nor for the same reason can it be suggested that that complaint was of a blackmailing character, and in my opinion it was grossly improper for the plaintiff even to suggest such a thing in his affidavit in the events which had happened. Whatever the decision before the criminal Court may be, the civil rights and liabilities of the parties on the counter-claim will fall to be determined on the evidence adduced in

O. C. J. this Court. I have been strongly pressed by Mr. Somjee to grant an injunction on the ground that if a judgment is given in his favour on the counter-claim in the present suit it would be admissible in evidence in the criminal proceedings and might have great weight with the Magistrate in coming to a conclusion upon the criminal complaint. Having regard however to the fact that that complaint was instituted before this suit was even suggested, that in my opinion the declaration asked for in this suit was for the purpose, if possible, of forestalling the criminal complaint, and that if he can prove criminal misappropriation the defendant is entitled to proceed by way of criminal process, I am clearly of opinion that I ought not to grant an injunction.

I may refer to one further aspect of the matter. This application is based upon the inherent jurisdiction of this Court under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code. Although a civil Court no doubt has jurisdiction to grant an injunction in personam against a person who has submitted to the jurisdiction to restrain him from proceeding with a criminal complaint in a Court which is not subject to the jurisdiction of this High Court, this is a jurisdiction which in my opinion should be exercised with extreme caution. It was open to the plaintiff if he had been so minded to apply to the criminal Court for a stay of those criminal proceedings. He has not done so. In my opinion he ought not to have resorted to an application to this Court based upon its jurisdiction under s. 151 without first exhausting the other remedy which was open to him by an application to the criminal Court for stay of the criminal proceedings upon the ground that the issues involved had been raised by the plaintiff by his declaration in the civil suit.

In all the circumstances I am clearly of opinion that this motion was not justified. I dismiss it with costs. As regards the costs which were reserved, I think it is proper that the defendant should bear those costs himself, and I make no order in relation to them.

Defendant No. 1, who resided in Bombay, was the liquidator of a joint stock company, which had its registered office in Bombay but which owned a factory at Dhulia in West Khandesh District. Negotiations opened in Bombay between defendant No. 1 and the plaintiff's broker on behalf of the plaintiff for the sale of the factory, some of the terms of sale were settled between the parties, and defendant No. 1 afterwards sent the broker to the company's solicitors for settling other terms, receiving the earnest money, and drawing up a draft agreement and an engrossment of that draft. The further terms were settled, the earnest money was received by the solicitors, and a rough draft of agreement was prepared. The agreement was engrossed in due course, but before it could be signed by the plaintiff, the solicitors of defendant No. 1 declined to proceed in the matter saying that they were instructed to put an end to the negotiations. Defendant No. 1 then sold the factory to defendants Nos. 2 to 5 at a higher price. The plaintiff having sued in the Dhulia Court for specific performance of the agreement and for possession of the factory :—

The Company had its registered office in Bombay, and defendant No. 1 also resided and carried on his business in Bombay. The company owned properties, including factories, at Dhulia.

The plaintiff Shankarlal, who resided at Dhulia, was minded to purchase one of the factories, and engaged as his broker one Nandurdikar to carry out the transaction.

It was the plaintiff's case that Nandurdikar saw defendant No. 1 in Bombay in May, 1936, and made an offer of Rs. 62,000 for purchase of the factory. The offer was not accepted. He saw defendant No. 1 again on July 7, 1936, when it was agreed that the factory should be sold for Rs. 63,000, that

On the same day defendant No. 1 sent Nandurdikar to Manekshaw, a partner in the attorneys' firm of Wadia, Ghandy & Co., where, after discussion of further terms, a draft agreement was prepared by Manekshaw. The agreement then stood over for engrossment. Nandurdikar paid Rs. 7,000 as earnest money to the attorneys, who passed a receipt for the amount. On the 8th Nandurdikar brought the plaintiff's brothers Tulshiram and Bhagirath to sign the engrossed agreement, but he was told that the agreement should be signed by the plaintiff himself. When Nandurdikar saw Manekshaw on July 11, he was told by the latter that the agreement was at an end. He saw Manekshaw again on July 13 in company of the plaintiff and offered to sign the agreement, but they were told that the agreement was cancelled.

Defendant No. 1's case was that when the price and some of the terms were settled between him and the broker, the former sent the latter in company of a clerk to the office of Wadia, Ghandy & Co. in order that the terms and conditions on which the sale of the factory was to be effected be properly discussed and settled between the attorneys and the broker. At the interview some more terms were discussed between the two, and a draft agreement was drawn up the same day. The earnest money was paid for which the attorneys passed a receipt. The matter stood over to July 8, the broker objected to the completion of the sale within one month; he also objected that he was not agreeable to apportioning the premium in respect of fire policy and that he did not want it at all. He further made it a condition that a watchman should be posted at the site of the factory on his behalf pending the completion and that he was not agreeable to the provision of costs as stated in the draft agreement. On July 9 when the broker saw Manekshaw he was told that defendant No. 1 was not agreeable to the terms proposed by him. The broker asked Manekshaw to press defendant No. 1 to agree to the terms proposed. On July 10 when the broker saw Manekshaw he was told that defendant No. 1 was not agreeable to the alterations proposed and that the negotiations for the sale of the factory were at an end.

On July 13, 1936, defendant No. 1 agreed to sell the factory in suit and another factory to defendants Nos. 2 to 5 for Rs. 1,25,000. The deed of sale was passed on July 29, 1936, and defendants Nos. 2 to 5 were put in possession of the factories.

On August 31, 1936, the plaintiff filed a suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Dhulia for specific performance of the agreement for sale against defendant No. 1 and for recovery of possession of the factory against defendants Nos. 2 to 5. The plaint alleged that—

"The plaintiff says that a binding agreement has been arrived at in terms of the said draft agreement and the engrossment thereof."

The plaintiff prayed :—

(a) That in and so far as may be necessary it may be declared that a valid and binding agreement was arrived at between the plaintiff and the 1st defendant company on July 7, 1936, and that the first defendant company is bound specifically to

Defendant No. 1 put forward his contentions in his written statement and concluded :—

"Without prejudice and in the event of its being held that a concluded agreement was arrived at between the parties on July 7, 1936, as alleged by the plaintiff in the plaint or at any other stage these defendants say that such contract was reopened and the parties entered into negotiations afresh, which negotiations did not result in a concluded agreement."

The trial Judge held that the Dhulia Court had jurisdiction to hear the suit, that the plaintiff had proved the agreement set up by him, that defendant No. 1 had not proved that the agreement to sell was re-opened after it was concluded, and that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance. The reasons were as follows :—

"On these facts defendant No. 1's learned counsel argues that the Dhulia Court has no jurisdiction to try this suit so far as defendant No. 1 is concerned. He relies on the cases of Hunsraj v. Runchordas (7 Bom. L. R. 319), Holkar v. Dadabhai (14 Bom. 353), Hatimbhai v. Framroz (51 Bom. 516) and Velliappa Chettiar v. Govinda Dass (52 Mad. 809).

These cases show that the plaintiff could have instituted in the Bombay High Court the present suit for specific performance of the contract without asking for possession of the suit property. A suit for specific performance is a suit in personam. In such a suit the Court compels the performance of an obligation ; it acts as a Court of equity on the conscience. Neither title nor possession is in question in a suit for specific performance. The plaintiff therefore could have maintained this suit on the original side of the Bombay High Court provided he asked for specific performance only without asking for possession and cl. 12 of the Letters Patent would not have barred such a suit.

But the question for consideration is whether the Dhulia Court has no jurisdiction to try this suit...

The present suit is governed by the provisions of s. 16 of the Civil Procedure Code. Under cl. (a) of the said section suits for the recovery of immoveable property with or without rents or profits must be instituted in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate. Under cl. (d) of the said section, suits for the determination of any other right to or interest in immoveable property must be instituted in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate. In the case of Maturi v. Kota (28 Mad. 227) the suit was for recovery of unpaid purchase money under a contract for sale of land. It was held that it was a suit 'for determination of any right to or interest in immoveable property' within the meaning of s. 16, cl. (d), of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Leaving aside cl. (d) of s. 16, the present suit is one for the recovery of immoveable property under cl. (a) of s. 16 of the Civil Procedure Code. This Court has therefore jurisdiction to try this suit.

It is argued that this is a suit for possession of the immoveable suit property and that the leave of the Court has not been obtained for joining other causes of action. I am unable to accept the contention. The plaintiff has instituted this suit as a result of the alleged agreement to sell the suit property on July 7, 1936. The cause of action for this suit arose as soon as defendant No. 1 resiled from the contract. The plaintiff therefore has sued for specific performance and for possession of the suit factory. The various reliefs for specific performance, damages, possession of the suit factory and refund of the earnest money are based on the same cause of action. Hence, no leave of the Court is necessary. One of the reliefs claimed is for a declaration that the sale-deed passed by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendants Nos. 2 to 5 is null and void and is not binding on the plaintiff. Strictly speaking there was no need of asking for this relief and it may be ignored altogether. Defendants Nos. 2 to 5 are impleaded as subsequent purchasers with notice of the suit agreement. As they claim under defendant No. 1 under a title arising subsequently to the contract, they are bound by the contract which may be enforced against them. Hence, the relief for a declaration that their sale-deed is null and void, etc., was unnecessary. The cause of action for this suit is one and the same against all the defendants. There was no agreement between the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 2 to 5 and the plaintiff has no independent cause of action against them. The cause of action arose where the agreement was made and when defendant No. 1 resiled from it. As defendants Nos. 2 to 5 claim under defendant No. 1 subsequently to the contract, specific performance of the contract can be enforced against them unless they bring their case under the exception of s. 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act. The contention that the plaintiff has joined other causes of action in this suit for possession of immoveable property is erroneous. The various reliefs sought are based on one and the same cause of action. The suit as framed is therefore maintainable though no leave of the Court was taken...

In July, 1936, Sir Shapurji asked his clerk to write to Nandurdikar to come down to Bombay as shown by the letter (exhibit 145) dated July 3, 1936. Accordingly Nandurdikar saw him in his office on July 6, 1936, and offered Rs. 62,000 as price of the suit factory. Sir Shapurji declined. Nandurdikar came to his office again on July 7, 1936, at 4 p.m.; he offered Rs. 63,000 and Sir Shapurji accepted the offer. Sir Shapurji told Nandurdikar that the earnest money was to be Rs. 10,000, that half the costs were to be borne by each party, that the completion period was to be one month and that there were to be other usual terms which are incorporated in agreements by solicitors. He accepted Nandurdikar's suggestion to pay brokerage at two and a half per cent. Nandurdikar accepted the terms and went to fetch the earnest money. Sir Shapurji called Antia who is a clerk of defendant No. 1 company and told him the terms agreed upon between him and Nandurdikar. He told Antia to take Nandurdikar to Mr. Manekshaw to have the usual agreement drawn up. He told Nandurdikar when he came back to go with Antia. Sir Shapurji left his office at 5-30 p.m. or thereabout. He got a telephone call at his bungalow from Mr. Manekshaw to the effect that the party was offering Rs. 7,000 by way of deposit though he had agreed to pay Rs. 10,000 as earnest. Sir Shapurji agreed to accept Rs. 7,000 on the suggestion of Mr. Manekshaw.

Sir Shapurji admits that when next day Mr. Manekshaw informed over the phone that the party was haggling over the terms agreed between him and the party, he felt that party was resiling from the agreement.

It will be seen thus from the versions of Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji that they had come to a final agreement and that the terms were to be embodied in a formal instrument by Mr. Manekshaw. The formal instrument was to contain the usual other terms which are incorporated by the solicitors in such documents. The versions of Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji differ as to the earnest settled between them in his office. But finally Sir Shapurji agreed to have Rs. 7,000 as earnest after talking over the matter on the phone with Mr. Manekshaw. There was therefore a concluded contract between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji on July 7, 1936, and only a formal agreement remained to be drawn up. In the case of Whymper v. Buckle (3 All. 469) it is held that where two parties have come to a final agreement, the mere fact that at the time of their doing so they intend to embody the terms of such agreement in a formal instrument does not make such agreement less binding on them."

Defendants appealed to the High Court.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga and R. J. Colah, with Wadia, Ghandy & Co., and J. M. Pochkhanavala and D. A. Patel, for the appellants.

M. P. Amin, with W. B. Pradhan, M. W. Pradhan and S. A. Merchant, for the respondent.

BROOMFIELD J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a decree of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Dhulia allowing the plaintiff-respondent's suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of a cotton factory at Dhulia. The factory was one of several belonging to defendant No. 1, a limited company with its registered office in Bombay which was in liquidation.

The plaintiff's case is that the agreement was finally concluded in Bombay on July 7, 1936, when as the result of a conversation between one Nandurdikar, a broker acting for the plaintiff, and Sir Shapurji Billimoria, one of the liquidators, and of a further conversation between Nandurdikar and the company's solicitor Manekshaw the terms of the bargain were all settled and a draft agreement containing these terms was drawn up which was engrossed on the following morning. Neither the draft agreement nor the engrossment was signed by either party, and after several more meetings between Nandurdikar and Manekshaw, the latter, acting under instructions from Sir Shapurji, declined to proceed further and said that the negotiations were at an end. This happened on July 10 according to the defendants and on July 11 according to the plaintiff. On July 13 an agreement was entered into to sell the factory and another factory to defendants Nos. 2 and 5 and a conveyance in their favour was executed on July 29. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to specific performance of the agreement contained in the draft agreement and the engrossment thereof. Among other reliefs he asked for possession of the factory. The subsequent purchasers were made parties under s. 27(b) of the Specific Relief Act.

The defendants challenged the jurisdiction of the Dhulia Court to try the suit as against the company and also alleged misjoinder of causes of action. On the merits their case was that there was no concluded agreement and that the matter never went beyond the stage of negotiations. In the alternative they said that if there had been a concluded agreement, it had been re-opened by the plaintiff.

The trial Court made the following decretal order :—

"(1) It is declared that the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the contract mentioned in the plaint.

(2) The plaintiff do deposit in Court Rs. 56,000 within a fortnight and recover possession of the suit factory.

(3) Defendants Nos. 1 to 5 do execute a conveyance in favour of the plaintiff in respect of the suit factory as claimed within a month from to-day.

(4) The plaintiff do recover interest at six per cent. per annum on Rs. 7,000 from defendant No. 1 from the date of the suit to the date of depositing Rs. 56,000 into Court provided he pays the requisite Court-fee in execution proceedings.

(5) The plaintiff is entitled to get mesne profits from the date of depositing Rs. 56,000 in Court to the date of obtaining possession of the suit property. An inquiry to be made about it on the application of the plaintiff.

(6) Defendant No. 1 do pay half costs of the plaintiff. Defendants Nos. 2 to 5 do pay the remaining half costs of the plaintiff. Defendants shall bear their own costs.

(7) The plaintiff is entitled to be paid the costs awarded from defendants Nos. 2 to 5 out of the money which he will deposit in Court. The balance of the money to be paid to defendants Nos. 2 to 5."

I will deal first of all with the question of jurisdiction. The trial Judge held that the case fell under s. 16, cls. (a) and (d), of the Civil Procedure

Code. That section provides that subject to the pecuniary or other limitations prescribed by any law, suits (a) for the recovery of immoveable property with or without rent or profits and (d) for the determination of any other right to or interest in immoveable property shall be instituted in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate. There is a proviso that a suit to obtain relief respecting, or compensation for wrong to, immoveable property held by or on behalf of the defendant may, where the relief sought can be entirely obtained through his personal obedience, be instituted either in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate, or in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the defendant resides or carries on business. Learned counsel for the appellants has argued that as against defendant No. 1 this is a suit for specific performance and nothing more. That is to say, it is a suit in personam and does not come under either cl. (a) or cl. (d) of s. 16. In that connection he cited Hunraj v. Runchordas<sup>1</sup> and Velliappa Chettiar v. Govinda Dass<sup>2</sup> in which the nature of a suit for specific performance is explained. But those were not cases in which possession was or could have been asked for. In our case the question of jurisdiction has to be determined on the footing that specific performance and possession of the property are both asked for.

It is conceded that the plaintiff is entitled to pray for possession and that the suit, so far as it is a suit for possession, was only triable in the Dhulia Court. But it is urged that there should have been two suits, one against defendant No. 1 in Bombay, where the contract was entered into and was to be performed, and another against defendants Nos. 2 to 5 in Dhulia where the property is situated. There is no doubt I think that separate suits would have been permissible. The learned trial Judge's view that the plaintiff's cause of action for this suit was one and the same and that he could not split it up by bringing one suit against defendant No. 1 at Bombay and another against the other defendants at Dhulia, in view of the provisions of O. II, r. 2, of the Code, seems to be clearly untenable. The cause of action is not the same in respect of specific performance of the contract and possession of the property. The trial Court's view is clearly contrary to Nathu valad Pandu v. Budhu valad Bhika<sup>3</sup> and numerous cases in which that decision has been followed. The cause of action for specific performance is on the contract; the cause of action for possession is on the conveyance resulting from the contract.

However, it does not follow that the combination of the two suits in one is repugnant to any provision of the law. Order I, r. 3, as well as s. 27 of the Specific Relief Act would permit the joinder of all these defendants provided that the Court has jurisdiction to try the suit as against them all. The Dhulia Court and that Court alone would have jurisdiction to try the suit against defendants Nos. 2 to 5. The only question is whether it had jurisdiction against defendant No. 1. It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the suit against defendant No. 1 can be brought under s. 16 (a) because, although the company has parted with possession, the effect of a decree in plaintiff's favour would be that the conveyance to defendants Nos. 2 to 5

A. C. J. would be annulled and the company would be in the same position as though 1940 possession had not been parted with. In other words it is said a suit to recover — possession can be brought against defendant No. 1 even though possession has NEW been parted with. But it must be admitted that this argument is not very MOPUSSIL convincing.
 Co., LTD
 v. On the other hand the language of s. 16 (d) seems to be wide enough to SHANKERLAL cover the case. Sir Jamshedji Kanga says that this clause means the determi— nation of an existing right, and not a right claimed. But Sitabai v. Laxmibai<sup>1</sup> Broomfield J. is an authority which I think is inconsistent with that view. That was a suit for — maintenance together with a prayer for a charge on lands situated in the Poona District. The defendants were not resident in Poona. Nevertheless it was held that the Court had jurisdiction under s. 16(d). The argument put forward in that case to show that the Court had no jurisdiction was that a claim for maintenance is not a charge upon land unless expressly made so by a deed or decree. Therefore at the time of the suit there was no charge on immoveable property and for the purposes of s. 16 it is immaterial if the order of the Court would create a charge. However, the Court rejected that argument. Sir Basil Scott C. J. said in his judgment (p. 340) :—

"On the plaint as framed, the question which has to be decided before the Court will be enabled to pass a decree is whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to a right to, or interest in, immovable property in the Bhimthadi Taluka by way of charge as security for the maintenance which may be decreed. That being the question to be determined, it is a question directly within the terms of section 16(d) of the Civil Procedure Code."

The learned counsel for the appellants seemed to rely mainly on the alleged misjoinder of causes of action. It is provided in O. II, r. 4, that no cause of action shall, unless with the leave of the Court, be joined with a suit for the recovery of immovable property, except (a) claims for mesne profits or arrears of rent in respect of the property claimed or any part thereof; (b) claims for damages for breach of any contract under which the property or any part thereof is held; and (c) claims in which the relief sought is based on the same cause of action. According to the trial Judge the case comes under (c). But this view seems to be clearly wrong. If the cause of action for specific performance and possession were the same, the reliefs could not be split up. Order II, r. 2, would forbid it. But it is settled law that the cause of action for specific performance is distinct from that for possession and therefore a subsequent suit for possession is not barred by res judicata or O. II, r. 2; Nathu valad Pandu v. Budhu valad Bhika<sup>2</sup>, Krishnaji v. Sangappa<sup>3</sup> and Krishnammal v. Soundararaja Ayyar<sup>4</sup>. The latter case was doubted in Sundara Ramamujam v. Sivalingam<sup>5</sup> but our own High Court has followed it.

These same cases, however, show that though a separate suit for possession is not barred, the two causes of action may be joined in the same suit for the sake of convenience or to avoid multiplicity of suits. Learned counsel for the appellants says that the leave of the Court is necessary under O. II, r. 4. But in none of the above cases was there any reference to this rule and there is nothing to show that the option to join the prayer for possession was held to be dependent on the leave of the Court. In that connection we were referred to some observations of Mr. Justice Barlee in Bhagwandas v. Narani<sup>1</sup>. He thought that the joinder of the two causes of action was dependent upon the leave of the Court under O. II, r. 4, but that, as the objection to misjoinder had been waived in that case, the point was immaterial. However, Mr. Justice Patkar who delivered the leading judgment in the case said nothing to suggest that he thought that the leave of the Court was required.

Broomfield J.

As far as defendant No. 1 is concerned the suit seems to fall under cl. (d) of s. 16, as I have said, rather than cl. (a), and that being so, there is no difficulty. The rule in question does not apply to a suit under s. 16 (d). But as against the other defendants the suit comes under s. 16 (a) and undoubtedly the rule does cause a difficulty. The words "for the recovery of immoveable property" presumably mean the same in both cases. It is a possible view perhaps that the rule does not apply where the recovery of immoveable property is sought as a relief consequential on the relief of specific performance of a contract. Certainly in practice the leave of the Court has not been asked for in such cases, though it is a little difficult to see on what principle one can say it is not required. Assuming, however, that the leave of the Court was necessary strictly speaking—and that seems to be the better view—the case is covered by s. 99 of the Code, and the absence of leave, which could be granted even in appeal, is not a ground on which the decree could be reversed or varied.

I now come to the merits of the case, and for that purpose it is necessary to state some further facts. Nandurdikar saw Sir Shapurji first towards the end of May, 1936, and offered Rs. 62,000 for the factory, which offer was refused. On July 3 the liquidators wrote and asked him to come to Bombay to discuss the matter and settle the terms. From letters exchanged between Nandurdikar and the plaintiff it appears that plaintiff was very anxious to purchase the factory and that Nandurdikar had authority to raise his offer to Rs. 65,000 if necessary. There seems, however, to have been some doubt as to whether the liquidators really meant business. Nandurdikar went to see Sir Shapurji on July 6 and made the same offer as before, Rs. 62,000, with the same result. But this was obviously only a try on, as appears from a letter which Nandurdikar wrote to the plaintiff after the interview. He was hopeful of success but did not think that Sir Shapurji would accept less than Rs. 65,000.

Next day, which is the important day, Nandurdikar went to see Sir Shapurji again and made an offer of Rs. 63,000 which was accepted. The other terms agreed upon were that the sale was to be completed within one month, that the costs of the conveyance, etc. were to be borne half and half and that brokerage at two and a half per cent. was to be paid to Nandurdikar by both vendor and purchaser. The amount of the earnest money was also discussed, and this is the only point as to which there is any disagreement between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji. The former says that Rs. 7,000 was the

A. C. J. amount fixed, the latter says it was Rs. 10,000. Nothing turns on this, however, as Rs. 7,000 was the figure ultimately agreed on. Nandurdikar went away to fetch the earnest money and on his return Sir Shapurji sent him with Antia, one of the company's clerks, to the office of Messrs. Wadia, Ghandy & Co., the company's solicitors, to get the draft agreement prepared. Manekshaw after ascertaining what had been settled between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji drew up the draft agreement and read it over to Nandurdikar.

SHANKERLAL
Broomfield J. A discussion then took place.

There is a conflict of testimony as to the character of this discussion. Nandurdikar says that he queried the clause in the draft agreement about apportioning the fire policy between the vendor and purchaser and also wanted provision made about a watchman on the premises until delivery of possession; but as Manekshaw was not agreeable he did not press his points and agreed to all the terms. According to Manekshaw, Nandurdikar not only objected to the fire policy clause but also argued about the costs and wanted the time of completion extended from one month to three months. However, whatever Nandurdikar may have said, Manekshaw cannot have taken his objections very seriously, for he gave orders the same evening for the draft agreement to be engrossed. Moreover, Nandurdikar wrote that night to the plaintiff saying "I saw the liquidator to-day according to my yesterday's letter and the contract is settled to-day. It is settled at Rs. 63,000 and a bayana chithi has been passed. Rs. 7,000 have been paid as earnest and the sale deed is to be completed within a month. Costs are to be paid half and half." It can hardly be doubted that the parties were substantially in agreement on all points, or at any rate Nandurdikar was prepared to conclude the bargain on the terms of the draft agreement. That this was Manekshaw's own view of Nandurdikar's attitude on the 7th is clear from his letter of July 17 in the correspondence before the suit.

Nandurdikar says that the draft was initialled by him and Manekshaw. Manekshaw denies this. In the correspondence plaintiff's solicitors repeatedly asked for copies of the draft and engrossment and defendants' solicitors refused to furnish copies or give inspection. This conduct I think was rather pernickety, but it does not justify the inference that the document, exhibit 149, which was ultimately produced is not the original draft. There are no initials on it. It is to be noted that nothing was said about initials in the correspondence or even in the plaint. The trial Judge left the point undecided. I do not think it makes much difference whether the draft agreement was initialled or not. But if it had to be decided, I should say on the evidence that there were no initials.

Nandurdikar was given a receipt for the earnest money in this form :

"Received from Mr. Shankerlal Naraindas Mundade through Mr. Damodar Trim-buck Rs. 7,000 as earnest and on account of Rs. 63,000 being the price for the sale of the Pressing and Ginning Factory of the New Mofussil Company Limited at Dhulia with the land, building, machinery and stores in the factory on the terms of the draft agreement prepared this day."

There is a dispute between Nandurdikar and Manekshaw as to which was written first, the receipt or the draft agreement. Nandurdikar says the receipt was written last of all and that seems most probable as it refers to the draft agreement. The point is not of material importance.

The terms of the draft agreement which were fair copied in the engrossment made on the morning of July 8 were as follows :—

1. That the vendor agrees to sell and the purchaser to purchase the land hereditaments and premises situate at Dhulia and more particularly described in the schedule hereto the Ginning and Pressing Factory thereon with their appurtenances free from incumbrances at the price of Rs. 63,000 to be paid as follows ; that is to say Rs. 7,000 as deposit on the signing of this agreement and Rs. 56,000 on the completion of the purchase.

2. The purchase shall be completed at the office of Messrs. Wadia Gandhi & Co., within one month from the date hereof. Up to the day of completion the vendor will receive the rents and profits and pay the outgoings of the premises and such rents and profits and outgoings and the amount of the premium (if any) on the fire policy effected on the said premises will be apportioned between the vendor and the purchaser.

There is a press pool agreement for the Pressing Factory which runs from year to year subject to notice of termination as therein provided. There is also a Gin Pool Agreement from November 16, 1935, to August 31, 1936. The purchaser will be bound by these agreements.

3. The vendor shall make out a marketable title to the said premises free from all reasonable doubts and clear at its own expense all claims and incumbrances of whatever nature on the said premises.

4. The vendor shall immediately on the signing of this agreement deposit with the purchaser's solicitors all the title deeds relating to the said premises.

5. The purchaser shall furnish to the vendors' solicitors his requisitions (if any) on the title within 10 days after receipt of the title deeds or after inspection thereof and if he does not do so he shall be deemed to have accepted the title.

6. If the purchaser shall make any objection or requisition which the vendor shall be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with the vendor may notwithstanding any intermediate attempt to remove or comply with the same rescind this agreement by notice in writing to the purchaser unless the purchaser shall within 7 days after such notice unconditionally withdraw such objection or requisition. In case of rescission the vendor shall repay the amount of earnest money without costs or interest.

7. Upon payment of the purchase money at the time and in the manner aforesaid the vendor shall make and execute to the purchaser or such person or persons as he may nominate a proper assurance of the said premises prepared by the purchaser's solicitors and approved by the vendors' solicitors.

8. On the completion of the purchase as aforesaid the vendor shall put the purchaser in possession of the said premises.

9. The vendor has not received any notice for the acquisition of the property under the Land Acquisition Act. If, however, pending the completion of the purchase any such notice is received it shall be optional to the purchaser to put an end to this agreement in which case the vendor shall repay to the purchaser the amount of the earnest money without interest or costs.

It will be seen that there are a number of other terms besides those agreed on between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji. Some of them may be said to be

On the afternoon of July 8, Nandurdikar went to the solicitors' office accompanied by plaintiff's brothers Tulshiram and Bhagirath who happened to have come to Bombay. He went again with the same two persons on the 9th, again with Tulshiram on the 10th, and again with one Sathe, a partner of Bhagirath, on the 11th. According to his story the only purpose of these visits was to arrange about the signing of the engrossment. He had at first offered to sign himself but was told that that would not do as he was mentioned in the agreement as the broker. Then he suggested that Tulshiram should sign and Manekshaw said he would consult Sir Shapurji about it. That was on the 8th, on which day according to Nandurdikar the description of the property was also not ready. On the 9th Nandurdikar says Manekshaw merely told him that he had not yet consulted Sir Shapurji and on the 10th he said that plaintiff must sign. Bhagirath left Bombay that evening to fetch plaintiff and on the 11th Nandurdikar looked in to tell Manekshaw that plaintiff would be coming on the 13th. Manekshaw then told him that the negotiations were at an end, and he protested against this. On the 13th he took plaintiff along with him to the office and asked Manekshaw to take his signature on the engrossment but Manekshaw refused and said that the agreement was broken and the earnest money should be taken back.

Manekshaw's story about the events of these days is that there was no difficulty about the description of the property—it was already sufficiently described in the schedule to the engrossment—and there was also no difficulty about Tulshiram signing. It did not matter to them who signed. But Nandurdikar was pressing for changes in the terms, in particular he wanted provision made for a watchman and he wanted the time for completion extended. Sir Shapurji was consulted and said that he was not agreeable to any change. He (Manekshaw) told Nandurdikar so on the 9th and Nandurdikar asked him to try and persuade Sir Shapurji. Next day he informed Nandurdikar that the transaction was at an end. . . . As to the 11th and the 13th Manekshaw's account does not differ materially from Nandurdikar's.

The learned trial Judge believed Nandurdikar who is supported by plaintiff's brothers. He was favourably impressed with Sir Shapurji's evidence but has criticised Manekshaw severely and refused to believe him even in matters where he is corroborated by Sir Shapurji. The learned Judge had of course the advantage of seeing the witnesses. I must say that in some respects Nandurdikar's story is to my mind a good deal less than completely convincing. I cannot help thinking that there must have been a certain amount of haggling on his part to account for all those interviews from the 8th to the 11th. It could not have taken long to settle who was to sign, and if that was the only point it is difficult to see why Nandurdikar did not wire or write to the plaintiff.

iff on the 8th or 9th and simply tell him to come to Bombay and sign. On the other hand it is scarcely credible that he was seriously insisting on any variation of the terms. Most of the things he is said to have argued about were trivial matters. He knew his principal was anxious to buy the factory. It was to his own interest to conclude the transaction. There is no reason to suppose that plaintiff was in any difficulty about finding the money. He had told Nandurdikar to arrange for two or three weeks' time and a month's time had been allowed. It does not stand to reason therefore that Nandurdikar would have risked a breakdown of the negotiations by standing out for a longer period. I think the trial Judge was clearly right in rejecting this part of the defendants' case.

It was part of the plaintiff's case, though not expressly mentioned in the plaint, that Sir Shapurji resiled from the agreement because of the more advantageous offer from defendants Nos. 2 to 5. The evidence on this point is as follows. On July 12, a pleader from Dhulia acting for defendant No. 4 had a long talk with Manekshaw about purchasing the factory. On the 13th defendants Nos. 2 to 5 who had travelled from Dhulia to Bombay on the 12th (in the same train as the plaintiff as it happened) came to see Sir Shapurji and settled to purchase this factory and another one. Sir Shapurji says that he knew nothing about the new purchasers before the 13th. But on that day their broker Birmadutta, who used to visit Sir Shapurji's office from time to time on insurance business, wrote a letter to Sir Shapurji reporting the completion of the transaction and in this letter he said: "I shall thank you to reserve for me the agreed commission of three per cent. on the sale price as intimated on the 11th instant." This evidence certainly does not justify the trial Judge's finding that Sir Shapurji was negotiating a sale to defendants Nos. 2 to 5 from July 8. It may justify an inference that the negotiations began on the 11th, which is the date on which Manekshaw told Nandurdikar that his business was at an end. But in the view which we take of the law Sir Shapurji's motive for turning down the plaintiff's offer is immaterial. Indeed every item in the plaintiff's case might be conceded and he would still not be entitled to specific performance.

On the question whether what happened on July 7 amounted to a binding agreement between the parties many authorities were cited, the effect of which is summed up in Halsbury, Vol. XXIX, p. 237, paragraphs 321 and 322:—

"An acceptance must be absolute and unqualified. There is no completed contract if the acceptance is 'subject to approval of terms of contract'; or 'subject to a formal contract being prepared and signed by both parties as approved by their solicitors'; or simply 'subject to contract'; or where it otherwise appears that all the terms of the contract are not definitely settled or that additional terms are to be agreed to and inserted in the formal contract.

On the other hand, if it appears that the parties have agreed upon the essential terms of the sale, a mere intimation of a desire that the agreement shall be embodied in another document of a more formal nature, or the expression of what is necessarily a condition, not of the acceptance, but of the contract itself, does not prevent the agreement being enforceable.

It is a question of construction whether the parties have come to a final agreement, though they intend to have a more formal document drawn up".

I may also refer to Dart, Vendor and Purchaser, eighth edition, p. 227. Before referring to the cases I may point out that the law is the same in India as in

A. C. J. England : Harichand Mancharam v. Govind Laxman Gokhale<sup>1</sup> and Currimbhoy & Co. v. Creet.<sup>2</sup>

Broomfield ).

The earliest important case on the subject is Winn v. Bull.<sup>3</sup> In that case there was a lease by written agreement of a house for a certain term at a certain rent "subject to the preparation and approval of a formal contract." No other contract was in fact entered into by the parties and it was held that there was no final agreement which could be enforced. Sir George Jessel M. R. said (p. 30) :—

"I am of opinion that there is no contract. I take it the principle is clear. If in the case of a proposed sale or lease of an estate two persons agree to all the terms and say, 'We will have the terms put into form', then all the terms being put into writing and agreed to, there is a contract.

If two persons agree in writing that up to a certain point the terms shall be the terms of the contract, but that the minor terms shall be submitted to a solicitor, and shall be such as are approved of by him, then there is no contract, because all the terms have not been settled."

Further on in his judgment he said (p. 32) :—

"It comes, therefore, to this, that where you have a proposal or agreement made in writing expressed to be subject to a formal contract being prepared, it means what it says; it is subject to and is dependent upon a formal contract being prepared. When it is not expressly stated to be subject to a formal contract it becomes a question of construction, whether the parties intended that the terms agreed on should merely be put into form, or whether they should be subject to a new agreement the terms of which are not expressed in detail."

These latter observations show that the decision did not turn on the fact that the stipulation about a formal contract was express.

Winn v. Bull was approved by Mr. Justice Parker, afterwards Lord Parker, in Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander.<sup>4</sup> In the course of his judgment his Lordship said (p. 288) :—

"It appears to be well settled by the authorities that if the documents or letters relied on as constituting a contract contemplate the execution of a further contract between the parties, it is a question of construction whether the execution of the further contract is a condition or term of the bargain or whether it is a mere expression of the desire of the parties as to the manner in which the transaction already agreed to will in fact go through. In the former case there is no enforceable contract either because the condition is unfulfilled or because the law does not recognise a contract to enter into a contract. In the latter case there is a binding contract and the reference to the more formal document may be ignored."

These observations have become classic and have been cited with approval in Rossdale v. Denny<sup>5</sup> and in many other cases.

Pausing here for a moment I may say that although the trial Judge in one place in his judgment has expressed the view that there was a concluded contract as the result of the conversation between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji on July 7, and that only a formal agreement remained to be drawn up, that is not and never has been the plaintiff's case. Neither in the plaint nor in Nandurdikar's evidence has it been stated or even suggested that the agreement was finally concluded at the interview between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji. It is not even plaintiff's case as appearing in the pleadings and the evidence that the agreement was finally concluded by the oral discussion between Nandurdikar and Manekshaw, without reference to the written agreement. Nandurdikar has admitted that Sir Shapurji sent him to the solicitors' office to get the draft agreement prepared. It was the terms of the draft agreement which he discussed with Manekshaw. In the correspondence before the suit plaintiff's solicitors stated that they based their case on the draft agreement and the engrossment, and in paragraph 13 of the plaint it was quite definitely stated that the agreement of which specific performance was sought was the one contained in these two documents. In such a case it is difficult to see how Lord Parker's rule can assist the plaintiff. It is impossible to hold that the oral agreement only need be looked at and that the documents may be ignored, for it was admittedly part of the understanding between the parties that these documents should be prepared and the suit is actually founded on them. The question to be decided seems to me to be, not whether these documents were necessary or whether the agreement was complete without them, but whether, a draft agreement and engrossment being evidently contemplated by the parties, the contract can be said to be complete without the formal agreement being signed and executed.

In that connection we have to refer to the line of authorities beginning with Coope v. Ridout.<sup>1</sup> The facts of that case are thus stated in the head-note :—

"Purchasers made an offer by letter to a vendor to purchase his freehold property at a specified sum 'subject to title and contract'. Negotiations followed, and the purchasers alleged that all the material terms were subsequently agreed to between the parties at an interview and by letters, and were embodied by the purchasers in a draft contract which the vendor returned unaltered with the words: 'it seems to be all in order.' The vendor having refused to complete, the purchasers brought an action for specific performance of the contract contained in the draft."

It was held that even assuming that all the terms of the agreement had been settled one by one and embodied in the draft, the condition contained in the offer required that a written agreement made inter partes should be formally entered into, and in the absence of such a document there was no enforceable contract. The case was originally tried by Mr. Justice Eve (1920, 2 Ch. 416) who said in the course of his judgment (p. 419) :—

"That brings me to the question of what is the true meaning of the condition. Is it fulfilled as soon as you can assert with confidence that the parties are ad idem and that a consensus on all material points has been reached? I do not think so. I think the condition contemplates and requires a written contract inter partes and formally entered into."

This view was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

A similar decision was given by the Court of Appeal in Chillingworth v. Esche.<sup>2</sup> In that case there was an agreement to purchase land "subject to a proper contract to be prepared by the vendor's solicitors". A proper contract was subsequently prepared by the vendor's solicitors, approved by the purchasers as well as executed by the vendor and tendered to the purchasers for execution. The purchasers refused to sign. Nevertheless it was held not

A. C. J. only that there was no contract but that the purchasers were entitled to recover the deposit. Pollock M. R. seems to have attached some importance to the expression "proper contract", but the decision did not turn upon that. 1940
 NEW Coope v. Ridout was followed among other cases by all the Judges and it was MOFUSSIL held that in the absence of an executed agreement either party was entitled CO., LTD. to break off negotiations "for reasons good, bad or indifferent", on the simple v. SHANKERLAL ground that there was no contract capable of enforcement.

— In Lockett v. Norman-Wright<sup>1</sup> Mr. Justice Tomlin (as he then was) held Broomfield ]. that an agreement "subject to suitable agreements being arranged by solicitors" was in the same category as agreements "subject to contract" "subject to formal contract" and "subject to proper contract" and that the principle laid down in Coope v. Ridout and Chillingworth v. Esche applied. It was not sufficient that the draft agreement should be approved by the solicitors. They were not agents to conclude a bargain for their clients. Execution of the agreement was essential.

I have already mentioned that the English law applies in this country. It must be applied mutatis mutandis. As we have no Statute of Frauds the agreement need not be in writing and therefore it may be a matter of oral agreement or even of inference from the conduct of the parties that the terms of their bargain are to be reduced to a formal contract. But once it is clear that that is the understanding the consequence must be the same as under the English law where the words "subject to contract" or similar words are used.

The understanding here was that there was to be a draft agreement and an engrossment of that draft. That I think is beyond dispute. It has never been suggested in the pleadings or the evidence that the preparation of these documents was in any way superfluous or contrary to the understanding between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji. I may at this point refer to the actual evidence. Sir Shapurji says that when Nandurdikar went away to get the earnest money he sent for Antia, the company's clerk, and told him the conditions agreed to between Nandurdikar and himself. Then I quote his own words :

"I asked him to wait until Nandurdikar came and to take him to Mr. Manekshaw to have the usual agreement drawn up. He came at about 5-30 p.m. and in his presence I again gave instructions to Antia to take him to Manekshaw to have the agreement drawn up."

In cross-examination on this point he said :

"Mr. Manekshaw had to take instructions from me about the terms. He had to put them into legal form and incorporate such other terms as to safeguard the interests of the client. In the present case the main terms were settled between me and Nandurdikar. The solicitors were to insert other terms about fire insurance and other usual terms."

Drawing up a draft agreement and engrossing it would naturally mean that the document was not to be a mere memorandum of terms already agreed on but was to be signed and executed. It seems to me that the plaintiff's case can only be taken out of the ordinary rule if he is able to show that execution was not necessary because the agreement or understanding between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji rendered it unnecessary. But Nandurdikar has never said or suggested that the engrossment was not to be signed and his whole conduct even on his own showing indicates that he knew it had to be signed. He says that he had three interviews with Manekshaw to settle who was to sign it and even after he had been told that the negotiations were at an end he produced the plaintiff for the purpose of getting it signed. On what principle then can it be said that the agreement was complete without execution of the document? It seems to me that the case clearly falls within the principle of Coope v. Ridout and the other authorities cited.

SHANKERLAL
Broomfield J.

It may be mentioned, though learned counsel for the plaintiff did not make a point of it, that there was no written agreement in the case of the subsequent agreement of sale to defendants Nos. 2 to 5. According to Sir Shapurji a written bargain paper was dispensed with by consent in that case to save expense. We are informed that the receipt for the earnest money gave full details. But anyhow the absence of a writing in a different transaction cannot assist the plaintiff. Whether a written agreement is necessary and if so whether execution of the written agreement is necessary must obviously depend on the intention of the parties in the particular case. In our case the only possible inference seems to me to be that Sir Shapurji accepted Nandurdikar's offer subject to the execution of a written agreement and that Nandurdikar acquiesced.

Mr. Amin, I think, conceded that if that was our view of the evidence he would have no case. He cited some English cases, Bornmewell v. Jenkins,<sup>1</sup> Bolton Partners v. Lambert<sup>2</sup> and Filby v. Hounsell.<sup>3</sup> As to these it is only necessary to say, firstly, that they were all cases where there was originally a completed agreement. There was no doubt a stipulation for a formal contract, but the contract was to contain no new terms. These cases are therefore distinguishable from the present one on that ground. Secondly, they were all prior to Coope v. Ridout. Halsbury in his note to paragraph 322 already referred to says: "In practice the reference to a future contract is now treated as making the acceptance conditional on the signing of a formal contract."

We were also referred to Bijoya Kanta Lahiri Chowdhury v. Kailash Chandra Bhosumik.<sup>4</sup> The facts in that case were that the defendant entered into an oral agreement to grant the plaintiff a lease of his specified share in certain mouzas at a fixed annual rent and a stipulated premium, and a draft lease was to be prepared and approved of by his pleader. Part of the premium was paid at once and accepted by the defendant as earnest money. No draft lease was prepared and approved of, but it was held that the agreement was complete and enforceable notwithstanding the omission of the approved draft. The view which the Court took of the evidence was that the draft was intended by the parties to be merely commemorative of the terms already agreed upon and not a condition of the completion of the agreement. It is to be noted that this was a second appeal and the High Court was therefore bound to accept the findings of fact of the Court below. Mr. Justice Richardson in his judgment said (p. 777): "It is said that the mere fact that a formal document was contemplated was prima facie an indication that the parties did not

A. C. J. intend to be bound till it was executed. That may be so, but there was other evidence before the Court." He went on to say that the finding of the lower Court must be accepted because it could not be held that there was no evidence to justify it. Another point to be noted with regard to this case is that it is of the year 1919 and is therefore prior to Coope v. Ridout.

NEW
CO., LTD.
v.
SHANKERLAL
Broomfield J.
The strongest case in favour of the plaintiff is Harichand Mancharam v. Govind Laxman Gokhale.<sup>1</sup> That was a case of a suit for specific performance based on two writings, practically in identical terms and signed respectively by the two parties. The conditions of sale were set out in considerable detail, and one of the conditions was that the bargain paper in respect of the sale was to be made through a vakil within two days. It seems that formal documents were prepared by the defendants' solicitors in which some additional terms were inserted, but the parties did not agree as to these terms. Their Lordships of the Privy Council agreeing with the judgment of the Appeal Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance. The case was decided in 1922 and Coope v. Ridout was not cited. But apart from that the case is clearly distinguishable from the present. Their Lordships said after referring to Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander (p. 31) :—

"The facts of that case were wholly different from the present, but the judgment marks the difference between a completed and binding agreement and one subject to a condition. Here exhibits A and A1 [those were the two documents signed by the parties containing the terms of the bargain] show clearly that the parties had come to a definite and complete agreement on the subject of the sale. They embodied in the documents that were exchanged the principal terms of the bargain on which they were in absolute agreement, and regarding which they did not contemplate any variation or change. The reservation in respect of a formal document to be prepared by a Vakil only means that it should be put into proper shape and in legal phraseology, with any subsidiary terms that the vakil might consider necessary for insertion in a formal document."

Evidently therefore their Lordships thought that it was a case where according to Lord Parker's dictum the further writing could be ignored because it was to be merely a record of what was already agreed upon. The case would only have been similar to the present case if the plaintiff here had sued on the basis of the oral agreement between Nandurdikar and Sir Shapurji and not, as in fact he has done, on the draft agreement and engrossment.

I think, therefore, this appeal must succeed on the merits and plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance.

The trial Court has awarded plaintiff some small amounts by way of mesne profits and damages. In the cross-objections a larger amount is claimed. Learned counsel for the appellants argues that plaintiff is entitled to nothing under these heads. He is not entitled to mesne profits because he has no right to possession until the execution of a conveyance and therefore defendants' possession was not wrongful, and he is not entitled to damages because no specific amount was claimed, no Court-fees were paid for this relief and there is no evidence that any loss has been caused to him. I think there is a good deal of force in these contentions, but as the suit fails altogether in our opinion they need not be further discussed.

DIVATIA J. I concur.

The main point arising for decision on the arguments urged before us is whether there was a concluded contract between the parties. In India an oral contract to sell is valid and binding on the parties. But where a dispute arises after a draft agreement in pursuance of the alleged contract is made, the question would be whether it was the intention of the parties to be bound by the contract as embodied in the written document or by the contract on the terms agreed upon orally before the draft was executed. That intention may be inferred in the absence of definite evidence by comparing the terms alleged to have been agreed before the draft with the further terms discussed or agreed as appearing in the draft. In the present case the evidence shows to my mind that the contract by which the parties were to be bound was to be embodied in a formal document prepared by the solicitor of the first defendant and signed by or on behalf of both the parties. The evidence of the plaintiff's broker is sufficient to show that although the main terms of the contract had been agreed to between him and Sir Shapurji on the 7th, there was a further discussion after he went to the office of the defendants' solicitors at least with regard to one topic which according to the plaintiff's broker did not form part of the terms discussed between him and Sir Shapurji. That term was about fire insurance. He says that he told Manekshaw that fire insurance was not agreed to but the latter told him that it was the usual form, that the sum was trifling and hence he did not ask Manekshaw to delete the clause. He further says that he told the solicitors to allow the plaintiff to put a watchman until the sale-deed was made, although according to him the keeping of the watchman was not going to be a term of the contract itself. In the draft agreement as well as the unsigned engrossment there are certain terms which were admittedly not agreed to between the plaintiff's broker and Sir Shapurji and which must be regarded as new and additional terms between the parties. Some of those terms were not merely formal provisions to be put by the lawyer in the document. The principal out of these terms are those relating to the pool agreement between the parties and the terms under clauses 6, 9 and 11 of the draft. Sir Shapurji says in his evidence that his solicitors had to put the main terms agreed upon in the legal form and incorporate such other terms as to safeguard the interests of his client. According to the evidence of the plaintiff's broker he sent the receipt to the plaintiff at Dhulia and when he was told that the plaintiff's presence was necessary for his signature on the engrossment, he sent word to him to come to Bombay for that purpose. That was so because it was the written contract containing all the terms agreed upon that was to govern the legal relation between the parties. Besides, it must be noted that what the plaintiff seeks to enforce in the present suit is specific performance of the contract as embodied in the draft agreement and the unsigned engrossment and not of the terms agreed upon between the plaintiff's broker and Sir Shapurji. That is a material point because it shows that the intention of the parties was to be bound by the terms as embodied in the written agreement.

If therefore the plaintiff seeks to enforce specific performance of the contract embodied in the draft agreement, it must be shown that that particular contract was concluded. It is, however, urged by learned counsel for the plaintiff

CO., LTD.
v.

SHANKERLAL

A. C. J. that there were two contracts, one between Sir Shapurji and the plaintiff's 1940 broker and the other containing the additional terms in the draft agreement — which were agreed to between the broker and the defendants' solicitors. As NEW has been observed by Parker J. in the leading case on the subject in Von MOFUSSIL Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander<sup>1</sup> the criterion in such cases is whether the Co., LTD. execution of a further contract was a condition or term of the bargain or v whether it was a mere expression of the desire of the parties as to the man-SHANKERLAL ner in which the transaction already agreed to will in fact go through. Now — here if all the terms which were embodied in the draft agreement had been Divatia J. agreed to by the parties and what remained was for the lawyer of the party — or parties to embody them into legal forms, the result might have been different. But admittedly there were several terms which were discussed after the main terms were fixed and the plaintiff's broker was sent to the solicitors for the purpose of preparing a written agreement after discussion of those other terms. The further contract was therefore a term of the bargain and not merely an expression of desire. The question therefore is not whether there was another contract after the first contract was completed, but whether the intention of the parties was to make a proper contract by the execution of a written document, and on that point I think the evidence points to the conclusion that it was the written contract between the parties that was to govern the relations between them. That being so, the authorities relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants would apply to the present case.

Out of a number of authorities which have been cited before us I think the material authorities are the decisions in Coope v. Ridout<sup>2</sup> and Chillingworth v. Esche<sup>3</sup> and Lockett v. Norman-Wright.<sup>4</sup> All of them proceed on the basis that where the agreement was to be subject to a contract or subject to a proper contract or subject to a suitable arrangement being made between the solicitors of the parties, it is the finally executed contract that governs the legal relation between the parties. In India, as I said before, there can be an oral agreement to sell. But there also the principle applicable would be the same if from the oral agreement between the parties it can be concluded that the parties were to execute a written document containing the terms of the agreement as a condition of the contract.

On this view of the law it is not necessary to dwell upon a good deal of the evidence which has been discussed by the learned Judge. But I may say briefly that in my opinion the defendants have not proved that the plaintiff's broker objected to the two conditions about the period of completion and the cost of execution. On the other hand it appears from the letters exhibits 147, 148 and 150 that the plaintiff was very eager to conclude the bargain and that the broker had informed plaintiff on the evening of the 7th as to what had happened between him and the defendants' solicitors. But the question is not what the plaintiff thought about the result of the arrangement but what would in law be the result if the intention of the parties was to be governed by the terms of the written agreement. Plaintiff says that the defendants backed out because they had a better offer. The evidence shows that on the 11th when the defendants' solicitors told the plaintiff's broker that the negotiations were at an end the defendants had some talk with the agents of the subsequent purchasers. The question, however, is not whether the conduct of the subsequent purchasers is, as has been put in one case, good, bad or indifferent, but whether there had been a concluded contract between the parties. The learned Judge below has based his decision on the defendants' failure to prove that the plaintiff's broker backed out after the terms were settled, but the legal relations between the parties as urged before us on behalf of the defendants had not been put or at any rate stressed before the learned Judge. The decisions in Harichand Mancharam v. Govind Laxman Gokhale<sup>1</sup> and Currimbhoy & Co. v. Creel<sup>2</sup> make it clear that on this point the English law applies to contracts for sale in India and that being so, the law as laid down in the latest rulings under the English law must apply to the facts of the present case.

It has been conceded by the learned counsel on behalf of the respondent that if the agreement between the parties is to be read subject to a contract or subject to the terms being embodied in a written document, then the authorities relied upon on behalf of the appellants would apply to the present case, and, as on the evidence it appears to me that the parties were to be bound by the written agreement, those authorities would apply with the result that till defendant No. 1's solicitor told the plaintiff's broker that the matter was off it was only in the stage of negotiations between the parties and had not reached the stage of a concluded contract. I therefore agree that the contract having not been concluded it was open to defendant No. 1 to break off the negotiations before the engrossment was executed by both the parties.

On behalf of the respondent reliance has been placed upon the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Harichand Mancharam v. Govind Laxman Gokhale. That case bears some resemblance to the facts of the present case. But I do not think it is on all fours with our case. There were two writings there passed by the parties to each other in which all the material terms of the contract were embodied and a lawyer was to put those terms into legal shape. Subsequently certain subsidiary terms were introduced in the document and it was put into proper legal form. Here, however, the terms alleged to have been agreed to in the first instance were not all the terms embodied in the document but only the main terms and the other terms embodied in the draft agreement cannot in my opinion be regarded as merely subsidiary. Besides, in that case the action was brought not on the terms as appearing in the written document prepared by the lawyer but on the terms agreed to by the parties in the two written documents. Here, as I said before, the plaintiff seeks specific performance not of the terms agreed to between the plaintiff's broker and Sir Shapurji but of the terms in the draft agreement about which there was no discussion in the alleged first contract. The decision in Harichand Mancharam v. Govind Laxman Gokhale therefore would not apply to the facts of the case before us.

r. 4, I think the lower Court had the jurisdiction to entertain the present suit as it falls in any case under s. 16 (d) of the Civil Procedure Code, and under the combined operation of O. I, r. 3, as well as O. II, r. 3, it would be open to the plaintiff to seek specific performance of the contract as well as possession of the property. It is true that it has been laid down in several cases that specific performance of a contract and possession of the property agreed to be sold are two different causes of action and therefore they cannot be combined in one suit except with the leave of the Court, and indeed there are observations in one decision of this Court, viz. Bhagwandas v. Naran,<sup>1</sup> that leave should be obtained under O. II, r. 4. It may be more proper to ask for such leave on the ground that the causes of action are distinct, although they could be combined in one suit. Here, however, the point is academical because I do not think that even if leave was necessary it would affect the merits of the case under s. 99 of the Civil Procedure Code. The suit therefore was properly brought in the Dhulia Court and the want of leave under O. II, r. 4, would not necessarily result at the present stage in the dismissal of the suit. But, as the plaintiff fails on the merits in proving that there was a concluded contract between the parties, I am of the opinion the suit must be dismissed on that ground.

APYA SHETTYA TALAWAR

v.

RAMMAKKA APYA TALAWAR.*

Hindu law—Adoption—Illegitimate son—Mother whether competent to give him in adoption.

Under Hindu law, even among Shudras, a woman is incompetent to give in adoption her son born of adulterous intercourse.

SUIT for declaration.

The parties to the suit were Mahars, a sub-caste of Shudras.

The plaintiff Ramakka was the widow of one Apya. She adopted Shettya, who was married to Mallawa. After Shettya's death, Mallawa adopted Apya (defendant) on November 15, 1928.

* Second Appeal No. 26 of 1939, from the decision of T. B. Shanbhag, Assistant Judge at Belgaum, in Appeal No. 229 of 1937, confirming the decree passed by B. K. Khade, Additional Joint Subordinate Judge at Belgaum, in Regular Civil Suit No. 130 of 1935.

The defendant was the son of his mother Malli and was born of adulterous intercourse. He was born years after the death of Malli's husband.

Mallawa remarried after she took defendant in adoption.

The plaintiff was in possession of the property of Shettya.

On April 9, 1935, the plaintiff sued for a declaration that the defendant was not the validly adopted son of Shettya.

The trial Court granted the declaration sought, observing as follows :—

"It is inconceivable to think that the parents who are said to possess the power to give a son in adoption are not the duly wedded husband and wife. It is repugnant to the notions of the Hindus and against the spirit of the Hindu law of adoption that a child that is born of illicit intercourse can be an adoptee. The text on the point as to who has the power to give in adoption means that the father, i.e. the duly wedded husband of the mother of the boy, has a primary right to give the boy in adoption, and that after his death the mother has the power to give a son in adoption. It would appear from this that the adoption of an illegitimate son is not favoured by the Hindu law and the illegitimate son cannot be an adoptee.

The objects of adoption are two-fold : The first is religious, to secure spiritual benefit to the adopter and his ancestors by having a son for the purpose of offering the funeral cakes and libations of water to the manes of the adopter and his ancestors. The second is secular, to secure an heir and perpetuate the adoptee's name. If the primary object of adoption was to gratify the manes of the ancestors by annual offerings, it was necessary to delude the manes as it were into the idea that the offerer really was the descendant. He was to look as much like a real son as possible, and certainly was not to be one who could never have been a son. As the chief reason for adoption is the performance of funeral ceremonies it follows that one who from any personal disqualification would be incapable of performing them and who for that reason would not look as much like a real son would be an unfit person to be adopted. A son born of illicit intercourse is disqualified from performing the funeral ceremonies. If such a boy is adopted it can hardly be conceived that he would become competent to secure spiritual benefit to the adopter and his ancestors by offering funeral cakes and libations of water. So from this point of view also an illegitimate son is not eligible to be an adoptee.

An illegitimate son has not the status of a son even among Shudras and is not entitled to a share of the inheritance. He is entitled to a share of the inheritance only in the case when it is proved that he is a dasi-putra and that he is not the fruit of an adulterous or incestuous intercourse. He is not competent at all to perform any funeral ceremonies or offer any libations of water to his putative father or his putative father's ancestors. The result of an adoption is that the adopted boy gets all the rights and privileges of a legitimate son. He gets the status of a son. He is entitled to inherit to his father and to collaterals of his adoptive father. He becomes competent to offer funeral cakes to the adoptive father and his ancestors. If an illegitimate son is deemed to be eligible to be an adoptee, he shall come to possess this status, these rights and this competence which he originally never possessed. This position is really inconceivable and against the general principles and spirit of the Hindu law of adoption. Looked at from any point of view an illegitimate son cannot be eligible to be an adoptee even among Shudras."

On appeal the decree was affirmed by the Assistant Judge, for the following reasons :—

"It is an established principle of Hindu law that among the regenerate classes an illegitimate son born as dasi-putra is entitled to maintenance and nothing more. The rights of an illegitimate son are enlarged among Shudras when he is not born of incestuous or illicit intercourse...An illegitimate son even among Shudras is ranked much inferior to a legitimate son in that he gets half a share of the latter. It is, therefore, clear that under the Hindu law an illegitimate son when his rights are enlarged among Shudras does not rank or does not occupy the same status as a

I agree with the argument of the learned pleader for the appellant that the spiritual aspect of adoption among Mahars must be negligible. It may be even nil, but there is the other aspect to adoption which is secular. But even under that aspect I cannot think that an illegitimate son can be allowed to occupy the same status as a legitimate-born child."

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

P. B. Gajendragadkar, for the respondent.

WASSOODEW J. This is a second appeal from a decree of the Assistant Judge of Belgaum. The dispute relates to the validity of the adoption of the defendant to the action. The suit was instituted by one Ramakka, a Holer or Shudra by caste, for a declaration that the defendant was not legally adopted on November 15, 1928, to her deceased son Shettya by the latter's widow Mallawa; and for confirmation of the plaintiff's possession of her son's estate owing to the remarriage of Mallawa. The validity of the adoption was questioned on two principal grounds: (1) that the defendant was born of an adulterous intercourse, his conception and birth having taken place long after his mother's husband's death, and (2) that the mother, although a Holer or Shudra, had given him in adoption after her remarriage. Both the Courts below have found, and the finding is not challenged before us, that the defendant was an offspring of adulterous intercourse and that he was given in adoption before his mother's remarriage. On account of the former defect the Courts below have held that the adoption is invalid in law and accordingly the plaintiff's claim was allowed. The defendant has appealed against that decree and he maintains that that view of the law is erroneous.

The question of the validity of the defendant's adoption has to be considered from different stand-points: first, the capacity of the adoptive parent to take in adoption; secondly, the capacity of the natural parent to give in adoption; and, thirdly, the capacity to be given or taken in adoption. As to the capacity of the adoptive parent there is no dispute. The controversy centres round the last two points.

The capacity of the mother to give the defendant in adoption has been challenged on the ground that the mother's capacity is restricted to her legitimate son and does not extend to a son of an adulterous or incestuous intercourse. The argument is that an illegitimate son does not fall in any of the recognized classes of sons under the Hindu law, and that not being specially referred to in the texts as a fit object for being given in adoption it must be assumed that the Rishis discouraged the adoption of such a son. The capacity to be given and taken in adoption is also similarly challenged, for, it is said that the defendant not being a son of the recognized description will be unable to fulfil the spiritual object of adoption by giving the pinda. It is also contended that as an adopted son must be of the same caste as the adopter even among Shudras, the defendant could not be adopted as an offspring of an adulterous intercourse belongs to no caste.

Now, ordinarily a mother is capable of giving her son in adoption according to the Hindu law. The basis for that authority is the following text of Manu (c. IX, 168):

"That (boy) equal (by caste) whom his father or his mother affectionately give, (confirming the gift) with (a libation of) water, in times of distress (to a man) as his son, must be considered as an adopted son Dattrima (दत्त्रिम),"

(See F. Max Muller's Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXV, p. 361). Yajñavalkya (II, s. XI, v. 130) says the same thing :

"He, whom his mother or father may give (in adoption) shall be considered as 'the adopted son'."

Baudhayana (c. II, 2, 3 and 20) declares thus :

"He is called a Dattaka son who being given by his father and his mother or by either of the two, is received in the place of a child."

(Dattaka Mimamsa, s. IV, 14) :

"Both parents alone have the power, for the connection to them is equal."

According to the texts, if both the parents are alive, their concurrence seems to be necessary. Mitakshara, while explaining Yajñavalkya's definition of a Dattaka son (c. I, s. XI, 9), says :

"He, who is given by his mother under her husband's direction, when her husband is absent on a journey or is dead (after her husband's decease), or who is given by the father, or by both, to a person of the same class, becomes the adopted son (दत्तक) of him to whom he is given."

The author of the Viramirodaya (see Golapchandra Sarkar's translation, p. 115) observes thus :

"He, whom the mother with her husband's assent, or the father gives to another, becomes his adopted son."

In his Vyavahara-Mayukha referring to the above description by Manu of a Dattaka son, Nilakantha observes (Vyavahara-Mayukha, p. 50, Mandlik's Edition) :

"From the particle 'or' (in the passage 'the mother or the father give') it appears that in default of the mother, the father alone may give ; and in default of the father, the mother alone ; but if both are in existence, then even both ; this, Madana (says)."

The relative rights of the father and the mother to make the gift of a son in adoption do not seem to have been discussed in detail in Dattaka-Chandrika ; but the following observations of Devanda-Bhatta are important (Dat. Chand. 1. 31-32) :—

"But, by a woman, the gift may be made with her husband's sanction if he be alive or even without it, if he be dead, or remotely absent, or retired from the world."

Accordingly Vasistha ordains,—

"Let not a woman, either give or receive a son, except with the assent of her husband." (Sutherland's translation.)

According to Dattaka-Mimamsa there is no express recognition of the right of a woman to adopt, but in reference to Vasistha he admits that a woman is also competent to give a son with the husband's assent. In relation to the texts of Manu and Yajñavalkya Nanda Pandita says that "what is said of the mother in these passages must be taken to be subject to the assent of her husband." (See Dattaka-Mimamsa, s. IV, 11).

Upon the parental proprietorship of a child the above texts are in my opinion easily explainable. The limitation on the mother's sole power to give must

APYA In Putlabai v. Mahadu<sup>1</sup> the question of the right of a mother to give her — son in adoption was considered, and it was held that that right was not de-Wassoodew J. rived by delegation from her husband and that it was the result of the mater— nal relation. The Court there was considering whether the mother retained the right to give her son in adoption upon her remarriage, and it was held that the Hindu Widow Remarriage Act (XV of 1856) did not afford any indication that the Legislature intended to deprive her of it. The question was again considered by the full bench of this Court in Fakirappa v. Savitrewa,<sup>2</sup> where it was held that a Hindu widow on her remarriage loses all power of giving her son by her first husband in adoption, because her connection with the family of her husband, which is necessary for the act of giving in adoption, ceases on remarriage. It was pointed out that the Smriti-writers did not contemplate a remarriage of a Hindu widow, and that as they prohibited widow remarriage it could not be assumed that the right to give the son in adoption was retained upon remarriage. The full bench does not expressly overrule the view adopted in Putlabai v. Mahadu that the right of a female parent to give the son in adoption results from the maternal relationship and is not derived by delegation from her husband. All that it says is that the maternal relationship ceases on remarriage. A step-mother is unable to give her step-son in adoption because there is absence of parental relationship (see Papamma v. V. Appa Rau<sup>3</sup>). Where there is such relationship, it has been held that the right to give is not affected by the conversion of the parents [see Shamsing
v. Santabai<sup>4</sup>.] There is no doubt that parental relationship does exist between a mother and her adulterous offspring—there is indeed hereditary blood between the mother and her illegitimate child [see Mayna Bai v. Uttaram<sup>5</sup>] —and the mother of an illegitimate son may on that account claim domain over him. The right of a mother to give her son in adoption independently of the father is however founded upon the existence of special circumstances such as those enumerated in the texts. The conditions governing that right are that the child to be given is the son of her husband and that the latter is incapable of giving his assent. Prima facie these two conditions are impossible of fulfilment in the case of a bastard child.

As I shall presently show, an illegitimate son is not the son contemplated by the Rishis and the Codes who can be a fit object of a gift within the capacity of the mother. It appears that there is no clear text dealing with the gift of a son of an adulterous intercourse born to a Hindu widow, for the Rishis did not consider such a contingency. At least, we have not been referred to any textual authority suggesting that such a son could be given in adoption. Whilst it is said for the plaintiff that the Hindu law treats with disfavour and attaches stigma on an adulterous intercourse, it is contended to the contrary for the defendant, namely, that there is no disabling stigma about adultery amongst Hindus, particularly among Shudras, to which class the parties belong, as illegitimate children have been allowed to inherit and claim maintenance among Shudras. Reliance was placed on the observations of Cowell in his Treatise on Hindu Law (Part I, vide pp. 170-171) where he says as follows :—

“There is no disabling stigma about adultery amongst Hindus, and it follows that illegitimacy does not confer disgrace. Sonship confers so great advantages upon fathers, that the question of legitimacy is one which originally had no effect, even in excluding from inheritance. The son whether of concealed birth, or born before marriage, belonged to the husband.”

We were also referred to Hargovind Kuari v. Dharam Singh,<sup>1</sup> Ram Kali v. Jamma,<sup>2</sup> and Mayna Bai v. Uttaram for the view that an illegitimate son is not regarded by the Hindu law quasi filius nullius and that an illegitimate son could claim, among the regenerate classes, maintenance and among Shudras, a share in the inheritance out of the estate of his putative father [see Inderun Valungypooly Taver v. Ramaswamy Pandia Talaver.<sup>3</sup>] But those cases are clearly distinguishable on the facts. In the first Allahabad case the Court was considering the question of maintenance claimed by a dasi-putra and the observations were made with regard to the social status of an illegitimate son of a ‘dasi’ or a female slave living in continuous concubinage with the father. In Ram Kali’s case the Court was considering the question of the claim of an illegitimate son of a Shudra to inheritance out of the estate of his putative father. These are particular instances where the Courts have allowed the custom among Shudras to prevail. But it cannot be said on that account that Hindu law tolerated or even encouraged loose morals. On the other hand, it is noticeable that it set a high moral standard both for men and women. Adultery was regarded as उपपत्तिक (sin) on the part of both men and women. Manu says (c. VIII, vv. 371 and 372) :

“The king shall cause her (the wife who violates the duty to her lord) to be devoured by dogs in a place frequented by many.”

The punishment was death for the adulterous wife and the adulterer (see Manu VIII, v. 359). Such was the severity of the law that it prescribed punishment for visiting a house of ill repute. Mayne has quoted Mitakshara on Yajnavalkya, Part I (Achar) 90, 222, in support of his statement that under the Hindu law the marriage tie was extremely strict and the offspring of adulterous intercourse (कुल or गोलक) was excluded from social intercourse as well as from invitations to Shradhas or obsequial ceremonies (vide Mayne on Hindu Law and Usage, 10th Ed., p. 109). According to Apastamba Sutra,

“If a man approaches a woman who had been married before, or was not legally married to him, or belongs to a different caste, they both commit a sin Through their (sin), their son also becomes sinful.”

- A. C. J. . In summarising the view of the texts relating to secondary sons the following observations occur in Mayne on Hindu Law and Usage (c. IV, pp. 122-123, paragraph 81):—
- 1940
SHETTYA v. RAMMAKKA
Wassoodew J.
- "It is beyond doubt that, so far as spiritual benefit was concerned, there was none to the husband from the issue of his wife's adulterous connection. The assumption sometimes made by modern writers on Hindu law, that, as the first duty of a man was to become the possessor of male offspring either the Veda or the Dharmasastras directed him somehow to procure a son, even though such a son was born to his adulterous wife, is wholly baseless. On the contrary, far from declaring these sons, the Kshetrāja, the Gudhaja, the Sahodhaja and the Kanina, to be necessary for a man's spiritual benefit, they emphatically condemned, for that very reason, the acceptance of such secondary sons... The condemnation from such ancient times shows that it could not have been at any time a widely prevalent usage, but must have been limited to a few tribes or families. The hopeless confusion and contradiction which prevail amongst the writers as to the respective rank of these sons and the shares to which they were entitled and on the question which of them were kinsmen and heirs and which of them were kinsmen only, make it very probable that they were not dealing with any living institution but were merely discussing for completeness the tradition of a bygone age, the exact scope and meaning of which were not within their own knowledge."

Golapchandra Sarkar's view of the texts on subsidiary son is thus summarised by him in his lectures (Hindu Law of Adoption, 2nd Ed., Tagore Law Lecture Series, p. 66):—

- "The conclusion to which any one carefully perusing the subject of sonship as dealt with in the Codes, must come, is that the usage of secondary sons was not introduced by them. It had been an existing institution from before the time when the Codes were composed, and was disapproved by all of them. The doctrine of spiritual benefit conferred by sons, was introduced by the Rishis with a view to raise the position of the real legitimate son and to suppress the institution of the secondary sons. The passages in the Codes, extolling the possession of a son for spiritual purposes, do most if not all of them, relate to the real legitimate son; the secondary sons being declared worthless for those purposes. But although disapproving of the institution of the secondary sons the sages did not declare invalid any one of them, though more or less condemned and censured".

The view of Cowell has perhaps been expressed with reference to the primitive state of Hindu society and to the tolerance of loose morals amongst the very lowest strata of society. He was apparently referring to the rules of heritage among secondary sons. But the secondary sons except Dattaka are now obsolete and strictly forbidden—(see Dattaka Mimansa, I, 64, quoting Saunaka—Sutherland's Ed., p. 16). Having regard to the rigorous injunction against adultery, it is difficult to conceive that the Rishis had accepted the possibility of Kunda or Golaka, born of incestuous connection, procuring salvation and conferring spiritual benefit on the receiver, particularly when according to Yajñavalkya even his presence at a shraddha was inauspicious (see Yajñavalkya, I, 222).

Apart from the question of practical expediency as to the disposal of a bastard child in a manner most convenient to both the child and the parent, it will be interesting to ascertain whether an adulterous son would conform to the description of a son which the Rishis recommended for adoption. It is suggested that the twelve classes of sons, which are enumerated in ancient Smritis, might well include an illegitimate son. According to Vishnu-Smṛiti

(XV, 1-30,—Asiatic Society's Sanskrit Edition, pp. 43-44) the twelve sons which the ancients recognized were :

"The real legitimate son, the son of the appointed wife, the son of the appointed daughter, the son of the twice-married woman, the son of an unmarried daughter, the secretly born son of an adulterous wife, the son received with a pregnant bride, and the son given, the son purchased, the son self-given, the deserted son and the son begotten on any woman."

He then adds,—

"Of these the first in order is the most worthy ; he alone is entitled to the heritage, and he shall maintain the rest."

He apparently omits the kritrima or the son made and includes Yatrakvachanotpadita as one description of son and thus completes the number twelve. Vasistha also enumerates the sons in the same order as Vishnu, substituting, however, the Shudra-putra or the son born of a Shudra wife for Yatrakvachanotpadita, but he divides them into two groups of six each and declares that the first six are heirs and kinsmen and the second six are only kinsmen but not heirs. So Yajnavalkya, after describing the different sons, declares,

"On failure of the legitimate son, the next in order is the giver of the pinda and the taker of the heritage."

(Yajnavalkya II, 132 or 134) (Pindadah, i.e. performer of Sraddha, and Ansaharah, successor to the effects). (See Mitakshara I, XI, 22).

The above classification of sons under twelve heads by the commentators is as I have said not recognized in modern Hindu law. In Nagindas Bhugwandas v. Bachoo Hurkissondas<sup>1</sup> their Lordships of the Privy Council were considering the relative position of an adopted son and a natural son in the same family, and they observed as follows (p. 67):—

"...it is sufficient to say that, whatever may have been the position and rights between themselves of such twelve sons in very remote times, all of these twelve sons, except the legitimately born and the adopted, are long since obsolete. A discussion as to their rights and interests, even if they could now be ascertained, would be beside the point and could throw no light on the construction of paras. 24 and 25 of s. 5 of the Dattaka Chandrika or upon the position and rights of an adopted son. Hindu law and customs have not stood still, and what we are now concerned with is the position at the present time of an adopted son in a Hindu family."

They held that an adopted son occupied the same position in the family as a natural born son except in a few instances which were actually defined in the Dattaka Chandrika and the Dattaka Mimansa and which related to marriage and to competition between an adopted son and a subsequently born legitimate son to the same father.

What kind of son Manu (Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXV,) had in contemplation when he recommended the taking of a son in adoption will be understood from the following passage (c. IX, vv. 137 and 138):

"Through a son he conquers the worlds, through a son's son he obtains immortality, but through his son's grandson he gains the world of the sun.

"Because a son delivers (trayate) his father from the hell called Put, he was therefore called put-tra (a deliverer from Put) by the Self-existent (Svayambhu) himself."

Manu evidently contemplated by the term गृह्य a son begotten by a man and his wife duly married. That is obvious from the division of wives into patnis and non-patnis and the exalted principles of morality which he preached in order to elevate the position of women and the discouragement of subsidiary sons. I do not think it necessary to enter into a discussion of the motive underlying the ancient usage prior to the Codes which permitted a father to claim illegitimate sons as his own. It is sufficient to show that the Rishis in the Codes condemned the affiliation of subsidiary sons.

Yajnavalkya describes an 'aurasa son' to be one begotten on a lawfully wedded patni—(see Yajnavalkya II, 128). According to Manu :

"an 'aurasa son' is a son procreated by a man himself on his wife wedded with religious rites"—(see Manu, IX, 166).

Apastamba appears to require that the wife should belong to the same caste with the husband and be espoused with religious rites (Sāstravihita) in order that a son begotten on her may be an aurasa son—(see Apastamba, II, 5, 13, 1-2). Putra according to Manu therefore was a perfect son. The necessity of a pure offspring to perform the spiritual duties of a son is inculcated in the following passage in Atri-Smṛiti (Jibananda Bhattacharya's Edition of Smṛitis, Vol. I, p. 45):—

"A damsel who is purchased by price is not ordained to be a patni; sons born of her cannot present पितृ (funeral cake) to their father."

Dattaka Chandrika does not even permit a son of irregular marriage even if औरस to perform the obsequial ceremonies. It says that a son of a wife belonging to an inferior tribe is incapable of performing the religious rites conducive to the spiritual benefit of his father. (See Dattaka Chandrika, I, 14). He might be an aurasa son, but for spiritual purposes he has no value. He may serve the secular purposes, such as, the perpetuation of the line and the family name. That is an important consideration in the present case, for according to the Rishis although an aurasa son may occupy a foremost rank in the classification of sons, he may not be fit to confer spiritual benefit on his father if he is not the offspring of a wife duly married. If therefore according to the texts even an aurasa son of impure origin is not quite fit to offer the पितृ, any other kind of son not begotten of lawful wedlock will be much less competent to promote spiritual welfare.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that having regard to the special place a dasi-putra has in Hindu law, particularly among Shudras, for he could claim inheritance in his father's estate, the circumstance of birth from illicit connection should not be regarded as a defect for conferring spiritual benefit on a Shudra father, as Shudras do not observe all the obsequial rituals commonly observed by the regenerate classes. It is also said that there is no express prohibition in the texts against the adoption of an illegitimate son among Shudras. That view does not seem to be correct. If the object of affiliation is principally to confer spiritual benefit on the father, it is difficult to discriminate between regenerate classes and Shudras in the matter of selection of a son in adoption. I think the rules as regards Anuloma and Pratiloma sons apply equally to Shudras, for they are entitled to practise the universal Dharmas or duties. We were referred to the text of Manu, (Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXV, c. X, 5, 41), to the following effect :—

“But all those born in consequence of a violation (of the law) are, as regards their duties, equal to sudras.” शूद्राणां तु सधर्माणः

It is urged that as the Shudras belong to the lowest varna and as persons born of adultery with regenerate classes are to be treated as equal to Shudras, it is not proper to say that among Shudras there should be a prohibition against the adoption of an adulterous son. Vijnanesvara in his commentary has explained the expression “as regards their duties are equal to Shudras” as merely implying that they are entitled to serve the twice born. Yajnavalkya says (c. IV, 90):

“By men of the same caste (Varna) in women of the same caste (Varna) are born सजातीय (sons of equal birth or caste). In blameless marriages sons (are begotten) continuing the line.”

That precept applies equally to Shudras. Manu (X. 5) says :—

“In all castes (Varna) those (children) only which are begotten in the direct order on wedded wives, equal (in caste and married as) virgins, are to be considered as belonging to the same caste (as their fathers).”

The word ‘varna’ is a generic term. There may be numerous ‘jatis’ in the same ‘varna’. A son produced by a lawfully wedded wife of a lower varna by a lawfully wedded husband of a higher varna is असवर्ण and not regarded as legitimate and is described as an Anuloma son. The sons produced of women of different varnas and not wedded to the begetter are Pratiloma sons. The word ‘sajati’ means one having the same jati as his father and mother if they are married. Yajnavalkya explains the ‘jatis’ of sons begotten of a Shudra woman by either a Brahmin, Kshatriya or Vaisya. For instance, a son begotten on a Shudra by a Brahmin father is termed Nisada or a Parasava, that on a Vaisya an Ambastha, and that on a Kshatriya a Murdhavasikta (see Yajnavalkya, I, 91, 92). I was unable to discover any text giving a particular ‘jati’ to a son born to a Shudra woman from an unknown father. No authority was cited in support of the view that an adulterous son could be taken in adoption by a Shudra, nor, as I have said, were we referred to any text recognizing the capacity of a mother to give her adulterous son in adoption.

It is necessary, in my opinion, that among Shudras a son in order to possess the capacity to be given and taken in adoption must be of the same class (सदृश) as that of the adopter (see Manu IX, 168, quoted in Mitakshara, c. I : c. XI, s. 9). The Mayukha quotes the following passage from Saunaka in support of the view that the son to be adopted by Shudras must be from amongst those of the Shudra caste (Mandlik’s translation, Parts I and II, p. 53) :

“Amongst Brahmanas, the adoption of a son should be made from amongst the sapindas, or in their absence, an asapinda [one not a sapinda] may be adopted, otherwise one should not be adopted; amongst Kshatriyas, one from their own class, or one whose gotra is the same as that of the [adopter’s] preceptor may be adopted; amongst Vaisyas, from amongst those of the Vaisya class; amongst Sudras, from amongst the Sudra class; amongst all classes, from amongst their respective classes only, not from others.”

A. C. J. The Mitakshara on Yajnavalkya (c. II, on Achar, I, V. 90) states that sons 1940 born of women of the same caste that are married to the man beget sons who — belong to the same caste and that persons like the kunda and golaka, the APYA maiden's son, the sahodhaja and the like are not of the same varna. All these SHETTYA differ from savarnas and are only entitled to perform the duties common to
v. all, such as ahimsa (non-injury to life). Steele in his Book on the Law and RAMMAKKA Custom of Hindu Caste (p. 180) says that children of the women living in APYA adultery have no caste. There are similar observations in Mayna Bai v.
— Wassoodas J. Uttaram.

It follows from what is stated above that persons born in lawful wedlock belong to the caste of their parents, whilst the apadhvasajas, that is born of adultery, belong to no caste, and are 'analogous to Shudras as to their duties.' As I have said, it does not follow from the text referred to that they belong to the 'Shudra varna'. The commentator merely describes what duties such sons should perform and he ascribes to them the lowest duties which befall to men. Yajnavalkya (c. II, 128-132) after enumerating the twelve kinds of sons (see Mandlik's Hindu Law, pp. 218-219) expressly says that all the twelve sons must be sajatiya, then only will they succeed to the estate of the father. The sages never contemplated that an adulterous son would be called upon to perform a religious ceremony. The Nirayasinidhu makes it clear (see p. 381 of Naure's translation, 2nd Ed.) that only an aurasa son can offer sraddha or pinda. It does not say that any son outside the description of sons, such as a son born of adulterous intercourse to a widow, could be taken to perform the spiritual duty to his adoptive parent. The fact that the Shudras do not observe the ceremonial of 'Datta homa' and that certain restrictions imposed by the texts on the regenerate classes as to the choice of the boy do not apply to them, would not in my opinion legalise the adoption of an illegitimate offspring by a Shudra.

It is important to bear in mind that a son entitled to perform sraddha in the adoptive family must be capable of performing sraddha to his own father. This a son born in adultery cannot do, for he has no known father. The rituals too do not permit a son to offer sraddha to his mother independently of the father. If, therefore, he is incapable of finding his natural father so as to perform his sraddha, in my opinion, it is difficult to see how he could minister to the spiritual requirements of the adoptive family. It appears from the following passage in Dattaka Mimansa (Stokes' Translation, Section VI, pl. 36, p. 609) that the adopted son must associate his genitive father when performing the funeral ceremony known as 'sapindi-karana':—

"'This is general':—that is, this ceremony of 'sapindi-karana', where the adopted son, and his son also are sons of two fathers must be equally performed [by their descendants] with both sets of forefathers." (See also Dattaka Chandrika—Stokes, III Ed., pl. 19-21, pp. 650-651).

If, therefore, he has no genitive father to whom he can offer pinda, he will not be able to perform the 'sapindi-karana' of the adoptive father. In that view of the matter it seems to me difficult to support the defendant.

Consequently I think the Courts below were right in holding that the defendant's adoption is not legal and valid. I would therefore dismiss this appeal with costs.

BEAUMONT C. J. I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment which my learned brother has just delivered, and I agree with the conclusions at which he has arrived. I do so with some reluctance, because I cannot help feeling that, if the mother of an illegitimate child desires to part with it in favour of some one anxious to take it, the arrangement is not one which the law should discourage. Moreover, a law which penalizes a man during the whole of his life on account of the accident of his birth seems to me essentially unjust. However, adoption under Hindu law cannot be regarded solely from the standpoint of social expediency, or abstract justice. The system is based, as the Privy Council has recently held, on the religious sentiments of the people and the belief that the soul of the deceased man will derive benefit from the performance of religious ceremonies by his surviving son, natural or adopted. The texts referred to by my learned brother seem to show that an illegitimate son, at any rate one who is not a dasi-putra, would not be regarded as qualified to perform the requisite religious ceremonies for his adoptive father, and, if that is so, the basis on which a valid adoption must rest is absent. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Under s. 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879, in cases where there is not a single order for attachment and sale in execution of a decree, but there is an order for attachment alone intended to be followed by an order for sale, it is open to the judgment-debtor to set up his status of an agriculturist both when an order for attachment is sought, and also subsequently on the application for an order for sale.

PROCEEDINGS in execution.

BALARAM
ANANDRAM

The decree under execution, which was a preliminary decree on a mortgage dated April 8, 1925, was passed on January 21, 1931, against Vishvanath (defendant No. 3) and his three brothers for Rs. 12,478-8-0. It was made final on November 14, 1931.

On February 3, 1932, the decree-holder Balaram Anandram applied (dar-khast No. 263 of 1932) to execute the decree for recovering Rs. 14,773-11-3 by sale of the property mortgaged. The property was sold for Rs. 6,713-12-0, and the darkhast struck off on July 31, 1933.

On October 28, 1933, a personal decree against the judgment-debtors was applied for, and it was passed for Rs. 9,000 and costs on May 29, 1934.

On January 17, 1935, the decree-holder applied to recover Rs. 9,741-14-0 by sale of property belonging to defendants. An order for attachment of the property under O. XXI, r. 54, of the Civil Procedure Code, was passed on February 9, 1935. In those proceedings, Vishvanath (defendant No. 3) and his son (defendant No. 5) raised a contention for the first time that they were agriculturists, and that their property was exempt from attachment by virtue of s. 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879. The Subordinate Judge raised the following issue :—

“Whether defendants Nos. 3 and 5 were agriculturists at date of personal decree (May 29, 1934) or at date of attachment (February 9, 1935).”

The above issue was found in the negative on January 13, 1939, so far as defendant No. 3 was concerned.

On March 2, 1940, when the matter came up for passing an order for sale, defendant No. 3 once again raised the contention that he was an agriculturist at that date, but the Subordinate Judge negatived it, for the following reasons :—

“It is contended that once when the property is attached and again when the order for sale under r. 64 of the Civil Procedure Code is passed, i.e. on two occasions, and not on either of the two occasions, the plea of status can be raised. In support of this contention reliance is placed on 36 Bom. L. R. 804 (Sopana v. Dattatraya). In that case it was held that the material date for the purpose of status was the date on which the order for sale, under r. 64 of O. XXI, of the Civil Procedure Code, was passed. The order for sale in that case was passed on April 21, 1932, the property having been attached shortly before, i.e. on March 9, 1932. The intervening period being very short, a question of the kind that has arisen in the present case, did not arise there. A point was raised in that case by the judgment-debtor, in answer to the notice issued to him, under r. 66 of O. XXI, that he was an agriculturist; and therefore it was necessary in that case to consider whether he was an agriculturist at the time of the order for sale.

“In the present case, however, it has happened that the point was raised at the time of the attachment; and it has been held that the judgment-debtor No. 3 was not an agriculturist. Again taking advantage of the fact that, about three years have elapsed and the order for sale is now being proposed to be made, he wants to contend that at the present date he has become an agriculturist. In my opinion, however, it is not open to him to contend that he has now become an agriculturist. The reason is that the execution proceeding is one whole proceeding, and it cannot be the intention of the legislature to leave it open to a judgment-debtor to raise the point of status at different stages of the same proceeding. See Shamrao v. Malkarjun (33 Bom. L. R. 797). In that case, even before the attachment, it was contended by the legal representative of the judgment-debtor that he was an agriculturist; and it was held that he was not. Again he having contended at the time of the order of attachment that he was an agriculturist, it was held that it was not open to him to do so, the point being res judicata. ... In my opinion, taking into consideration the word 'or', the intention of the Legislature, and the anomalous position that may arise if again and again the same point is raised, and also the decision in 33 Bom. L. R. 797, I feel that the judgment-debtor cannot raise the same question again."

Eventually on March 8, 1940, the Court ordered the property to be sold. Defendant No. 3 appealed to the High Court.

P. B. Gajendragadkar, for the appellant.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from the First Class Subordinate Judge of Poona raising a question in execution in a case falling within the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879.

The material facts are that in 1931 there was a mortgage decree against the judgment-debtor, the present appellant, for Rs. 12,000, and a decree was passed on the basis that he was not an agriculturist, and in 1932 his property was sold for appreciably less than the amount due. In 1934 the creditor obtained a personal decree against the judgment-debtor for the balance, and on January 19, 1935, the present darkhast was issued asking for attachment and sale of the immoveable property of the judgment-debtor, and on February 9, 1935, an order was made for the attachment of the immoveable property. The judgment-debtor on that occasion maintained that he was an agriculturist, having become so since the date of the decree; but it was held against him that both on the date of the decree, May 29, 1934, and on the date of the order of attachment, February 9, 1935, the judgment-debtor was not an agriculturist. Section 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act provides that immovable property belonging to an agriculturist shall not be attached or sold in execution of any decree, unless the property has been specifically mortgaged. In this case the property sought to be sold had not been specifically mortgaged, and the judgment-debtor now contends that an order for sale of the property cannot be made, because since the date of attachment he has become an agriculturist. A literal reading of s. 22 prohibits property belonging to an agriculturist from being either attached or sold, and suggests that the question of status arises both when the property is attached, and when it is sold. I think that the learned Subordinate Judge was disposed to adopt that construction of the Act, but he held, relying on a decision of this Court in Shamrao v. Malkarjun<sup>1</sup>, that the judgment-debtor, having raised the question as to his status at the time when the order for attachment was made, was bound by the finding against him

Beaumont C.J.

Now, in Shamrao v. Malkarjun it was held that where property, belonging to a non-agriculturist judgment-debtor passed on his death into the hands of his heir who was an agriculturist, the heir was entitled to the benefit of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879. In so deciding, the Court followed an earlier decision of this Court, Maruti v. Martand,<sup>1</sup> and that view of the law is binding upon us, though the point does not directly arise in the present case. I take it that the expression "belonging to" in s. 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act not being a term of art refers to the beneficial title, and the question which has to be determined is whether at the critical moment the party to whom the property belongs beneficially is an agriculturist. But then the Court in Shamrao's case went on to hold, according to the head-note, that an order passed in the course of an execution proceeding was binding on the parties at subsequent stages of the same proceeding. At first sight that looks as if the decision was in favour of the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge, but on reference to the roznama in that case it appears that the order there made was an order for both attachment and sale. So that no question arose in that case of different dates for attachment and sale. There was only one order, both for attachment and sale, and I agree with the view taken by the Court in that case, and also by this Court in Sopana v. Dattatraya,<sup>2</sup> that in the case of a sale the crucial date for the application of s. 22 is the date of the order for sale. It cannot have been the intention of the legislature that after an order for sale has been made, the judgment-debtor is still to be able to raise the question of change of status right up to the moment when the sale is confirmed. In my opinion, however, Shamrao's case does not support the view of the learned Subordinate Judge that the fact that the judgment-debtor was held to be an agriculturist in February, 1935, when the order for attachment was made, prevents him from contending that he is no longer an agriculturist when an order for sale is asked for.

Then it is argued that s. 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act does not really deal with two dates, but deals with two methods of execution, execution by attachment and sale, and execution by sale without attachment, both modes of execution being allowed under s. 51 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is said that the section should be read as meaning that the immovable property belonging to an agriculturist debtor shall not be attached, or, where there is no attachment, be sold. There is a certain amount to be said in favour of that construction from the point of view of expediency, as tending to reduce the already excessive number of opportunities allowed to an agriculturist debtor to delay his creditor. But the construction contended for by the respondent is not the most literal construction of the section, and a serious objection to adopting such construction is that s. 51 of the Civil Procedure Code was incorporated for the first time in 1908, long after the passing of s. 22 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, and at the time when s. 22 was passed, the only method of executing a decree against immovable property was by attachment and sale. The construction contended for would not have been open when s. 22 was passed. In my opinion, therefore, we must read s. 22 literally, and hold that where there is not a single order for attachment and sale, but there is an order for attachment alone intended to be followed by an order for sale, it is open to the judgment-debtor to set up his status of an agriculturist both when an order for attachment is sought, and also subsequently on the application for an order for sale.

The appeal, therefore, must be allowed. The learned Judge directed the sale of the appellant's property on March 8, 1940. That order will be set aside, if it is proved that the judgment-debtor is an agriculturist, and the matter must go back to the lower Court to consider whether at the time when the Court is asked to make an order for sale the judgment-debtor is an agriculturist.

The appellant to get the costs of the appeal. Costs in the lower Court will be costs in the cause.

On July 31, 1934, the applicant applied for a final decree on the mortgage. Basawannewa (the widow of the mortgagor Parutappa) contended that the application was barred by limitation.

The trial Court dismissed the application as barred by limitation, observing as follows :—

“There is no provision in the Indian Limitation Act which is held to be exhaustive in scope, which can be invoked to suspend the running of limitation where a plaintiff or applicant dies after the cause of action had accrued until a minor co-plaintiff attains to majority or a legal representative is brought on record. It may be perfectly legitimate to hold as was done in 51 Mad. 701 and 4 Pat. 61 that when the next friend of a minor plaintiff dies and no new next friend is brought on record the suit cannot be dismissed as having abated but should be treated as held in abeyance until the minor attains majority, but in those cases the effect of art. 181 had not to be considered. To say in a case like the present one in which time had definitely begun to run from August 20, 1925, that because plaintiff No. 1 died in 1927 having a minor plaintiff on record and no next friend was appointed, the running of limitation came to a standstill suddenly on January 20, 1927, in the middle, would be to invent a new species of exemption which is not recognized in any provisions of the Indian Limitation Act. The Act specifically lays down the cases in which the running of limitation may be suspended for the specified time and also cases in which the periods should be computed from a particular starting point or excluded from calculation in certain circumstances. They can be treated as the only recognized exceptions to the general rule that when once time begins to run on the accrual of cause of action no subsequent events can stop it ... The statute of limitation does not distinguish the rights of a party but only bars the remedy after a prescribed period which is based on sound principle that a party should not sleep over his rights and harass the other side after an inordinate long period. In holding, therefore, that this application is barred by limitation, I should not be understood to be dismissing the suit itself or going against the law laid down in 4 Pat. 61, 5 Pat. 223, 49 All. 592 and 51 Mad. 701. I have already distinguished A. I. R. 1933, Cal. 508 as dealing with the case of a sole plaintiff who happened to be a minor. In this case, time began to run from August 20, 1925, when Gurunath was alive. He died without applying for a final decree. He was in a position to give full discharge for both the plaintiffs and time began to run against both. The subsequent events therefore of his death in 1927 and failure to bring another next friend on record cannot stop time running as they are not covered by any of the exceptions created in the Indian Limitation Act.”

The above order was, on appeal, confirmed by the Assistant Judge, for the following reasons :—

“As this case is governed solely by O. XXXII, r. 10, Civil Procedure Code, the conclusion must rest on the reasoning that no authority restricting or altering the operation of art. 181 of the Indian Limitation Act exists either in the Indian Limitation Act or in the Civil Procedure Code. Hence, the application was barred by limitation after three years from August 20, 1925. Against this I was referred to A. I. R. 1933 Cal. 508, where a minor plaintiff ceased to be represented after the preliminary decree owing to the death of his next friend, but was allowed to make the application in suit for a final decree within three years of his majority. The lower Court distinguished this case from the present facts on the ground that there was a single plaintiff in that suit; so that s. 7 of the Indian Limitation Act was avoided. The application of s. 7 was to my mind misconceived; the Calcutta ruling indicates that art. 181 was considered as overcome by the stay of the suit under O. XXXII, r. 10. It is difficult to hold that this is so when neither the Civil Procedure Code nor the Limitation Act lays down that a stay under O. XXXII, r. 10, should be condoned. Section 15 of the Limitation Act refers to condonation only if there is a definite order from the Court. No such is involved by O. XXXII, r. 10, Civil Procedure Code."

The applicant appealed to the High Court.

K. G. Datar, for the appellant.

G. R. Madbhavi, for the respondent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is a second appeal from a decision of the Assistant Judge of Dharwar, which raises a question of limitation.

The material facts are that there was a mortgage passed in 1920, which became vested in plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2, plaintiff No. 2 being a minor. They filed a suit to enforce the mortgage, plaintiff No. 1 being the next friend of plaintiff No. 2. On February 20, 1925, a preliminary decree was passed, and an application for a final decree could have been made at any time after August 20, 1925. In January, 1927, plaintiff No. 1 died, and no next friend of plaintiff No. 2 was appointed. The result was that under O. XXXII, r. 10, of the Civil Procedure Code, all further proceedings in the suit were stayed for the time being. Plaintiff No. 2 attained his majority on April 12, 1933, and he died on September 13 in the same year. The applicant was adopted by the widow of plaintiff No. 1 in June, 1933, and in July, 1934, applied, as legal representative and heir both of plaintiff No. 1 and of plaintiff No. 2, for a final decree. Both the lower Courts have held that the application is barred under art. 181 of the Indian Limitation Act, which provides that applications for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere shall be barred after three years from the time when the right to apply accrues. The lower Courts have held that the right to apply for a final decree accrued on August 20, 1925, and as this application was not made until July, 1934, it is barred.

If the view of the lower Courts is right, the result is unfortunate. It seems unjust that time to make an application in a suit should continue to run during a period when the suit has been stayed by statute, and no application is possible. A next friend might die the day after the making of the preliminary decree, and in such case, if no new next friend be appointed for three years, the right to apply for a final decree is barred although it only existed effectively for one day. No doubt, if that is the effect of the Indian Limitation Act, we can only so hold.

Section 6 of the Indian Limitation Act, which excludes periods of minority, only applies to a person entitled to institute a suit or make an application for the execution of a decree, and the application for a final decree in a mortgage suit is not an application for the execution of a decree. That section therefore does not apply. Section 15 of the Act recognizes the principle that in computing the period of limitation prescribed for an application for the execution of a decree, any period during which the execution of the decree has been stayed must be excluded; and it would certainly seem right to apply a similar principle to applications in a suit which has been stayed; in terms, however, the section does not apply. The only authority on the point, to which we have been referred, and which was referred to in the lower Courts, is Pulin Chandra Sen v. Amin Miah Muzaffar Ahmad.<sup>1</sup> In that case there was a single plaintiff who was a minor and his next friend died. It was held that by virtue of O. XXXII, r. 10, the suit was in abeyance, and that when the minor plaintiff attained the age of majority, which was more than three years from the date of the preliminary decree, a right to apply for a final decree first accrued to him. We may, I think, properly follow that case which has stood for some years and not been dissented from, though I feel some doubt whether it is correct to hold that a fresh cause of action arose to the minor on attaining majority. I would rather base the appellant's case on the ground that the right to apply for a final decree was suspended during the period in which the suit was stayed. Such a principle was applied by the Calcutta High Court in Lakhan Chunder Sen v. Madhusudan Sen,<sup>2</sup> affirmed by the Privy Council in Nrityamoni Dassi v. Lakhan Chandra Sen.<sup>3</sup> In that case parties sued for recovery of certain property, and it was held that the right to bring the action was suspended during a period in which a decree, subsequently reversed in appeal, existed in the applicants' favour, and necessarily prevented them from filing a suit.

If the time during which this suit was stayed under O. XXXII, r. 10, be excluded, the application is in time. We, therefore, allow the appeal with costs throughout. The application will have to go back to the lower Court to be dealt with according to law.

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), See 86 †—Appeal to Magistrate—House-tax and water-tax—Decision by Magistrate—Magistrate acts as persona designata—Revision—High Court—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 115.

A Magistrate hearing an appeal under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, acts as a persona designata; and therefore an order passed by him under the section is not open to revision by the High Court under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

Surat Municipality v. Hamiduddin<sup>3</sup> and Lokmanya Mills Ltd. v. Municipal Borough, Barsi<sup>4</sup> considered.

THE opponent Gangaram owned a house within the limits of the Vita Municipality (applicant). The house was assessed by the applicant at Rs. 12 for house-tax and water-tax.

An appeal was preferred by the opponent against the assessment to the Second Class Magistrate at Khanapur under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. On appeal, the assessment was reduced to Rs. 10.

The applicant Municipality applied to the High Court in revision under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, against the reduction in the assessment.

At the hearing a preliminary objection was raised by the opponent that the High Court had no jurisdiction to interfere in revision with the order passed by a Magistrate as persona designata under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901.

P. B. Gajendragadkar, for the applicant.

P. V. Kane, for the opponent.

N. J. WADIA J. This is an application in revision against an order made by the Second Class Magistrate, Khanapur, under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901). The petitioner, the Vita Municipality, issued a notice of demand against the opponent in respect of a Municipal claim for house-tax and water-tax under s. 82 of the Bombay District Municipal Act. The opponent appealed to the Second Class Magistrate,

VITA MUNICIPALITY
v.
GANGARAM
N.J. Wadia J.

A preliminary objection is raised by Mr. Kane for the opponent that no revision application lies. His contention is that under s. 86 of the Act the Magistrate to whom the appeal was made was a persona designata, and against his decision no appeal or revision application would lie to this Court. The section provides that appeals against any notice of demand issued under sub-s. (3) of s. 82 may be made to any Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates by whom under the directions of the Provincial Government, or of the District Magistrate, such class of cases is to be tried. The section lays down certain conditions which must be satisfied before such an appeal can be heard and determined, but we are not concerned here with those conditions. It has been held in In re Dalsukh Ram<sup>1</sup> that under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, a Magistrate hearing an appeal of the kind mentioned in the section is merely an appellate authority having jurisdiction given by the Act to deal with the question of a civil liability and he is therefore not an inferior criminal Court, to which alone the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court under s. 435 of the Criminal Procedure Code applies. The case did not deal with the question whether a revision application against a Magistrate's order would lie to the High Court on the civil side.

The power given to a Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates under s. 86 is analogous to the power which is given to the District Judge under s. 22 of the Act to determine disputes about the validity of elections. That section provides that if the validity of an election is brought in question by any person, such person may, subject to certain conditions, apply to the District Judge of the District within which the election has been or should have been held, and an inquiry into the matter shall be held by a Judge, not below the grade of an Assistant Judge, appointed by the Provincial Government either specially for the case or for such cases generally. The section provides that the decision or order of the Judge shall be conclusive. It is now well-settled that the Judge referred to in s. 22 is a persona designata against whose decision no appeal or revision application lies to this Court. Provisions exactly similar to those of s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act are to be found in s. 110 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, Bom. XVIII of 1925, and ss. 217 and 219 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act, Bom. III of 1888. In the case of the latter Act, s. 219 provides that the decision of the Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court, to whom under s. 217 appeals against any rateable value or tax fixed or charged under the Act lie, shall be final. In Ahmed Sulleman v. Municipal Commissioner of Bombay,<sup>2</sup> it was held by a division bench of this Court that the decision of the Chief Judge of the Bombay Small Cause Court under s. 219 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act is as a persona designata, and no revision application lies to the High Court against the decision. The provisions of s. 110 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, are identical with the provisions of s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, but there is one important difference. Whereas the District Municipal Act contains no provision for any revision of the order made by the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates, the Municipal Boroughs Act contains an express provision in s. 111 that every entry in the assessment list made under the provisions of the Act against which no objection is made as therein provided, and the amount of every sum claimed from any person under the Act on account of any tax, if no appeal therefrom is made as thereinbefore provided, and the decision of the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates upon any appeal, shall, at the instance of either party, be subject to revision by the Court to which appeals against his or their decisions ordinarily lie. The question whether the High Court can entertain a revision application under s. 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure against an order made by the Sessions Judge in revision under s. 111 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act came before this Court in Surat Municipality v. Hamiduddin,<sup>1</sup> and it was held by Mr. Justice Norman sitting singly that the High Court could entertain such an application. The question was again considered by a bench of this Court in Lokmanya Mills Ltd. v. Municipal Borough, Barsi,<sup>2</sup> in which it was held, agreeing with the decision of Mr. Justice Norman in Surat Municipality v. Hamiduddin, that an application lay to this Court against an order made by a Sessions Judge under s. 111 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act. It is argued by Mr. Gajendra-gadkar for the applicant Municipality that the provisions of s. 110 of the Municipal Boroughs Act are exactly similar to the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, and that therefore the decision in Lokmanya Mills Ltd. v. Municipal Borough, Barsi, must by analogy be held applicable. But although the provisions of the two sections are similar, the Legislature has deliberately made a distinction as to the effect which appeals under them would have. It would have been perfectly easy for the Legislature which had inserted s. 111 in the Municipal Boroughs Act of 1925 to insert a corresponding provision in the District Municipal Act. But it did not do so, and the only inference that can be drawn is that it thought that a provision for some revising authority was necessary in the case of the more important Municipalities to which the Act of 1925 was intended to apply, but that such a provision was not necessary in the case of the less important Municipalities governed by the District Municipal Act of 1901. The view taken by this Court in Lokmanya Mills Ltd. v. Municipal Borough, Barsi, was a necessary consequence of the distinction so made. Once the Legislature provided a remedy by way of an application in revision against an order of the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates under s. 110 of the Boroughs Act to the Court to which appeals against the decision of the Magistrate would ordinarily lie, it impliedly made the decision of the Magistrate under s. 110 not a decision of a persona designata, but the decision of a Court, subject to revision by the Court to which appeals against the Magistrate's decision would ordinarily lie. There is therefore no reason for applying the decision in Lokmanya Mills Ltd. v. Municipal Borough, Barsi, by analogy to a decision of a Magistrate under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act. The Legislature has deliberately made a distinction between the appeals provided by the two sections, and the appeal to the Magistrate under s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act must therefore be governed by the provisions of that section alone. The mere fact that s. 86 of the Bombay District Municipal Act contains no express provision that the decision of the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates under that section is to be final does not mean that an appeal or application in revision lies against that decision. The view taken of the provisions of that section in In re Dalsukhram was that the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates hearing appeals of the kind mentioned in s. 86 was merely an appellate authority having jurisdiction given by the Act to deal with the question of a civil liability, in other words that the Magistrate or Bench of Magistrates was a persona designata, and on that view no application in revision would lie to this Court against the decision of the Magistrate. The rule must therefore be discharged with costs.

EDULJI SORABJI DARUVALA.*

Bombay High Court Rules (Appellate Side), 1936, Appx. E—Advocate's fees—Rules for computation—Attorney instructing on appellate side advocate (O. S.)—Scale of fees applies to attorney.

Where an attorney instructs an advocate (O. S.) to appear on the appellate side of the High Court, the costs of the attorney should be taxed by analogy on the scale allowed by appendix E to the Rules on the Appellate Side, Bombay High Court, 1936.

TAXATION of fees.

The applicant Dossabhoy filed a suit to recover damages for malicious prosecution. It was decreed in the trial Court, but dismissed by the Assistant Judge on appeal. The applicant appealed to the High Court on the appellate side; but the appeal was dismissed with costs. In the High Court, the opponent Edulji had engaged a firm of solicitors, Smetham, Byrne & Lambert, who instructed a counsel practising on the Original Side of the High Court to argue the case.

When the costs in the High Court came to be taxed, the Taxing Officer taxed the advocate's fees payable to the opponent at Rs. 30, for the following reasons:—

"It has been the practice to allow solicitors to appear for parties on this side. They are not prevented from appearing on this side by the rules, and so long as the ordinary scale of advocate's fee is not exceeded the party engaging them is entitled to one advocate's fee as in cases where an advocate A.S. is engaged. This has been the rule for a very long time and until now no body has raised any objection to it. As this point was tried to be raised for the first time in the history of a long series of years, it should have been raised in Court at the hearing, and not before me. Advocates' fees are really pleader's fees, and the definition of a pleader in the Legal Practitioners Act and in the Civil Procedure Code states that it 'includes an advocate, a vakil and an attorney of a High Court.'

The applicant applied to the Court.

B. Moropanth, for the applicant.

N. H. C. Coyajee instructed by Smetham, Byrne & Lambert, for the opponent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an application made under Rule 132 of the Appellate Side Rules complaining against the order of the Taxing Officer.

The point raised is a novel one. In a second appeal the respondent appeared by an attorney and an advocate on the Original Side; that is to say, the advocate on the Original Side was instructed by an attorney who was not an advocate on the Appellate Side. The appeal was dismissed with costs, and the contention of Mr. Moropanth for the applicant is that in such a case no costs are payable either to the attorney or to the advocate on the Original Side. It is very common for parties to appear in Appellate Side matters by an attorney instructing an advocate on the Original Side, and it is somewhat startling to hear it suggested that in such an event no costs are payable by the unsuccessful party either to the attorney or to the advocate. In my opinion, there is no substance in the point.

Under the Rules on the Appellate Side, Part II, relating to Legal Practitioners, it is provided in Rule 10 that no attorney, who is not also an advocate, shall address the Court; but such attorney may instruct an advocate. And then in r. 5 it is provided that advocates on the Original Side may appear and plead for suitors on any side of this Court, but not unless instructed by an attorney, or on the Appellate Side by an advocate (which is only an alternative). So that it is quite clear that an attorney may instruct a counsel on the Original Side to appear on the Appellate Side of the High Court, and as the rules allow him so to do, it seems apparent that the attorney must be entitled to be paid, and must in the ordinary course have his costs taxed before he can recover them. Now r. 128 of the Appellate Side Rules directs that where costs are awarded to a party in any proceeding the amount of the Advocate's fees to be taxed in the bill of costs recoverable by such party, if represented by an advocate, from his adversary, shall be computed in accordance with the rules in Appendix E, and then there is a provision that nothing contained in this rule shall apply to fees payable to advocates on the Original Side. It is argued, therefore, that that rule does not apply either to an attorney or to an advocate on the Original Side, and therefore no scale for taxing their fees has been laid down. If that be so, the taxing officer has a discretion as to the scale to be applied, and he exercises that discretion wisely in proceeding by analogy to Appendix E. The taxing officer says that the practice in the office is to tax the costs of the attorney on the scale allowed by Appendix E by analogy to that Appendix. That is to say, he allows the attorney the percentage costs specified

SAI GENU LAXMAN PAWAR.*

Hindu law—Widow—Unchastity—Widow of gotraja sapinda inheriting property of husband's nephew—Unchastity of widow whether a bar to such inheritance—Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act (XVIII of 1937).

Under Hindu law an unchaste widow is not incompetent to inherit property of her husband's kinsmen.

SUIT for possession of property.

One Sitaram and his brother Genu were members of a joint Hindu family. Genu died first leaving a widow Sai (defendant No. 1). Sitaram then died, and on his death his son Maruti came into possession of the joint family property as absolute owner. Maruti died in August, 1929, without leaving a widow or any issue. The property was taken possession of by defendant No. 1 as she was the widow of a gotraja sapinda of Maruti.

On August 10, 1936, one Akoba (plaintiff), who was a distant agnate of Maruti, filed the present suit against defendant No. 1 to recover Maruti's property from her contending that she was unchaste when Maruti died and was therefore incapable of inheriting the property. The defendant conceded that she was leading an unchaste life at the time of Maruti's death but contended that she was not thereby deprived of the right to succeed to the property of Maruti. The trial Judge held that defendant No. 1 was not debarred from succeeding to the property and dismissed the suit. He observed in his judgment as follows :—

"It is urged that the bar as to inheritance on the ground of unchastity is only against the widow of the person to whom the inheritance is claimed and not to other female heirs. Now according to the Mitakshara, which governs the present case, the only female liable to exclusion by reason of unchastity is the widow and no other female heir; see Advya v. Rudra (4 Bom. 104) which is followed in Tara v. Krishna (31 Bom. 495). The texts bearing on the point have been fully discussed in Advya's case, and it has been held that there is nothing in the texts to show that according to the law prevailing in Western India a daughter, who was the person sought to be excluded in that case, is, by her incontinence, debarred from succession to the estate of her father. Following this decision it has been held by the Madras High Court in Kojiyadu v. Laxmi (5 Mad. 149) that the texts debarring Hindu females from inheriting by reason of unchastity are confined in their application to the widow as such and do not debar the mother. This decision has been followed in Vedammal v. Vedanayaga Mudaliar (31 Mad. 100) where it is held that under the Mitakshara, female heirs other than the widow are not precluded from inheriting by reason of unchastity. As pointed out at page 106 of the report, under the Mitakshara unchastity is not a bar and has not been referred to in the general discussion of the several grounds of exclusion. On the other hand it has been made a preliminary condition to succession in the case of a widow; see pages 111, 112 of I. L. R. 4 Bom. But it is contended for the plaintiff that the term widow is a general term and covers widows of agnates also and is not confined to the widow of the person whose estate is to be inherited. This contention is, however, not sound since fidelity and faithfulness to the deceased is not expected of any female heir other than his widow. This is made amply clear in Moniram v. Keri Kolitani (5 Cal. 776, P.C.) where their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the texts bearing on this point have reference to the deceased owner of the estate and that the words 'property' etc., have reference "to the property of the lord, or husband mentioned in the preceding parts of the texts, whose estate is to be inherited, and not to the husband or lord whose estate is not to be inherited, such as the husband or Lord of the daughter or the daughter or the mother, as the case may be, of the deceased owner, who in default of a widow may be next in succession to inherit the estate." These observations apply with equal force to the case of an uncle's widow. There is no obligation of chastity, therefore, on defendant No. 1 and it is not a preliminary condition to her inheriting to the estate of the deceased Maruti. It follows, therefore, that she is entitled to the suit property as a limited owner and that the plaintiff's suit must fail."

On appeal the appellate Judge confirmed the decree of the trial Court observing as follows :—

"This principle of exclusion on the ground of unchastity is strictly confined to a widow inheriting to a husband's estate. It is clear from the decision in Vedammal v. Vedanayaga (31 Mad. 100) that under the Mitakshara law, female heirs other than the widow are not precluded from inheriting by reason of unchastity. A similar view was taken by the Bombay High Court in Advya v. Rudrava (4 Bom. 104) where a daughter was held to be not debarred from succeeding to the estate of her father simply because she was leading an unchaste life. It is, therefore, clear that the learned trial Judge was perfectly correct in the decision that he arrived at."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

S. R. Parulekar, for respondent No. 1.

DIVATIA J. This case raises an interesting point of Hindu law which does not seem to be covered by authority. The appellant, who was the original plaintiff, sued to recover certain property as a distant agnate of one Maruti who died in 1929 without leaving a widow or any issue. His father Sitaram had a brother named Genu who died several years back leaving a widow Sai who is defendant No. 1 in this case. The property was taken possession of by Sai as she was the widow of the paternal uncle, i.e. a gotraja sapinda, of Maruti, and as such was entitled in our Presidency to inherit it as an heir in preference to a distant agnate under the ruling in Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Manikvarbai.<sup>1</sup> The plaintiff contended that Sai was unchaste at the time when

A. C. J. Maruti died, and was, therefore, incapable of inheriting the suit property.
 1940 The only question at issue was whether Sai was debarred from inheriting the — property of Maruti because of her unchastity. It was conceded by her that AKOBA she was leading an unchaste life at the time of Maruti's death when the LAXMAN succession opened.

v. Both the lower Courts held that under the Hindu law the bar of unchastity SAI GENU applied only to a widow inheriting her husband's property, that in the present LAXMAN case the widow Sai inherited not her husband's property but the property of — her husband's nephew, and the bar therefore did not apply. The suit was, Divatia J. therefore, dismissed on that ground.

It is contended here that for the purpose of the bar all widows inheriting property stand on the same footing, and that therefore the bar applied also to the case of a widow who inherits property as the widow of a gotraja sapinda. Now, it is important to note that under the Hindu law as such a widow of a gotraja sapinda does not inherit any property in her own right. It is only by virtue of "positive acceptance and usage," as held in Lulloobhoy Bappoobhoy v. Cassibai,<sup>1</sup> that in our Presidency she has acquired the right to stand in the same place as her husband, if living, would have occupied. Subsequent cases have made it clear that the widow of a gotraja sapinda takes the property in her own right as an heir and not only as representing her husband. The latest decision on this point is in Kallava v. Vithabai.<sup>2</sup>

The suit property in the present case was of the absolute ownership of Maruti after Genu's death, presumably because Genu and Sitaram were joint. On Maruti's death, therefore, Sai would inherit it not as the property of her husband Genu but as the property of her husband's nephew Maruti, and the question is whether the bar which applies to the case of a widow inheriting her husband's property could also be extended to a case where the widow inherits the property not belonging to her husband but belonging to her husband's nephew.

It has been contended by Mr. Sukhtankar on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that the bar should be held as also applicable to the case of a widow inheriting property as the widow of a gotraja sapinda, because she inherits it from her husband's family and that too only in our Presidency by reason of usage. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the genesis of this bar. So far as inheritance is concerned, the only text in the Mitakshara relating to this bar is mentioned in Chapter II, section II, placitum 2, which runs as follows :—

Thus Katyayana says, "Let the widow succeed to her husband's wealth, provided she be chaste; and, in default of her, let the daughter inherit, if unmarried."

This bar, therefore, according to the text, applies only to a widow succeeding to her husband's wealth, and the case-law has also limited it to such estate. It has been held for instance that neither a mother nor a daughter is debarred from inheriting property on the ground of unchastity because both of them inherit in their own right: see Vedammal v. Vedamayaga Mydaliar<sup>3</sup> and Advayapa v. Rudrawa.<sup>4</sup> No authority has been cited before me to show that the bar has been applied to any female except a widow inheriting her husband's property. But the matter does not rest here. In the recent Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act (XVIII of 1937), the bar of unchastity seems to have been removed even with regard to the widow inheriting her husband's property, because it says that its provisions shall apply notwithstanding any rule of Hindu law or custom to the contrary, and as observed in Mayne's Hindu Law, 10th edn., at p. 722, "as the Act confers upon the widow a right of succession notwithstanding any rule of Hindu law, an unchaste widow will not be disqualified from inheritance." The result is that the bar of unchastity has now been removed even in the case of a widow inheriting her husband's property, and it would indeed be incongruous to hold that it applies to the case of a widow inheriting the property of any person other than her husband when she can now inherit her husband's property in spite of her unchastity. The position, therefore, is that there is no authority for the proposition that any widow inheriting any kind of property must be chaste, that the bar was confined to only one particular case, namely, the widow inheriting her husband's property, and even that bar is now removed by legislation. If the Hindu community desires that the bar of unchastity should be applicable to all widows inheriting property, it might invoke the aid of Legislature, but on the law as it stands at present, it is clear that an unchaste widow of a gotraja sapinda is not incompetent to inherit property of her husband's kinsmen.

The decision of the lower appellate Court is, therefore, correct and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act (XVII of 1879), Secs. 2, 10A—Suit for redemption—Plaintiff not agriculturist at date of suit—Predecessor of plaintiff an agriculturist at date of transaction—Suit under s. 10A whether competent—Status of agriculturist, how determined.

A plaintiff who invokes the Court's jurisdiction under s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879, must be an agriculturist within the meaning of s. 2 of the Act at the date when the suit is instituted.

In a suit for redemption under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879, it is necessary for the plaintiff when claiming the benefit of s. 10A of the Act to prove that he was an agriculturist at the date of the suit and not merely that the person through whom he claims was an agriculturist at the date of the transaction.

In order to claim the status of an agriculturist the plaintiff must prove that he ordinarily engages personally in agricultural labour, that is, he is regularly and habitually cultivating his fields. Mere initiation into the ways of husbandry is not enough.

SUIT for redemption.

One Kashinath passed a sale-deed in respect of the suit property in favour of Vishvanath and his two brothers on February 11, 1899. Kashinath died sometime before 1909 leaving a widow Laxmibai who took Gangadhar (plaintiff) in adoption in 1924.

On August 19, 1930, the plaintiff filed the present suit against Dattatraya (defendant No. 1) the son of Vishvanath and others (defendants Nos. 2-21) to redeem the suit property under s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879, alleging that the real nature of the transaction dated February 11, 1899, was a mortgage and not a sale out and out. In the plaint the plaintiff's status was described to be that of an agriculturist and it was stated that his adoptive father Kashinath was an agriculturist in 1899. The defendants denied the alleged nature of the transaction, the status of the plaintiff and that of his adoptive father, Kashinath. The trial Court upheld the defendants' contentions and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

On appeal, the Assistant Judge held that Kashinath was an agriculturist in 1899, that the alleged mortgage could be inferred from circumstances; but that as the plaintiff was not an agriculturist at the date of the suit, the suit was incompetent. He therefore confirmed the decree of the trial Court.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

S. G. Patwardhan, for respondent No. 4.

P. V. Kane, for respondents Nos. 1-3, 6-8, 10, 13, 14 and 18.

WASSOODEW J. This is a second appeal from a decision of the Assistant Judge of Sholapur. The only question that arises upon this appeal is whether a plaintiff, who is held not to be an agriculturist at the date of the suit purporting to be one for redemption under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, can invoke the provisions of s. 10A of that Act to show that the original transaction to which his predecessor an agriculturist was a party was in reality intended, contrary to the terms of the document, to be treated as a mortgage.

The suit was instituted in August, 1930, by the plaintiff as the adopted son of one Kashinath, the adoption having been made by Kashinath's widow in 1924. The plaintiff maintained that his father Kashinath, who died in 1909, had executed a formal conveyance of the property in dispute on February 11, 1899, in favour of the defendants, and that, although it was an out and out sale of the entire interest of the transferor, by a contemporaneous agreement it was intended to be treated as a mortgage. As regards the plaintiff's status it was described in the plaint to be that of an agriculturist. It was also stated that Kashinath was an agriculturist in 1899. The alleged nature of the transaction, the status of the plaintiff and that of his adoptive father were denied by the defendants, and that denial was upheld by the trial Court. In appeal the learned Assistant Judge took the view that Kashinath was an agriculturist in 1899, that the alleged contemporaneous agreement could be inferred from circumstances, but that as the plaintiff was not an agriculturist at the date of the suit, the suit was incompetent. He, however, remarked in paragraph 7 of his judgment that "it appears that, pending the suit, the plaintiff has started working personally in the fields and has taken lands of others on leases;" but in his opinion that circumstance did not enable the plaintiff to claim the benefit of s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act. Accordingly the trial Court's decree was confirmed; but the defendants, except the Municipality, who had acquired a portion of the land, were deprived of their costs. Against that decree the plaintiff has filed this second appeal and the defendants, the transferees under the deed of 1899, have filed cross-objections for costs.

Two contentions have been formulated in support of the appeal by Mr. Desai. He argues, first, that it is not necessary, when calling in aid the provisions of s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, for the plaintiff to show in a suit for redemption that he is an agriculturist; for it is sufficient that a person through whom the plaintiff claims was an agriculturist at the date of the transaction, and, secondly, that even if the plaintiff is not an agriculturist at the date of the suit, and if pending the suit and in the course of the hearing the plaintiff acquires the status of an agriculturist by working personally in the fields, he could be deemed to be a party agriculturist to the suit for the purpose of s. 10A, for, according to Mr. Desai, that section does not in terms require that the suit must be instituted by an agriculturist.

In my opinion the first contention is without any substance. Section 10A provides as follows:—

"Whenever it is alleged at any stage of any suit or proceeding to which an agriculturist is a party that any transaction in issue entered into by such agriculturist or the person, if any, through whom he claims was a transaction of such a nature that the rights and liabilities of the parties thereunder are triable wholly or in part under this Chapter, the Court shall, notwithstanding anything contained in section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, (or in section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908) or in any other law for the time being in force, have power to inquire into and determine the real nature of such transaction...."

Apart from authority, the plain provisions of that section indicate that, unless an agriculturist is a party to the suit, the Court has no jurisdiction to disregard the provisions of s. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act. The basis of the plaintiff's claim to disregard the provisions of s. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act in order to grant him relief was that as an agriculturist party to the suit, he was entitled to rely on s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act. That claim could only be sustained if he proved that he was an agriculturist at the date of the suit and not merely that his predecessor was an agriculturist at the date of the transaction. The finding of fact is that the plaintiff was not an agriculturist and there was no other agriculturist party

Wassoodew J.

A.C.J. 1940 to the suit. Prima facie therefore the Court has no jurisdiction to apply s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

GANGADHAR KASHINATH v. DATTA TRAYA VISHVANATH Wasseodew J. In the consideration of Mr. Desai's alternative argument it will be interesting to note how the legislature has expressed itself in the different parts of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act as to when the privilege can be asserted or established for the purpose of the several reliefs referred to. The language of s. 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act does not follow the language used in s. 3 or s. 15B or s. 20 of that Act. In s. 3(a) the legislature has stated that the provisions of Chapter II shall apply to suits for an account "instituted by an agriculturist." The legislature there expressly lays down that the plaintiff must be an agriculturist at the date of the suit. Section 20 says that "the Court may at any time direct that the amount of any decree, whether before or after this Act comes into force against an agriculturist... shall be paid by instalments with or without interest." Here it is obviously intended that the status must be that of an agriculturist at any time when the question of instalments arises. The provisions of s. 15B leave it to implication as to when the status has to be established. Although that section does not indicate clearly, as s. 20 does, the time when the claimant to the privilege should be an agriculturist, it has been construed as implying the time when the accounts are claimed, that is at the time of passing the decree (see Devu Jetiram v. Revappa Satappa,<sup>1</sup> and Bal v. Maneklal<sup>2</sup>). The language used by the legislature is not uniform in these two sections, and the proper time for claiming the privilege has to be fixed by reference to the language used and the provisions as to relief. In my opinion, the proper time when the jurisdiction to inquire into the real nature of the transaction could be assumed by the Court for the purpose of s. 10A is when the Court is requested to exercise that jurisdiction. That request is contained in the plaint when disclosing the essential cause of action, upon the averment that the plaintiff is an agriculturist and a party to the suit. Therefore if the plaintiff invokes the Court's jurisdiction under s. 10A, he must be an agriculturist within the meaning of s. 2 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act at the date when it is instituted. The question is really not of first impression and is covered by the authority of this Court (see Gadadhar v. Gangaram<sup>3</sup> and Sultan Rahim v. Ranchhodji,<sup>4</sup>). Although the question in the form in which it is presented was not raised in those cases, this Court has held that the provisions of s. 10A require that there should be an agriculturist plaintiff to a suit for redemption at the time of its institution.

But even upon the assumption of the correctness of the construction suggested by Mr. Desai that the plaintiff's status has to be considered only at the stage of hearing, for it is then that the question of abrogating the general rule of evidence arises, the plaintiff in this case cannot succeed. There is no warrant for the view that even at that stage the plaintiff was an agriculturist. In fact no such plea was raised in the plaint. All that the plaint stated was that the plaintiff was an agriculturist when the suit was instituted. It was not said that he had changed his original status at any time and acquired a new one. The suit was filed in August, 1930, and the plaintiff was not examined till October, 1934. At that time in one statement in his deposition it was elicited that in that year he had taken kabulayats and had started working personally in the fields. Assuming that he had done so, that was insufficient to clothe him with the privileged status. The privilege of an agriculturist is not hereditary but personal (see Martand v. Amritrao<sup>1</sup> and Dharāmsey v. Balkrishna<sup>2</sup>). Nor can that privilege be acquired by birth (see Gadadhar v. Gangaram). If so, it must be assumed that merely upon adoption the plaintiff could not acquire the status which his adoptive father possessed in 1899. He had other landed estate whose income fell in the category of non-agricultural income. If suddenly three years after the suit he began to hold a plough, he could not come within the definition of the first paragraph of s. 2 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, for he must in order to claim that status prove that he ordinarily engaged personally in agricultural labour, that is, he was regularly and habitually cultivating his fields. Mere initiation into the ways of husbandry is not enough. Consequently it cannot be said that even pending the suit the plaintiff had acquired the status of an agriculturist. Therefore the plaintiff's appeal must be dismissed with costs (two sets—one set to defendant No. 4).

As regards the cross-objections it seems to me having regard to the view upon the evidence of the lower appellate Court the discretion as to costs was properly exercised. The cross-objections are therefore disallowed with costs.

An assignment of an administration bond under s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, does not create thereunder a new cause of action so as to give a fresh starting point for the purposes of limitation to the assignee who sues for a breach of a condition in the bond.

A suit by the assignee of an administration bond to enforce the bond is a suit "on a bond subject to a condition" within the meaning of art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and the period of limitation is three years from the date of the last breach and not the date when some person able to give a valid discharge for the estate claims it from the administrator or his representatives and fails to obtain it.

The Indian Limitation Act ought to receive such a construction as the language in its plain meaning imports. A law of limitation and prescription may appear to operate harshly or unjustly in particular cases, but it must, if unambiguous, be applied with stringency. The law must be enforced even at the risk of hardship to a particular party. The Court cannot, on equitable grounds, enlarge the time allowed by the law, postpone its operation, or introduce exceptions not recognised by it.

An administrator of an intestate is merely the officer of the Court in whom the deceased himself has reposed no trust. On the death of the former the estate of the intestate does not pass to his heirs or representatives and no authority whatever can be transmitted by him, nor has anyone claiming under him any right to interfere with or to complete the administration of the property of the intestate. The office comes to an end on death and the course which should be taken when an administrator dies is to obtain a grant of administration de bonis non, and the person to whom such grant is made will be entitled to take possession of the property.

THESE were two consolidated appeals from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay (Beaumont C. J. and Kania J.) dated March 3, 1938, in its appellate jurisdiction, confirming, with a minor variation, a judgment and decree of that Court (Engineer J., dated May 24, 1937) in its ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

One Jaffer Allarakhia died intestate on September 20, 1918, leaving him surviving a widow Fatmabai, three sons, Abdul Rahim, Ahmed and Allarakhia, two married daughters, and a son Abdul Karim and a daughter Hajrabai of a predeceased son Abubakar. Of these Allarakhia, Abdul Karim and Hajrabai were minors.

The estate of Jaffer Allarakhia consisted of moveable and immoveable properties exceeding in value at the time of his death Rs. 6 lacs.

On August 22, 1919, letters of administration to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia were granted by the High Court to his eldest son, Abdul Rahim, who administered and managed the estate up to the time of his death.

On September 18, 1924, Abdul Rahim died intestate leaving him surviving a widow (Havabai), three sons, Janmahomed, the plaintiff, Yusuf and Usman, and three unmarried daughters. All his children were then minors.

On March 17, 1925, Havabai, the widow of Abdul Rahim, having been duly empowered by the High Court, filed a petition in the High Court for the grant to her of letters of administration to the estate of her deceased husband for the use and benefit of his three minor sons and limited to the period of minority of any of them.

On May 6, 1925, the High Court made an order granting letters of administration to her, upon the filing of the requisite administration bond.

On May 14, 1925, Havabai and the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, (defendant) as surety, executed an administration bond, in favour of the Registrar of the High Court in its testamentary and intestate jurisdiction, and Head Assistant to the Prothonotary and Registrar, their executors, administrators and assigns, in the sum of Rs. 3,98,060. The conditions of the bond were that Havabai as administratrix of the estate of Abdul Rahim—

(1) should make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of the property and credits of the deceased which had or should come to her hands, possession or knowledge, or to the hands or possession of any other person or persons for her, and should exhibit or cause to be exhibited to the High Court such inventory on or before November 14, 1925 :

(2) should well and truly administer such property and credits according to law :

F. C. (3) should make or cause to be made a true and just account of her administration on or before May 14, 1926 :

1940 (4) should deliver and pay all the rest and residue of the property and credits found remaining upon such account, after examination and allowance thereof by the High Court, to such person or persons respectively as should be lawfully entitled to such residue.

GENERAL ACCIDENT FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED On June 9, 1925, letters of administration of the property and credits of Abdul Rahim were issued to Havabai on behalf of Janmahomed (plaintiff) Yusuf and Usman, minor sons of the deceased, for their use and benefit and limited until one of them attained majority.

JANMAHOMED On July 2, 1925, Havabai executed a power-of-attorney in favour of one Haroon Mahomed Bhatra. The circumstances in which the power was executed were that Havabai was a pardanashin lady and illiterate; that Bhatra was closely related to Havabai, being the son of her maternal uncle; that he was a business-man who was assisting Ahmed in the management of Jaffer Allarakhia's estate and had the confidence of Ahmed; that the power was given on the suggestion and with the approval of Ahmed and Abdul Karim; and that there was no reason to doubt the honesty or financial solvency of Bhatra. On October 22, 1928, Haroon Mahomed Bhatra committed suicide after misapplying some of the property.

On October 31, 1928, Havabai, for herself and the other creditors of Bhatra, filed suit No. 2290 of 1928 in the High Court, for administration of Bhatra's estate, and, on her application, a receiver was appointed of Bhatra's estate.

On April 27, 1929, Havabai died.

On April 29, 1929, upon the petition of one Abdul Majid Ebrahim, an order was made by the High Court, under ss. 10 and 11 of the Administrator General's Act (III of 1913), directing the Administrator General of Bombay to collect and take possession of all the movable and immovable properties forming part of the estate of Abdul Rahim and of Havabai, and to hold, deposit and realise the same according to the directions of the Court.

On October 15, 1929, an order was made by consent of the parties in suit No. 2290 of 1928 that it be referred to the Commissioner of the Court to take (1) an account of the debts of Haroon Mahomed Bhatra, (2) an account of the funeral expenses, and (3) an account of the movable and immovable properties of the deceased, if any, come to the hands of the defendants (the heirs and legal representatives of Bhatra) or any of them, or to the hands of any other person, it being further ordered with the like consent that the said property be applied in due course of administration.

On April 4, 1930, the Administrator General, as administrator of the estates of Abdul Rahim and of Havabai, made an affidavit before the Commissioner, claiming the sum of Rs. 1,30,476-4-9 from the estate of Bhatra.

On May 30, 1930, the Commissioner delivered his decision on the claim of the Administrator General. He came to the conclusion that Bhatra stood in a fiduciary relationship to Havabai, and in such relation received moneys on her behalf; that he violated his duty to the extent of nearly Rs. 90,000, which moneys he carried into two shops conducted by him in the names of Mahomed Yusuf and Bros., and Haroon Mahomed & Sons, in which, though the moneys were credited to Havabai, they were not kept apart but were mixed up with other funds of his own; that Bhatra had left no property other than these two shops, and that the only assets available for payment of his creditors were the sale proceeds and outstandings of such shops. He held that, in such circumstances, Bhatra was a trustee for Havabai of such moneys and that, as he mingled the property which he received as such trustee with his own, the Administrator General, who was the beneficiary, had a right to follow such moneys and was entitled to a charge on the funds available for the amount in priority to other creditors. He, therefore, allowed the claim of the Administrator General for Rs. 1,21,838-0-9, together with interest from March 17, 1930, at nine per cent. per annum.

JANMAHOMED

On December 11, 1930, a decree was passed in suit No. 2290 of 1928, confirming the report of the Commissioner. The Administrator General received under this decree Rs. 35,000.

Thereafter, a claim was made upon the Administrator General, as representing the estates of Abdul Rahim and Havabai, for a sum exceeding Rs. 1,38,000 alleged to be due to Allarakhia Jaffer as his share of the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia.

Upon the hearing of such application, the Administrator General gave to the Court an assurance that he did not intend to make any payment to the creditors or heirs of Abdul Rahim or of Havabai pending adjudication upon the claim of the applicant.

On November 14, 1931, the plaintiff attained majority.

On January 8, 1932, Allarakhia filed suit No. 44 of 1932 in the High Court against the defendant herein (as surety for Abdul Rahim, as administrator of the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia), the plaintiff herein and his two minor brothers (as heirs of Abdul Rahim) and the Administrator General of Bombay, as representing the estate of Abdul Rahim, claiming the sum of Rs. 12,26,980 or such part thereof as represented the loss to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia due to the failure of Abdul Rahim, as the Administrator of such estate, to carry out his obligations under the administration bonds and for other relief. He sued as assignee of such administration bonds.

On March 9, 1932, a summons was taken out on behalf of the plaintiff herein and served on the defendant for an order that the administration bond dated May 14, 1925, should be assigned to him to enable him to sue on it.

On March 24, 1932, an order was made on such application that the Court should assign the administration bond to the plaintiff, his heirs, executors or administrators, it being further ordered that, on such assignment, the plaintiff, his heirs, executors or administrators should be entitled to sue on the bond in his or their name or names as if the same had been originally given to him or them, and should be entitled to recover thereon, as trustee or trustees for all persons interested, the full amount recoverable in respect of any breach thereof. By an order of the Chief Justice dated July 14, 1932, expressed to be made under the powers vested in him by the Letters Patent, the Prothonotary and Senior Master of the High Court and the Assistant Prothonotary were appointed to assign the bond to the plaintiff. By a deed of assignment, dated August 13, 1932, the officers so appointed assigned the bond to the plaintiff "to hold the same unto the said assignee absolutely with all such powers, rights and remedies as are now subsisting thereon."

On November 2, 1932, the plaintiff filed the present suit for the recovery from the defendant of the sum of Rs. 3,98,060 or such lesser sum as represented the loss to the estate of Abdul Rahim due to the alleged failure of Haya-bai, as administratrix of that estate, to carry out her obligations under the administration bond. The specific charges of breach of duty by the adminis-tratrix were :—

(1) the appointment of Bhatra, described as a distant relative of the Adminis-tratrix, as her constituted attorney to manage the estate of Abdul Rahim and gen-erally to do all acts and things in relation to the estate as he might think fit :

(2) allowing the sum of Rs. 50,003-13-2 shown in the inventory and accounts filed by her on June 2, 1927, as being in her hands on that date, to remain in the hands of Bhatra, and failure to invest the same in authorised securities :

(3) failure to realise the undivided one-fourth share of Abdul Rahim in the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia, as from the date of the death of Ahmed Jaffer on May 22, 1926, and to invest the same in authorised securities, and allowing such share to remain in the hands of Bhatra :

(4) failure to hand over to the Accountant General of Bombay the estate of Abdul Rahim, all his heirs being minors.

On May 19, 1933, the defendant filed a written statement not admitting the alleged loss to the estate of Abdul Rahim ; denying the alleged breaches of duty ; contending, inter alia, that the bond had not been validly assigned in law to plaintiff ; that the purported assignment was the transfer of a mere right to sue and, as such, was void and inoperative ; that the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to maintain the suit ; and that the claim of the respon-dent was barred by the law of limitation.

Engineer J., who heard the suit, decided (May 24, 1937) the issues as to limitation and the validity of the assignment of the bond against the defend-ant. The following is his Lordship's judgment.—

ENGINEER J. This is a suit filed to enforce against the defendants, who are an insurance company, an administration bond which they joined the administratrix in giving to the Court for the due administration of the estate of Abdul Rahim Jaffer Allarakhia. The bond is put in action by the plaint-iff to whom it was assigned under an order of the Court.

The defences to the action are :

(1) Limitation,
(2) that the assignment of the bond is not valid,
(3) that in fact the administratrix was not guilty of such devastavit as to make her liable to make good the loss, and that therefore the defendants are not liable, and

(4) the defendants put the plaintiff to proof of the actual loss and dam-age sustained by the estate.

As regards the points of limitation and validity of the assignment of the bond, it is contended on behalf of the defendants that art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act governs the case, and that the breach of obligation of the bond occurred at the latest on the death of the administratrix, which was more than three years before the commencement of the suit. The plea of invalidity of the assignment is raised on the contention that if at the date of the assignment there was no sum recoverable as the claim was time-barred, the assignment cannot help the plaintiff to recover anything. Both the points were decided by the Appeal Court in Manubhai Chunilal v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd.,<sup>1</sup> where similar contentions of the defendants were negatived. The defendants in that case were the same as the defendants in this case. The Appeal Court there held that a bond like the one in this suit is a bond upon a condition, but a suit to enforce the bond by a person to whom it has been assigned is not a suit upon a bond within the meaning of art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act. The suit is not a suit merely on the bond, but is a suit on the bond coupled with the statutory assignment on proof of title to the estate. It was held that s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, which provides for the assignment of administration bonds, does not deal only with the procedure in case of assignment, but confers substantive rights, and that it provides a new starting point of time for the purpose of limitation and the assignee acquires by virtue of the assignment a fresh and independent cause of action, and that limitation would run from the time the assignment is made.

So long as that decision stands, the findings on the issues raised by the defendants must be against them. The defendants, however, do not abandon their submissions. The defendants in the suit decided in Manubhai Chunilal's case applied for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, but leave was refused by the Appeal Court on the ground that no leave to the Privy Council could be obtained at that stage. An application to the Privy Council for special leave to appeal was also rejected by the Privy Council on the same ground. The question, however, is to be taken up to the Privy Council and the defendants, therefore, desire to keep their submissions on these two questions alive.

The question whether the administratrix was guilty of devastavit, and would have been liable to make good to the estate the loss which the estate has suffered in this case, depends upon the answer to the question whether she was justified in delegating certain powers to one Bhatra to whom she gave a power-of-attorney in wide terms. But before I consider that question, it is necessary to give certain facts, figures, and dates relating to the estate in question.

One Jaffer Allarakhia, a Cutchi Memon, Mahomedan inhabitant, died on September 20, 1918. Being a Cutchi Memon he was governed in matters of inheritance and succession by Hindu law. He died leaving as his heirs three sons, namely, Abdul Rahim, Ahmed and Allarakhia, and a grandson named Abdul Karim by his predeceased son Aboobaker. Each of these four persons became entitled to a one-fourth share in the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia. When Jaffer Allarakhia died his third son Allarakhia and his grandson Abdul Karim were both minors.

The estate left by Jaffer Allarakhia consisted of four immovable properties in Bombay. He had also shortly before his death entered into an agreement for the purchase of another immoveable property in Bombay. The moveable properties left by him consisted of his share in the partnership firm of Jaffer Allarakhia & Co., some outstandings and some shares in the Century Mills. Letters of administration to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia were granted to his eldest son Abdul Rahim on August 22, 1919. Abdul Rahim duly carried out the agreement for purchase of the fifth property which was entered into by Jaffer before his death. Abdul Rahim as the administrator of the estate of his father Jaffer realised his share in the partnership firm of Jaffer Allarakhia & Co., and also recovered such of the outstandings of Jaffer as were recoverable. In the inventory and accounts relating to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia, which were filed by Abdul Rahim as his administrator on December 20, 1920, he showed as the estate in his hands on November 10, 1920, in addition to the five immoveable properties aforesaid cash in hand amounting to Rs. 2,32,031-15-0, seven shares of the Century Mills of the value of Rs. 2,940, securities of the value of Rs. 200 and two carriages and a horse of the value of Rs. 1,200. The accounts show that up to November 10, 1920, some payments had been made to each of the four persons entitled to the estate of Jaffer, but the payments were not made in equal amounts. Abdul Rahim had himself by that time, i.e. November 10, 1920, taken Rs. 33,933-10-0, Ahmed had been paid Rs. 10,254-13-0, Allarakhia had been paid Rs. 4,115-4-9, and Abdul Karim had been paid Rs. 5,221-2-6.

Although Jaffer died in September, 1918, and letters of administration to his estate were granted to Abdul Rahim on August 20, 1919, Abdul Rahim did not distribute the estate up to the time of his death which occurred on September 18, 1924. By that time, however, further payments had been made to each of the four persons entitled to the estate of Jaffer. Abdul Rahim, instead of either distributing the estate among the persons entitled thereto or investing the cash realised in authorised securities kept the moneys in his own name in various banks and invested a part of the moneys in giving loans on hundis and otherwise to various persons at interest. The moneys kept in banks and the advances made by Abdul Rahim were kept and made not in the name of Abdul Rahim as administrator of the estate of Jaffer but in his own personal name. At the date of the death of Abdul Rahim, the moneys paid to each of the four persons entitled to the estate of Jaffer were as follows :

|----------------------------------|-----------------|
| Abdul Rahim had withdrawn in all | Rs. 69,059 14 9 |
| Ahmed .. .. .                    | Rs. 37,240 13 6 |
| Allarakhia .. .. .               | Rs. 5,644 7 9   |
| Abdul Karim .. .. .              | Rs. 17,201 9 0  |

In addition to the five immoveable properties, Abdul Rahim had in his hands, after taking into consideration the withdrawals aforesaid, a sum of Rs. 1,64,819-14-7 as belonging to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia. These moneys, as I mentioned above, stood in the name of Abdul Rahim himself, some in banks, and some by way of advances made to several persons.

Abdul Rahim died leaving a widow Havabai, three sons, and three daughters; all the sons and daughters were minors at the time of the death of Abdul Rahim. His three sons became entitled to his estate in equal shares subject to the right of the widow to maintenance during her lifetime, and subject to the right of the three daughters to maintenance till marriage and marriage expenses. The widow Havabai applied for letters of administration to the estate of her husband for the benefit of her sons and limited until any of them attained majority. Letters of administration were granted to her on June 9, 1925. Prior to that, she and the defendants entered into a bond with the Registrar of the High Court in its testamentary and intestate jurisdiction and the Head Assistant to the Registrar for Rs. 3,98,060, being double the amount of the net estate shown in the schedule to the petition for letters of administration. One of the conditions of the bond was the due administration by the said Havabai of all the property and credits of the deceased which have or shall come to her hands or to the hands of any person or persons for her. On July 2, 1925, Havabai gave a power-of-attorney to one Haroon Mahomed Bhatra, exhibit A-14. The terms and recitals of the power-of-attorney are important. It states that Havabai being a pardanashin lady is desirous of appointing a fit and proper person to be her attorney to act for her in all matters relating to the estate of Abdul Rahim Jaffer Allarakhia.

The power authorises Haroon Mahomed Bhatra to call for and settle all accounts relating to the estate, to demand and receive from all persons moneys and securities belonging to the estate and to give receipts in discharge for the same, to commence, prosecute and enforce any action or proceeding in relation to the estate, and to compromise, abandon, submit to judgment, or become non-suited in any such actions or proceedings, and to deposit the moneys received by him by virtue of the power in banks, and to invest them in the name of Havabai in or upon such investment authorised by law for investment of trust funds, and,—and this is a very important part of the powers—"to withdraw such sums from time to time as her attorney should deem necessary, proper or expedient, and to endorse or sign her name to any cheque, dividend or interest warrants or other instruments payable to her as administratrix of the said estate of Abdul Rahim Jaffer Allarakhia," and lastly generally to do all acts and things in relation to the premises as her attorney should think fit.

Thereafter Bhatra managed the estate of Abdul Rahim, and in doing so dealt with the moneys which belonged not only to Abdul Rahim himself but which were in the hands of Abdul Rahim at the time of his death as belonging to the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia. The moneys were not invested in authorised securities, but large sums were allowed to remain in banks, some of them as fixed deposits and some in current account. Various large sums were also advanced to people at interest. Some of these sums were lost to the estate as the borrowers became insolvents, but the principal loss caused to the estate was not caused by the failure of some of the borrowers, but because Bhatra under the power-of-attorney given to him withdrew large sums from the moneys which were kept in banks in the name of Havabai and misappropriated them for his own purpose. Several cheques signed by Bhatra as the constituted attorney of Havabai in favour of his own firm were put in as exhibits, being exhibit 1 collectively. These cheques cover a period from August 5, 1926, to June 22, 1927. These moneys, however, do not exhaust the amounts wrongfully withdrawn and misappropriated by Bhatra. It is in evidence that the total amount thus misappropriated by Bhatra came to about Rs. 90,000.

For the defendants it is contended that Havabai was entitled to delegate the powers which she delegated to Bhatra, and that she could not be held liable to make good to the estate the loss caused by the misappropriation and fraud of Bhatra, and that, therefore, the defendants also are not liable under the bond. This contention, if accepted, goes to the whole root of the defendants' liability.

The contention on behalf of the defendants is based on certain answers given by the plaintiff's witness Joosab Esmail in the witness box. He admitted that Bhatra managed the estate of Jaffer after Ahmed's death which occurred in May, 1926, and that Abdul Karim was also taking part in the management. He admitted that Bhatra was trusted as an honest man by Ahmed, and that he was also a business man. He further said in evidence as follows :—

"When Ahmed died Bhatra was the only person familiar with the affairs of the estate. He was the only person then alive who had taken part in the management of the estate. He was the obvious person for Havabai to look to in order to manage the estate. Up to the time of Bhatra's death there was never any suggestion that he was anything but honest or that he was in any way financially embarrassed."

It was further contended on behalf of the defendants that as Havabai was ill it was necessary for her to give a power-of-attorney to Bhatra. The only evidence in support of the illness of Havabai are certain letters written on her behalf by her attorneys to the defendants between April 19, 1926, and June 15, 1927. These letters were written in answer to demands made by the insurance company calling upon Havabai to file her inventory and accounts and to explain the delay in doing so. It was stated in two of the letters that the delay was due to her illness. In the letter of April 19, 1926, Messrs. Payne & Co. on her behalf wrote to the insurance company stating that Havabai had gone upcountry owing to her illness. In another letter of June 15, 1927, they wrote to the insurance company informing them of the inventory and accounts having been filed, and stating that the delay was due to her illness from which she had not yet completely recovered. These letters were no doubt tendered in evidence by the plaintiff himself, but I do not think that the mere statement in these letters that Havabai was ill is proof of Havabai's illness. The plaintiff does not claim through Havabai but against her, and the statement cannot be said to be an admission binding on the plaintiff. The power-of-attorney itself does not recite that it was given by reason of any illness of Havabai. The only reason given in the power-of-attorney was that she was a pardanashin lady and was desirous of appointing a fit and proper person to be her attorney.

I hold that it is not established by the defendants that Havabai was in fact ill or so ill or for so long as to justify her in giving the power-of-attorney, or that the power-of-attorney was given because of such illness. As a matter of fact the illness of Havabai could not have been a good ground for delay in filing the inventory and accounts, because it is in evidence that Havabai did not know anything about the accounts or in fact about the administration of the estate. According to the evidence everything was done by Bhatra, and the inventory and accounts could have been prepared only by him and under his instructions. Havabai could not have done anything more than merely put her signature to them.

But it seems to me that the real question at issue is not whether Bhatra was the proper person to whom the powers of Havabai could be delegated, or whether Havabai exercised due care and caution in selecting an agent, or whether she had any reason to doubt the honesty of Bhatra, but whether Havabai could be said to be justified at all in giving a power-of-attorney to anybody in the wide terms in which it was given. What Havabai in fact did was to renounce all her powers as administratrix, and to hand over the whole administration of the estate to Bhatra, and the question is whether she was justified in doing so. Even if she was justified in doing so, a further question arises whether she exercised proper or any supervision over Bhatra's management. As I have said before, the misappropriation by Bhatra extended over a considerable period, and Havabai never took the least trouble to look into the accounts, or to see that the moneys were safe in the banks. Jusub Ismail in his evidence said :—

"After the death of Abdul Rahim the books of account of the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia were under the control of Bhatra. Up to November, 1928, Havabai took no steps to realise the share of Abdul Rahim in the estate of Jaffer Allarakhia. Havabai never looked into the books of accounts maintained by Bhatra of the estate of Jaffer or Abdul Rahim. She never made any inquiries as to what Bhatra was doing in respect of these estates. Havabai did not know what Bhatra was doing with the moneys belonging to the estate. Whenever moneys were required for the purpose of the estate of Jaffer, Bhatra was paying the moneys. He paid on behalf of Havabai."

Bhatra committed suicide on October 22, 1928. Thus it is clear that Havabai left him to do what he liked with the estate and the moneys belonging to the estate for more than three years. In fact the first misappropriation proved was on January 22, 1926, within six months of the power-of-attorney being given to him and nearly two and a half years before his death.

About nine days after his death, viz. on October 31, 1928, Havabai filed a suit for administration of Bhatra's estate. I will later on further refer to this suit as well as to another suit filed by her on November 17, 1928, for administration of Jaffer's estate.

The Trustee Act of 1925, 15 Geo. V, c. 19, of course does not apply in India. We are, therefore, not concerned with some of the radical extensions of the principles of trustees' indemnity effected by s. 23(1) of that Act. The law applicable in India is to be found in s. 47 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, which says that :—

"A trustee cannot delegate his office or any of his duties either to a co-trustee or to a stranger, unless (a) the instrument of trust so provides, or (b) the delegation is in the regular course of business, or (c) the delegation is necessary, or (d) the beneficiary, being competent to contract, consents to the delegation.

The explanation to the section says that—

"The appointment of an attorney or proxy to do an act merely ministerial and involving no independent discretion is not a delegation within the meaning of this section."

Whether this section applies in terms to the case of an administratrix or not, I think those are the principles which should be applied to the present case.

The English authorities cited by the learned Advocate General on behalf of the defendants need only be examined very briefly. In Lord Dorchester v. The Earl of Effingham<sup>1</sup> an executor who had deposited moneys belonging to the estate with the same persons with whom the testator had deposited them in his lifetime, although they were not bankers, was held not liable. There was no corrupt motive, and it was held that he was not guilty of gross negligence. I do not think this decision is relevant to the facts of this case.

In In re Bird : Oriental Commercial Bank v. Savin<sup>1</sup> a solicitor was engaged to compromise a claim against the estate. He wrote to the executor that the claim had been compromised and obtained moneys from the executor for making the payment, but instead of making the payment he misappropriated the moneys to his own use. It was held that the executor had done just what any prudent man would think himself safe in doing. There was no negligence on his part and no incautious trusting to some other person's representation.

In In re Speight : Speight v. Gaunt,<sup>2</sup> it was held that trustees may employ brokers and agents in cases in which they are employed in the ordinary course of business, and that trustees do not guarantee the solvency or honesty of the agents they employ.

In In re Brier : Brier v. Evison<sup>3</sup> the trustee had employed an agent to collect moneys. He was held not liable for moneys misappropriated by the agent.

In Lakhmichand v. Jai Kuwarbai<sup>4</sup> it was held that in appointing an agent the trustee should use the same degree of care as a man of ordinary prudence would in his own affairs. There the agent was employed for the purpose of conducting a business. But at the same time it was laid down in that case that the trustee would be liable if there was want of diligence either in selecting an agent or supervising his work.

I do not think any of these cases helps the defendants in this case. A personal representative ought not to employ an agent to perform the duties which by accepting the office he had taken upon himself except where the employment of the agent was reasonable. Delegation, of course, is necessary and would be reasonable in the regular course of business where, for instance, legal work is to be done for which a solicitor is to be employed, or where property is to be sold for which an auctioneer is to be employed, or where securities are to be purchased for which brokers are to be employed, or where business is to be conducted, or outstandings and rents are to be recovered for which collectors are to be employed. But a trustee or an administrator cannot delegate to others the confidence reposed in himself. Even where an agent has to be employed to receive moneys, the trustee would be liable if he allowed the agent to retain the moneys in his hands uninvested for a longer time than is reasonably necessary. Trustees have no right to shift their duties on other persons, and if they employ agents, they remain subject to responsibility towards their cestuis que trust for whom they have undertaken the duty.

I have already referred to the wide powers given by Havabai to Bhatra under the power-of-attorney, and I hold that the appointment of Bhatra as such constituted attorney of Havabai was in breach of her duty as administratrix. But even if the appointment could be justified, I have no doubt that Havabai became liable for the defalcations of Bhatra as she absolutely failed to supervise the management and dealings of Bhatra.

The next question to be considered is what is the loss or damage occasioned to the estate by the devastavit of the administratrix. [After discussing the evidence on this point his Lordship proceeded :]

In my opinion, therefore, the two sums for which the defendants are liable

1 (1873) L. R. 16 Eq. 203.

2 (1883) 22 Ch. D. 727.

3 (1884) 26 Ch. D. 238.

are the sum of Rs. 58,496-11-5, and the sum of Rs. 23,935-7-6. These are, in my opinion, the amounts lost to the estate of Abdūl Rahim by the mal-administration of Havabai.

The plaintiff claims interest on these sums relying on s. 23 (e) of the Indian Trusts Act at the rate of six per cent. per annum with half yearly rests. But, in my opinion, the case is not covered by s. 23(e) of the Indian Trusts Act. The loss which was occasioned was not due to the failure to invest trust moneys and to accumulate the dividends, but was due to the misappropriations made by Bhatra who ought never to have been delegated by Havabai with the authorities which she gave him. Nevertheless, the defendants are, in my opinion, liable to pay interest. If the moneys had not been lost they would have been available to be invested in authorised securities, and in my opinion, it is proper to allow interest on the two sums I have mentioned above at four per cent. from June 2, 1927.

At one time I thought that out of these sums the amounts for maintenance which the heirs of Abdul Rahim continued to get should be deducted. But, in fact, the moneys had been lost substantially by June, 1927, and the amounts for the maintenance of the heirs of Abdul Rahim received by them were really out of the rents of the immoveable properties. For the same reason it is not proper, in my opinion, to deduct from the above, the sum, small though it was, namely about Rs. 700 which the heirs of Abdul Rahim received from the estate of Jaffer as the result of the decree in the suit for the administration of Jaffer's estate.

Abdul Rahim left three sons and three daughters. One of the daughters was got married by Havabai after the death of Abdul Rahim, and in my opinion, the expenses of her marriage should be deducted from the above two sums. What the exact amount of this expense was is not before me, but it appears from two counterfoils of cheques, one dated January 21, 1926, and the other dated April 19, 1927, that Rs. 4,000 and 1,500 were spent for the wedding of the eldest daughter. These two cheques are drawn in favour of Haji Moosa & Co. The cheque for Rs. 4,000 is stated to be for ornaments, clothes, etc. for the wedding of the eldest daughter. The cheque for Rs. 1,500 is stated to be for wedding expenses. These could not be the only expenses incurred by Havabai for the wedding of her daughter. The plaintiff contended that it was for the defendants to prove how much was spent for the wedding of the daughter. But it seems to me that that fact would be especially within the knowledge of the plaintiff and the burden of proving that fact would be upon him. Although at the time the plaintiff's sister was got married the plaintiff was a minor, all the necessary information and materials ought to be within the reach of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's witness Joosab Esmail seemed to know all about the family and its affairs, and I think he would be in a position to depose to the expenses that were incurred on the wedding. At one time, I was inclined to refer the question of ascertaining the expenses made on the wedding of the daughter to the Commissioner, so that after his report the Court might be able to decide whether the amount found by him or a smaller sum should be deducted from the figures mentioned above. But on further consideration, I think it is possible to avoid a reference. At or about the time that the wedding all, the loss caused to the estate and for which the defendants are sought to be held liable cannot be weighed in scales of gold, and I think neither party should be aggrieved, if I hold, as I do, that from the two sums aforesaid the sum of Rs. 7,500 should be deducted as legitimately spent in fulfilment of the estate's obligation to provide the wedding expenses of one of the daughters. I hold that the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiff the sum of Rs. 74,932-2-11 being the total of the two sums of Rs. 58,496-11-5, and Rs. 23,935-7-6, less the sum of Rs. 7,500. The defendants should pay interest on Rs. 74,932-2-11 at four per cent. per annum from June 2, 1927.

[After recording findings on the issues, the judgment concluded :]

There will be a decree for the plaintiff against the defendants for Rs. 74,932-2-11 and interest thereon at four per cent. per annum from June 2, 1927, till judgment.

The defendants must pay the costs of the suit to the plaintiff including the costs of the petition for assignment of the bond and the chamber summons relating to the same. The defendants must also pay interest on judgment at the rate of six per cent. per annum till payment. The decretal amount should be paid by the defendants into Court and the plaintiff should apply for further directions as regards the disposal of the amount after giving notice to the other parties now interested in the estate of Abdul Rahim.

The defendant company appealed against the decree of Engineer J., disputing liability of any kind and contending that the amount awarded was excessive.

The plaintiff cross-objected to the decree in regard to the alleged loss in respect of the immovable properties, the costs of the suit for the administration of Jaffer Allarakhia's estate and the rate of interest (four per cent. per annum) awarded up to judgment.

The appeal came on for hearing before Beaumont C. J. and Kania J., who dismissed the appeal and cross-objections (March 31, 1938) subject to a variation in the date from which interest should run.

The following are their Lordships' judgments.—

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Engineer.

The plaintiff is the assignee of an administration bond on which the defendants stood sureties. The bond was given on May 14, 1925, to secure due administration of the estate of one Abdul Rahim by his widow Havabai to whom letters of administration were granted on June 9, 1925. The bond has been assigned to the plaintiff under the Indian Succession Act, 1925.

Questions of limitation were raised in the written statement. These questions are covered by a decision of this Court in Manubhai Chonilal v. The General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd.,<sup>1</sup> and the learned Judge in the Court below overruled the objections on the strength of that decision and we must adopt the same course.

The only questions which have been raised on the appeal are questions of account. The relevant facts are that Abdul Rahim was a Mahomedan but a Cutchi Memon and, therefore, the descent of his estate is regulated by Hindu law. He died on September 18, 1924, and as I have said letters of administration were granted to his widow. During his lifetime he had been the administrator of the estate of his father, Jaffer, who died in 1918, and that estate had not been completely administered at the date of the death of Abdul Rahim. Part of that estate consisted of some immoveable properties, but there was a good deal of personal estate which Abdul Rahim had received and to some extent mixed with his own money. There is no suggestion that Abdul Rahim had misappropriated any part of the estate of Jaffer, but undoubtedly Abdul Rahim's estate was a debtor to Jaffer's estate at the time of Abdul Rahim's death.

The administratrix, Havabai, is a pardanashin lady and illiterate. On July 2, 1925, i.e. within a month after the grant to her of the letters of administration, she executed a power-of-attorney in favour of one Bhatra. That power-of-attorney is expressed in wide terms and practically gives Bhatra complete control over Abdul Rahim's estate. It is alleged by the plaintiff in this suit that the administratrix had no right to grant a power-of-attorney in such wide terms to Bhatra. The learned trial Judge accepted that view, and I entirely agree with him. No doubt, Havabai, being a pardanashin lady, would require some assistance in the administration of the estate, and she could have appointed agents for specific purposes in the business of administration, but she was no more entitled than any other administrator to grant a general power-of-attorney which took the control of the estate out of her hands and placed it in the hands of somebody else. If she was not competent to attend to the business she ought to have stood aside and not taken out letters of administration. It seems to me impossible to contend seriously that she was justified in granting so wide a power-of-attorney to Bhatra. The result of the granting of the power-of-attorney was that a large part of the estate was lost. Bhatra misappropriated it and eventually committed suicide. The plaintiff now sues the defendants as sureties under the administration bond, and the real question in dispute in this appeal is as to the amount which the defendants are liable to pay. The learned Judge held in round figures that Havabai had received Rs. 58,000 in respect of immoveable estate of Abdul Rahim and that fact is not challenged in appeal. He also held that Havabai had received Rs. 23,000 in respect of moveable

P. C. estate of Jaffer and the receipt of that money is also not disputed, but it 1940 is argued that deductions should be allowed in respect of costs of mainten— ance; but the short answer to that is that there is no evidence that any GENERAL money was applied for maintenance of Havabai and her family. It is com-
 ACCIDENT plained that counsel in the Court below did not cross-examine witnesses
 FIRE AND about the expenditure for maintenance because he was under the impression LIFE that there would be a reference to the Commissioner for taking accounts.
 ASSURANCE However that may be, the fact remains that there is nothing on record to CORPORA- show that any part of the estate was applied in maintenance. The receipt TION, of the amount being established, it is for the administratrix to show that LIMITED she applied the same in due course of administration, and that she has not
 v. done. I think she is liable for that sum as well as Rs. 58,000.

JANMAHOMED Then it is urged that she ought to be given credit for a sum of Rs. 35,000.
 — Beamoni C.J. Now that sum was received under these circumstances: Havabai died on April 27, 1929, and by an order of this Court made on April 29, 1929, the Administrator General was appointed administrator under ss. 10 and 11 of the Administrator General's Act to collect and get in the moveable and immo-veable properties forming part of the estates of Abdul Rahim and Havabai.
 Havabai, before her death, had started a suit against the representatives of Bhatra to recover the loss which he had occasioned to the estate. The Administrator General continued that suit after the death of Havabai, and eventually recovered a sum of Rs. 35,000 in that suit. That was very much less than the amount of his claim, but it was the total sum which he recovered, and he applied that sum in payment to the estate of Jaffer. It is argued, and I think rightly, that there was no breach of trust or devastavit in respect of that payment. Certainly there was no devastavit for which the defendants are liable. Abdul Rahim's estate was undoubtedly a debtor to the estate of Jaffer, and as the Administrator General represented Hava-bai and Abdul Rahim, I think he was entitled to apply this sum in payment of a debt due from Abdul Rahim's estate. But it does not follow from that that the defendants are entitled to credit for that amount. Indeed I am unable to see what the receipt and application of this sum of Rs. 35,000 has to do with the defendants. What it really comes to is that Havabai received Rs. 74,000, which she has not accounted for. She or her estate also received Rs. 35,000, which she has accounted for. The fact that she has accounted for the Rs. 35,000 is no reason why she should not account for the Rs. 74,000. I think the learned Judge was quite right in holding that the amount for which she must account is Rs. 74,000. That really disposes of the appeal.

Then there are cross-objections which relate to the immoveable estate of Jaffer. Havabai and the other persons interested in the estate of Jaffer agreed to partition the immoveable estate of Jaffer sometime in 1925 and in 1928 a suit was started for the purpose of partitioning the same. Eventually the property was sold in 1934. There is not a particle of evidence that any loss was occasioned to the estate by any wrongful act of Havabai.
 I do not think she was guilty of any unreasonable delay in her action in relation to the immoveable properties, and even if she was, it is not established that the estate suffered any loss thereby. In my opinion there is no substance in the cross-objections relating to the immoveable properties.

Then it is stated that the learned Judge made a wrong order with regard to interest. He allowed interest at four per cent. per annum from June 22, 1927, which was the date on which Havabai filed the inventory. I think the date should be from the expiration of the administrator's year, i.e. July 9, 1926. With that alteration in the date from which interest is to run I think there is no reason for interfering with the learned Judge's order. No doubt six per cent. is the usual rate of interest allowed in this Court, but the learned Judge was not bound to allow that rate. In my opinion there is no ground for interfering with the manner in which he exercised his discretion on that point.

The appeal will be dismissed with costs. The cross-objections will also be dismissed with costs subject to the alteration of the date from which interest is to run to July 9, 1926.

KANIA J. The material facts to be considered for this appeal are these : Jaffer, a Cutchi Memon, died on September 20, 1918, leaving him surviving three sons, and a grandson by a predeceased son. Out of the three sons Allarakhia was a minor and the grandson Abdul Karim was also a minor. Abdul Rahim, the eldest son, obtained letters of administration to the estate of Jaffer. The estate consisted of four immoveable properties, a business, certain shares and cash. In respect of a fifth immoveable property a contract to purchase was made during the lifetime of Jaffer. That was completed by Abdul Rahim as his administrator. After obtaining letters of administration Abdul Rahim wound up the estate, collected the outstandings and paid the debts. The result was that at the end of October, 1920, there were in his hands five immoveable properties, seven shares of Century Mills and about three lacs of rupees in cash. Out of that sum Abdul Rahim had himself withdrawn before his death a sum of Rs. 69,000 and odd, Ahmed, the second son, had withdrawn over Rs. 37,000, while to the two minors Rs. 5,600 and Rs. 17,000 were given, or were utilised for their benefit. The estate of Jaffer, to the extent it consisted of cash, was deposited in banks, or with different firms, in the name of Abdul Rahim as administrator. Apart from the estate so held by Abdul Rahim he had his own independent business and his own estate. That also was invested in his own name. That was the state of the estate of Jaffer and Abdul Rahim when Abdul Rahim died on September 18, 1924. After the death of Abdul Rahim, Ahmed, another son of Jaffer, tried to collect some of the estate and outstandings. Abdul Karim, the grandson, who had by that time attained majority also assisted in the recovery. As most of the cash was however invested in the name of Abdul Rahim, Havabai, on March 17, 1925, applied for letters of administration to the estate of Abdul Rahim. On May 14, 1925, the defendants joined Havabai in executing the administration bond. On June 7, 1925, letters of administration to the estate of Abdul Rahim were granted to Havabai.

On July 2, 1925, Havabai, who was a pardanashin woman, gave a general power-of-attorney to one Bhatra and in fact Bhatra thereafter continued to administer, collect and dispose of the whole estate (the estate of Jaffer which stood in the name of Abdul Rahim and Abdul Rahim's own estate). The amounts lying with different banks and with different merchants were collected and accounts were opened in the banks in the name of Havabai, which were operated upon by Bhatra. In the accounts so opened in the name of Havabai cash which originally belonged to Jaffer's estate was deposited. The personal estate of Abdul Rahim, which was also deposited in different banks or lying with different merchants, was also collected and put in the same banking accounts. Bhatra operated on these accounts and eventually committed suicide. It was then discovered that he had misappropriated almost the whole cash. On October 31, 1928, Havabai on behalf of herself and other creditors of Bhatra filed a suit in this Court for the administration of Bhatra's estate. Soon thereafter she also filed another suit for the administration of the estate of Jaffer and for recovering the share of Abdul Rahim in the estate of Jaffer. Pending those suits she died on April 27, 1929. An application was made to this Court under ss. 10 and 11 of the Administrator General's Act and a combined order was made in respect of the estates of Havabai and Abdul Rahim. On the basis of that order the Administrator General of Bombay was made a party to the two pending suits in place of Havabai. In the suit filed for the administration of Bhatra's estate Rs. 35,000 were recovered, and it was declared that on that there was a first charge in favour of the Administrator General who was a party to that suit. Thereafter a consent decree was taken in suit No. 2414 of 1928 filed for the administration of Jaffer's estate. In that consent decree it was provided that Rs. 35,000, which was received from Bhatra's estate, should be paid over to Allarakhia the minor son of Jaffer. That appears to have been done because the adults had withdrawn larger amounts from the cash estate and the remaining cash estate had disappeared.

The present suit has been filed by one of the sons of Abdul Rahim, after obtaining an assignment of the bond passed by the defendants for the proper administration of Abdul Rahim's estate by Havabai. The first defence is of limitation. Ancillary thereto or as a part of it there is the contention that the debt having become time-barred, the assignment did not confer any title on the plaintiff to sue. These contentions are covered by grounds 1 to 4 in the memo. of appeal. The decision in Manubhai Chunilal v. The General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd.<sup>1</sup> delivered by a bench of this Court is binding on us and the two contentions urged by the appellants were decided against them in that case. Those contentions must, therefore, be rejected in this appeal.

The next contention was that the defendant company was not liable because Havabai was justified in entrusting the management of the estate to Bhatra. The power-of-attorney given to Bhatra is in very wide terms and in fact left the whole administration to Bhatra. Even conceding that a pardanashin woman who obtained letters of administration was entitled to leave some part of the administration work, subject to her supervision, to a male person, the present case goes much beyond that. The terms of the power-of-attorney and the actual work done by Bhatra establish that excepting that she obtained letters of administration in her own name for the benefit of her minor sons and limited to the period of their minority, Havabai did nothing and left the administration of the estate of the deceased completely to Bhatra. That cannot be supported in any event. That contention of the appellants must therefore fail.

The second contention was that Rs. 23,000 (the balance of the share of Abdul Rahim) which remained to be recovered from Jaffer's estate at the time of the death of Abdul Rahim were utilised in defraying the maintenance expenses of Abdul Rahim's children and of Havabai herself. The evidence on record contains an admission that this amount was withdrawn by Havabai from Jaffer's estate. There is no evidence to show that the amount so withdrawn was utilised for the maintenance of any of those parties. In the absence of any evidence to that effect the administratrix must be considered to have failed to establish her contention. A mere statement in the evidence that money was spent for the maintenance of the children and Havabai does not prove that those expenses were incurred from the estate. In the absence of such proof I am unable to differ from the conclusion of the learned Judge that the defendants were liable to make good that amount. It was suggested in the course of argument that the learned counsel for the defendants was under the impression in the trial Court that the matter was going to be referred to the Commissioner. If so, it is unfortunate, but that cannot help the defendants in appeal. The record does not show that at any stage the learned Judge had intimated to any party that the matter was to be referred to the Commissioner on any particular point or at all. Indeed the numerous entries and accounts put in before him lead to a contrary conclusion.

The third point urged on behalf of the appellants was that they were entitled to receive credit for Rs. 35,000 received from Bhatra's estate. The short answer to this contention appears to be that Abdul Rahim's estate consisted of various amounts which were deposited in various places and the estate was liable to pay different debts. Havabai, as administratrix, recovered different amounts which were deposited with banks and private firms. Instead of utilising the same in paying the debts, including the debt due to Ahmed, Allarakhia and Abdul Karim, she allowed the whole of the estate, which stood in the name of Abdul Rahim and which included the amounts which were payable to those parties and also the personal estate of Abdul Rahim, to remain in the hands of Bhatra. The result was that at the time the whole estate was handed over to Bhatra the debts due and payable by Abdul Rahim's estate remained unpaid. If, therefore, at a later stage some amount was recovered from Bhatra, it would not be improper to call it as estate of Abdul Rahim recovered from Bhatra. But there was no maladministration in paying over the money to a creditor of Abdul Rahim who had remained unpaid. If the amount was so paid over to a creditor, I do not see how the defendants could claim to be exonerated from that liability. The fallacy underlying the contention of the appellants is the assumption that only two sums of Rs. 58,000 and Rs. 23,000 were handed over to Bhatra and out of that Rs. 35,000 were recovered. The second assumption (for which there appears to be no justification) is that the amount so left in charge of Bhatra was free from any debt due by the estate of Abdul Rahim. Both these assumptions are unjustified, and in law the only thing done was that a certain amount which was treated as of the estate of Abdul Rahim was received and paid over to satisfy a debt of Abdul Rahim. In that light the defendants' contention to recover that amount must fail. Apart from these contentions the learned counsel for the appellants has not pressed any other points. He has quite rightly conceded that the separate estate of Abdul Rahim which is stated in the judgment of the trial Court to be Rs. 58,000 was the correct figure.

Coming to the cross-objections, it was first urged that Havabai had mal-administered the estate because she had failed to sell the immoveable properties soon after entering on the administration. That contention must fail on two grounds. Firstly, I do not consider a suit filed in 1928 to administer the estate of Jaffer as undue delay on the part of the administratrix to recover the undivided fourth share in the five immoveable properties. Secondly, (and that is a stronger answer to the contention of the respondent), there is no proof at all on record to show that there was any loss caused to the estate by reason of this delay. Indeed the evidence of Mr. Kanga (architect) led on behalf of the respondent himself is that there was no depreciation in the value of immoveable properties between 1925 and 1928. This contention must, therefore, fail. It was next urged before us that the balance-sheet of the estate of Jaffer up to October 17, 1925, which was signed by Havabai, disclosed that she had in her hands a sum of Rs. 1,64,000. The balance-sheet further showed that the claimants to that amount were the four heirs of Jaffer. It was contended that instead of paying over the sum to the claimants Havabai did nothing and the cash is now lost. The result was that when the immoveable properties were sold the sale proceeds had to be utilised in paying over the claimants. Therefore, there was devastavit for which the defendants, who had guaranteed proper administration, were liable. This point was not urged before the trial Court because there is no reference to this contention in the judgment. It was contended that grounds Nos. 11 and 12 of the cross-objections covered this contention. I am unable to accept that construction of grounds Nos. 11 and 12. They cover merely the claims to one-fourth share of Rs. 1,75,000, which were the sale proceeds of the five immoveable properties. I do not find anywhere in those grounds the contention that because Havabai had failed to pay off the debts in 1925 there was maladministration, and the liability was the one-fourth share in the five immoveable properties. I do not think it is permissible to the respondent to raise that contention for the first time in appeal. It would be obviously unfair because there may be evidence available to the defendants which would explain how and why the debts were not so paid off in 1925 or how that fund was utilised by Havabai.

The only other point urged on behalf of the respondent was in respect of interest. As regards the date, in my opinion, the same should be altered and interest should run on the expiry of the administrator's year, i.e. from July 9, 1926. As regards the rate it is a matter for the discretion of the Court, and having regard to all the circumstances the learned Judge allowed four per cent. interest. I am not prepared to interfere with the discretion exercised, and except for the variation about the date the contention must be disallowed. The result therefore is that the appeal and cross-objections (except as to variation in the date as mentioned above) are both dismissed with costs.

v. JANMAHOMED

Karia J.

The defendant company and the plaintiff being dissatisfied with the decree duly obtained certificates enabling them to appeal therefrom to His Majesty in Council. By an order of the High Court, dated October 14, 1938, the appeals were consolidated.

Sir Thomas Strangman K. C. and W. W. K. Page, for the appellants. We contend, first of all, that this action is clearly one on a bond, to which art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act is applicable. Next, the latest date, it is submitted, at which the cause of action could arise was the death of the administratrix in April, 1929. Therefore this suit, instituted as it was in November, 1932, must be barred. [Counsel referred to the definition of "bond" in s. 3 of the Indian Limitation Act, and to clauses 45 and 46 of the Letters Patent, (dated December 8, 1823); founding the Supreme Court of Bombay.]

We submit that when the benefit of the bond is assigned to the heir, no new cause of action accrues to him: the starting point of time remains the date of the breach by the administrator. The grounds for the decision in Manubhai Chavilal's case are open to challenge. [Counsel referred to Blackwell J.'s judgment in that case, and to Maung San U v. Maung Kyaw Mye<sup>1</sup>; Kanti Chandra Mukerji v. Al-i-Nabi<sup>2</sup> and In the Goods of Young<sup>3</sup> as showing that such cases had been decided each way.]

Pritt K. C. and S. C. Khambatta for the respondent. Article 68 is, we submit, not applicable. The action is a peculiar one to which no article of the Act is specifically applicable. Therefore by art. 120, the plaintiff had six years in which to bring his action from the date when his right to sue accrued. The question is when his cause of action arose. This action is not on the bond at all. It could equally well have been instituted against the personal representatives of the administratrix to compel them to make good any loss to the estate for which she was liable. No cause of action can, it is submitted, arise until the loss is ascertained.

Supposing, however, that art. 68 applied: in such a case the cause of action would not arise until the heir or some one similarly entitled to do so had claimed the estate and failed to obtain his due or some part of it. Section 292 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, does not merely give a new starting point by implication: it is submitted that it is to be construed as an express statutory provision to that effect. An application is made to the Court, which thereupon confers on the applicant a statutory right of action. What else can the words "who shall thereupon be entitled to sue" mean? This is clearly, we submit, an enabling section, such a section cannot be referable to a right which already existed before. It is not merely confirmatory, as its wording shows. It creates a new title to the estate.

Khambatta, following. If the assignee of such a bond were a minor,

P. C. and his guardian failed to sue on it, the minor would surely not lose his interest. Clearly he would be entitled to sue when he attained majority, because a new cause of action would have arisen under s. 292 of the Act of 1925 and the right of action would have accrued on his attaining majority.

v.
JANMAHOMED

VISCOUNT MAUGHAM. There are here two consolidated appeals from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay in its appellate jurisdiction dated March 31, 1938, confirming with a variation a judgment and decree of that Court in its ordinary original civil jurisdiction. The facts are very complex and the questions raised on the appeals are questions of considerable importance. The appellants, however, who were the defendants in the suit, besides disputing liability on a number of grounds have raised the contention that the suit was barred by art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908). This question was based on substantial grounds and their Lordships thought it right to hear the arguments of both sides upon it before embarking on the other questions raised on the appeal and the cross-appeal; and in the result they have come to the conclusion that the point of limitation raised by the appellants is well founded and accordingly it has not been necessary for them to go into the other matters above referred to.

In order to deal with the question of limitation it is necessary to state the following facts.

On September 18, 1924, Abdul Rahim died intestate at Bombay leaving him surviving a widow, Havabai, three sons and three unmarried daughters. All his children were then minors. According to the law by which he was governed his three infant sons became entitled to his estate in equal shares subject to the right of his widow to maintenance pending re-marriage or death, and to the rights of his daughters to maintenance until marriage or death, and to their marriage expenses.

On March 17, 1925, the widow of Abdul Rahim (Havabai), having been duly empowered by the High Court, filed a petition in the High Court for the grant to her of letters of administration to the estate of her deceased husband for the use and benefit of his three minor sons and limited to the period of minority of any of them. It was stated in the schedule to the petition that the moveable and immoveable properties of Abdul Rahim were valued at Rs. 2,75,791 and for the purposes of probate duty the estate was valued at Rs. 1,99,025 after deducting funeral expenses and debts. On May 6, 1925, it was ordered that on the sureties being justified for the whole of the estate of Abdul Rahim and on filing the necessary administration bond, and on payment of fees and stamp duty, letters of administration should issue as prayed to Havabai.

On May 14, 1925, Havabai and the present appellants as sureties executed a bond for Rs. 3,98,060 in favour of the Registrar of the High Court in its testamentary and intestate jurisdiction and the Head Assistant to the Prothonotary and Registrar of the Court. The conditions of the bond were in the usual form. The obligation was to be void and of no effect if Havabai

(1) should make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of the property and credits of the deceased which had or should come to her hand, possession or knowledge or to the hands or possession of any other person or persons for her and should exhibit or cause to be exhibited to the High Court such inventory on or before November 14, 1925 ;

(2) should well and truly administer such property and credits according to law ;

(3) should make or cause to be made a true and just account of her administration on or before May 14, 1926 ; and

(4) all the rest and residue of the property and credits which should be found remaining upon the said account after being first examined and allowed by the High Court should deliver and pay unto such person or persons as shall be lawfully entitled to such residue.

On June 9, 1925, the letters of administration were duly issued to Havabai on behalf of the three minor sons of the intestate for their use and benefit until one of them should attain his majority.

It is alleged by the plaint that on July 2, 1925, Havabai, who was a pardanashin lady, and illiterate, appointed one Bhatra who was related to her, being the son of her maternal uncle, her attorney to act for her in all matters relating to the estate of Abdul Rahim. This person, however, misapplied the property and subsequently (on October 22, 1928) committed suicide. Havabai commenced various proceedings in an endeavour to recover the property forming part of the estate of Abdul Rahim, but on April 27, 1929, she died.

On November 14, 1931, the eldest son of Abdul Rahim, Janmahomed Abdul Rahim (who will be called "the plaintiff") attained his majority.

On March 24, 1932, an order was made by the High Court that the Court should assign the administration bond to the plaintiff, his heirs, executors or administrators, and it was further ordered that on such assignment the plaintiff, his heirs, executors or administrators should be entitled to sue on the bond in his or their name or names as if the same had been originally given to him or them, and should be entitled to recover thereon as trustee or trustees for all persons interested the full amount recoverable in respect of any breach thereof.

By a deed of assignment dated August 14, 1932, certain officers of the Court appointed for that purpose by an order of the Chief Justice purported to assign the bond to the plaintiff (the present respondent) "to hold the same unto the assignee absolutely with all such powers rights and remedies as are now subsisting thereon." The assignment was effected under s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act of 1925 which is in these terms :—

"The Court may, on application made by petition and on being satisfied that the engagement of any such bond has not been kept, and upon such terms as to security, or providing that the money received be paid into Court, or otherwise, as the Court may think fit, assign the same to some person, his executors or administrators, who shall thereupon be entitled to sue on the said bond in his or their own name or names as if the same had been originally given to him or them instead of to the

It should be added that under s. 291 every person to whom any grant of letters of administration, with an exception not material to the present purpose, is committed must give a bond to the District Judge with one or more surety or sureties engaging in the due collection and administration of the estate of the deceased. The bond is in the usual form. It is the usual practice in such a case to apply s. 292 and to cause the bond to be assigned to the intending plaintiff. It does not appear to be necessary to discuss the older practice under the Letters Patent of 1823 founding the Supreme Court of Bombay.

Viscount
Maugham

On November 2, 1932, the plaintiff (respondent) filed the present suit claiming from the defendants, the present appellants, the sum of Rs. 3,98,060, or such lesser sum as represents the loss of the estate of Abdul Rahim due to the failure of Havabai as administratrix of that estate to carry out her obligations under the administration bond. The plaint alleged four specific breaches of duty by the administratrix which can be shortly stated as follows :—

(1) The appointment of Bhatra as her attorney to manage the estate of the intestate ;

(2) allowing the sum of Rs. 50,003 shown in the inventory and accounts filed by her on June 2, 1927, as being in her hands on that date to remain in the hands of Bhatra ;

(3) the failure to realise a certain share of the intestate in the estate of his deceased father and allowing such share to remain in the hands of Bhatra ; and

(4) the failure to hand over to the Accountant General of Bombay the estate of Abdul Rahim, all his heirs being minors.

The learned trial Judge and the Appellate Court (Sir John Beaumont C. J. and Kania J.) in the course of their judgments held that on the question of limitation they were bound by the decision of the Appellate Court of Bombay in the case of Manubhai Chunilal v. The General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd.<sup>1</sup> That case related to a similar bond, similarly assigned, and the Appellate Court, Sir John Beaumont C. J. and Rangnekar J., overruling Blackwell J., decided that the defence of limitation under art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act was not available. In that case as in the present the beneficiaries at the date of the grant of letters of administration were infants, and in other respects the facts are not distinguishable from those in the present case. The question, therefore, arises whether the decision in Manubhai's case is or is not correct.

Article 68 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, is one of the series of 183 articles in a schedule which relate to the limitation of suits, appeals and applications. The articles are introduced by s. 3 in the following words :—

"Subject to the provisions contained in sections 4 to 25 (inclusive), every suit instituted, appeal preferred, and application made, after the period of limitation prescribed therefor by the first schedule shall be dismissed, although limitation has not been set up as a defence."

The provision contained in art. 68 is to the following effect :—

“On a bond subject to a condition,” the period of limitation is to be three years and the time from which the period begins to run is stated to be “when the condition is broken.”

Article 120 is stated to relate to any suit “for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere in this schedule.” The period of limitation is in that case six years and the time from which the period begins to run is “when the right to sue accrues.” The word “bond” is defined in s. 2 (3). The word is stated to include “any instrument whereby a person obliges himself to pay money to another, on condition that the obligation shall be void if a specified act is performed, or is not performed, as the case may be.” It is not in dispute that the bond in this case is a bond within the terms of that definition, and it is clear that art. 120 has no application if art. 68 applies to the present case. It may be added that s. 6 of the Act (which deals with suits by infants) clearly has no application.

Before considering the grounds on which the High Court in Manubhai's case came to the conclusion above referred to, it may be desirable to point out that a Limitation Act ought to receive such a construction as the language in its plain meaning imports. (See the decision of this Board in Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi.<sup>1</sup> As was well stated by Mr. Mitra in his Law of Limitation and Prescription (Tagore Law Lectures), 6th ed. (1932), Vol. 1, p. 256 :—

“A law of limitation and prescription may appear to operate harshly or unjustly in particular cases, but where such law has been adopted by the State . . . . it must, if unambiguous, be applied with stringency ; . . . The rule must be enforced even at the risk of hardship to a particular party. The Judge cannot, on equitable grounds, enlarge the time allowed by the law, postpone its operation, or introduce exceptions not recognised by it.”

Very little reflexion is necessary to show that great hardship may occasionally be caused by statutes of limitation in cases of poverty, distress and ignorance of rights ; yet the statutory rules must be enforced according to their ordinary meaning in these and in other like cases. Their Lordships think it is possible that sympathy for the plaintiff in the case which must now be considered was allowed to affect a pure question of construction. In the present case, however, it may be observed that an administration bond is as often assigned when persons of full age are concerned as when the beneficiaries are all of them infants ; and that such a bond is of the nature of an additional security taken by the Court for the benefit of the beneficiaries. If a right of action under the bond become statute barred by the operation of art. 68 of the Indian Limitation Act, that does not affect the rights of the beneficiaries against the administrator. While making these observations their Lordships think it right to repeat that mere considerations of hardship in such a case should not be taken into account.

In Manubhai's case Blackwell J. took the view that the bond being within the definition in the Indian Limitation Act and the action being on a bond subject to a condition, time began to run from the last date on which the condition was broken and no action could therefore be brought after the expiration of three years. In coming to this conclusion he followed the decision of the appellate Court of Rangoon in Maung San U v. Maung Kyaw Mye<sup>1</sup>. Blackwell J. in an admirable judgment dealt with the effect of an assignment of a bond under s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act and observed that in his opinion such an assignment merely deals with the question of title and confers upon the assignee a right to sue which he would otherwise not have had previously to the assignment, and that the section thus merely entitles the assignee to recover as a trustee for all persons interested the full amount recoverable under the bond in respect of any breach of it. On appeal it was not doubted that the bond was a bond upon a condition, but the Court held that a suit to enforce the bond by a person to whom it has been assigned under s. 292 was not a suit upon a bond within the meaning of the article because, it was said, the assignment confers substantive rights upon the assignee. Their Lordships, with all respect, are unable to follow this argument, nor can they agree that there is any difficulty as regards the consideration for the assignment. It is of course true that a suit by the assignee of such a bond is a suit by a person who derives title from the assignment which is authorised by the terms of s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925; but their Lordships are unable to see how this can be held to show that the action on the bond by the assignee is not a suit on a bond subject to a condition. Every valid assignment of a bond confers substantive rights upon the assignee, but those rights are not, in any case suggested to their Lordships, greater than the rights possessed by the assignor. It may be noted that the ordinary security bond which is given by receivers in India under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, O. XL, r. 3, is given to an officer of the Court (see App. F. Form No. 10); yet it has never been suggested that a suit upon such a bond, if brought by an assignee, is in any way different from an ordinary suit by the holder of a bond, the condition of which has been broken.

There were two other grounds for the conclusion of the Court. First, it was held that, assuming that art. 68 applied to the case, it was impossible to say that the condition was broken until some person who was able to give a valid discharge for the estate claimed it from the administrator or his representatives and failed to obtain it. The consequence of that view was said to be that the condition was not broken within the meaning of art. 68 until the plaintiff attained his majority which was less than three years before the suit was filed. In other words the death of the administrator was held not to put an end to his liability as regards future events. Their Lordships cannot agree. An administrator of an intestate is merely the officer of the Court in whom the deceased himself has reposed no trust. On the death of the former the estate of the intestate does not pass to his heirs or representatives and no authority whatever can be transmitted by him, nor has anyone claiming under him any right to interfere with or to complete the administration of the property of the intestate. The office comes to an end on death (if not before) and the course which should be taken when an administrator dies is to obtain a grant of administration de bonis non, and the person to whom such grant is made will be entitled to take possession of the property. It therefore seems to their Lordships impossible to hold that the administratrix in the present case could possibly have been guilty of any default or misconduct in relation to the administration after the date of her death, though, of course, her representatives would continue liable in respect of any such default or misconduct committed by her during her lifetime. It seems equally impossible to suggest that the condition of the bond could be broken by the administratrix by the default of some person in relation to the estate of the intestate after the original letters of administration had ceased to have any operation by reason of the death of the administratrix. The condition of the bond according to its terms was therefore broken at the latest on her death, that is, more than three years prior to the suit.

The other and perhaps the main ground for the conclusion of the Court in Manubhai's case was that s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act had the effect of conferring a new cause of action on the assignee, and therefore provided a fresh starting point for the purposes of limitation. If the language of s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act be examined, it is difficult to suppose that the draftsmen intended to provide for the creation of a new cause of action upon the assignment of a bond thereunder. The essential words are taken verbatim from s. 83 of the (English) Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vic. c. 77) which provides that—

"The Court may, . . . on being satisfied that the Condition of any such Bond has been broken, order One of the Registrars of the Court to assign the same to some person" . . . "and such Person, . . . shall thereupon be entitled to sue on the said Bond in his own Name, . . . as if the same had been originally given to him instead of to the Judge of the Court and shall be entitled to recover thereon as Trustee for all Persons interested the full Amount recoverable in respect of any Breach of the condition of the said Bond."

(The modern provision to the same effect is to be found in s. 167 of the Judicature Act, 1925.) It has never been suggested that under either of these sections there is upon the assignment being made a fresh cause of action. The origin of the ancient practice of requiring the administration bond to be given to the Judge of the Court of Probate (s. 81 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857) was no doubt to enable that Court to have control over all matters relating to the enforcement of such bonds. It is scarcely necessary to add that it had obviously nothing to do with the English period of limitation as regards the enforcement of such a bond which was twenty years from the breach of the condition. It seems to their Lordships that the words used in s. 292 of the Indian Succession Act like those used in s. 83 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, are far from assisting the contention that a new cause of action arises upon the assignment. The bond is assigned to a person who is thereupon to be entitled to sue on the bond in his own name "as if the same had been originally given to him, and he is to be entitled to recover thereon . . . the full amount recoverable in respect of any breach thereof." These sentences do not in the least support the view that a fresh cause of action arises and that therefore the condition of the bond is not broken for the purposes of the Indian Limitation Act until the date of the assignment. The judgments of the appellate Court of Rangoon in Maung San U. v. Maung Kyau Mye<sup>1</sup> and of Blackwell J. in Manubhai's case<sup>2</sup> are in the opinion of their Lordships correct and the decision of the Appellate Court in the latter case must be taken to be erroneous.

This view makes it unnecessary to consider any of the other questions raised on the appeal and cross-appeal. The defence of limitation under art. 68 was a good one, and the suit should have been dismissed with costs.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, that the cross-appeal should be dismissed, and that the respondent to the appeal should pay the costs here and below.

v.

THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, LAHORE.

Government of India Act, 1935 (26 Geo. V, c. 2), Sec. 205—Object of—Construction of—Whether High Court has to consider question of certificate in every case or only in cases where question of interpretation of the Act or any Order in Council arises—Direct appeal to Privy Council from High Court decree whether barred where question of certificate not considered by High Court and no certificate given—Question of certificate preferably to be considered by same bench that gave decision—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 10—Profits made by sale of securities at enhanced value, whether taxable—Profits on sale of securities by bank to meet withdrawals by depositors whether taxable—Proof of separate business in buying and selling securities whether essential.

The object of s. 205, Government of India Act, 1935, is to ensure that in every proceeding where a judgment, decree or final order is made by any High Court in British India which involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Act or any Order in Council made thereunder, the appeal, if any, that is the direct appeal, shall lie to the Federal Court. The word 'direct' is used because s. 208 makes provision for an appeal in such a case on certain conditions from a decision of the Federal Court to His Majesty in Council. The section does not provide for a case where no such certificate is given, however plain it may be that it ought to have been given. There is no provision, express or implied, taking away from His Majesty in Council the right to entertain a direct appeal in such case, and a fortiori there is nothing taking away the right of direct appeal to His Majesty in Council in a case where no substantial question of law of the character specified in the section could by any reasonable possibility arise.

The language in the latter part of sub-s. (1) of s. 205 is of a very comprehensive kind and is directory. It imposes duty on the Judges of the High Court for the purpose of ensuring that, if the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act or any Order in Council, the High Court will carry out the intention of the section by giving a certificate which will ensure that the appeal, if any, shall be to the Federal Court; but there is no condition precedent imposed on an appeal to His Majesty in Council in the absence of a certificate. The duty imposed on the Judges by words of a directory character is one which arises only in a case where there is some reasonable ground for thinking that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act or any Order in Council may be involved.

In construing s. 205, first, no question of the jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council can arise unless there is a certificate, in which case the direct appeal lies to the Federal Court; secondly, if in the absence of a certificate it appears to the Board on an appeal that there is ground for thinking that there is a matter for the consideration of the High Court and that they ought to have given or to have withheld a certificate, the Board ought to decline to hear the appeal until the High Court have had an opportunity of doing one or the other; thirdly, the cases dealt with by the section are cases where there is a reasonable possibility that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act or any Order in Council may arise, and the duty is imposed on the Judges of the High Court only in those cases.

Where s. 205 is applicable, it is the duty of the High Court to record a determination to withhold a certificate if it thinks that that is the right course. Preferably that should be done by the Judges who have heard the case, but it is not essential in every case and may sometimes be impossible.

An absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directory enactment be obeyed or fulfilled substantially. It is sufficient if the plain object of the directory provision is carried out.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Lahore.

The facts appear fully in the judgment of their Lordships.

R. W. Needham K. C. and N. E. Mustoe, for the appellant.

J. M. Millard Tucker K. C. and W. Wallach, for the respondent.

VISCOUNT MAUGHAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Judicature at Lahore, dated February 3, 1938, delivered on a reference under s. 66 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922) by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, North-West Frontier and Delhi Provinces.

The appellant (hereinafter referred to as the bank) is a joint stock company, incorporated in the year 1905, carrying on the business of banking. The objects for which the bank was established are set out in paragraph 3 of its Memorandum of Association and include—

“(A) To carry on in India and elsewhere the trade or business of banking in all its branches, and to transact and do all matters and things incidental thereto, or which may at any time hereafter be usual in connection with the business of banking or dealing in money or securities for money.”

Paragraph 82 (i) of the articles of association provides that the directors—

“may invest funds of the Company upon such securities or investments as they may think advisable; from time to time, vary such securities and investments, and convert the same, as occasion may require or as they may deem expedient, but they shall not invest or employ any part of the funds of the company in the purchase of its own shares.”

The profits of the bank derived from its business during the year 1935 were assessable to income-tax in the year 1936-37 which is the year of assessment involved in this appeal.

The High Court on February 3, 1938, decided that on the facts stated in the statement of the case drawn up by the Commissioner of Income-tax under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act a question propounded by the Commissioner must be answered in the affirmative, with the result that the amount of Rs. 1,42,588 realised by the bank on the sale in 1935 of certain securities and shares over their cost price is taxable as part of the profits or gains of the business of the bank which arose in 1935 (see s. 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act).

On June 17, 1938, the High Court certified under s. 66A of the Indian Income-tax Act on the petition of the bank that the case was a fit case for appeal to His Majesty in Council. As it happened the two learned Judges who gave this certificate were those who heard and decided the case on February 3, 1938.

On the appeal coming on for hearing before their Lordships a preliminary objection to the appeal was taken which has been elaborately argued, and it seems desirable in the first place to deal with this objection. It is based on the contention that no direct appeal now lies to His Majesty in Council from any judgment, decree or final order made by any High Court in British India unless that Court has recorded that it withholds the giving of a certificate that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act, 1935, is involved. That is said to be the effect of s. 205 of the Act, and reliance is placed on a decision of their Lordships in a recent case which must be considered later. Section 205 is in the following terms :—

“(1) An appeal shall lie to the Federal Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in British India, if the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Act or any Order in Council made thereunder, and it shall be the duty of every High Court in British India to consider in every case whether or not any such question is involved and of its own motion to give or withhold a certificate accordingly.

“(2) Where such a certificate is given, any party in the case may appeal to the Federal Court on the ground that any such question as aforesaid has been wrongly decided, and on any ground on which that party could have appealed without special leave to His Majesty in Council if no such certificate had been given, and, with the leave of the Federal Court, on any other ground, and no direct appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council, either with or without special leave.”

The object of this section is plain. It is to ensure that in every proceeding where a judgment, decree or final order is made by any High Court in British India which involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Act or any Order in Council made thereunder (which for brevity will be referred to hereafter as the “specified question of law”), the appeal, if any, that is the direct appeal, shall lie to the Federal Court. The word “direct” is used because s. 208 makes provision for an appeal in such a case on certain conditions from a decision of the Federal Court to His Majesty in Council; but nothing turns on this for the present purpose.

The means adopted in the section to carry out the above object are these :

(1) The appeal is stated to lie to the Federal Court if the High Court certifies that the specified question of law is involved and is a substantial question. (2) A duty is imposed on the High Court of its own motion to give or to withhold a certificate that the specified question of law, being a substantial question, is involved. This part of sub-s. (1) contains some other important words which will be considered later. (3) Where such a certificate is given, any party in the case may appeal to the Federal Court on defined grounds [sub-s. (2)]. (4) Where such a certificate is given, no (direct) appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council even with special leave [sub-s. (2)].

It is clear that the section does not provide for a case where no such certificate is given, however plain it may be that it ought to have been given. There is no provision, express or implied, taking away from His Majesty in Council the right to entertain a direct appeal in such case, and a fortiori there is nothing taking away the right of direct appeal to His Majesty in Council in a case where no substantial question of law of the specified character could by any reasonable possibility arise.

What then is the position if it becomes manifest to the Board that, by some mischance or inadvertence or forgetfulness, the High Court has neglected its duty under the latter part of sub-s. (1) to give a certificate in a case where the specified question of law is or may reasonably be involved?

It is plain that it is for the High Court, not this Board, to determine whether the question is involved and if so whether it is substantial. In such an event although the jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council has not been affected, since there has been no certificate, nevertheless there has been a dereliction of duty by the High Court, and the Board, in accordance with the principles on which it is accustomed to act in tendering advice to His Majesty, would not think it right to hear the appeal until a proper certificate has been obtained or it is on record that a certificate has been withheld.

The precise event in fact happened in the recent case of Errol Mackay v. Oswald Forbes.<sup>1</sup> It seemed to the Board that a question of interpretation arose under an Order in Council made by virtue of s. 293 of the Government of India Act, 1935. There was no certificate by the High Court. It was suggested by counsel for the appellants that the Court might have considered s. 205 and might have decided to withhold a certificate, though that decision was not expressed. Their Lordships expressed the view that this was unlikely in that case, and in the absence of a certificate they thought that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. They added, however, that if the High Court should thereafter make an order withholding a certificate under s. 205, the appellants were to be at liberty to apply to His Majesty in Council to have the appeal restored.

Their Lordships are of opinion that this order was perfectly correct, not because s. 205 took away the jurisdiction in a strict sense of His Majesty in Council, but for the more general reason indicated above. They will add that the course taken of dismissing the appeal was no doubt to some extent due to the circumstance that the Board entertained little doubt that the certificate would be given. If the case had been one in which there was a real doubt whether the certificate would be given or withheld, a more lenient course might have been taken, and the appeal might have been directed to stand over until the High Court had either given a certificate or decided to withhold it.

It remains to consider what the position is and what course should be taken by the Board when the appeal is from the High Court and no such specified question of law can with any reasonable probability be thought to be involved, and where, not unnaturally, the High Court have neither granted a certificate nor recorded that a certificate is withheld. The first question here is whether in such a case s. 205 applies at all, and; at this point it is necessary to examine the language in the latter part of sub-s. (1) in order to determine the nature of the duty imposed upon the High Court. The language is of a very comprehensive kind. The duty is to be that of "every High Court in British India." It is to consider "in every case" whether or not the specified question is involved. And finally the Court is "of its own motion" to give or to withhold a certificate accordingly. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that this part of sub-s. (1) is directory in the sense in which that word is used in the wellknown distinction between enactments or phrases in them which are mandatory or absolute and those which are merely directory. There are several reasons for this conclusion: first, the object of s. 205 is as above stated, secondly, the circumstances that the duty is imposed on the Judges of the High Court, persons occupying positions of great importance and dignity to whom mandatory clauses would not be addressed without strong reason, thirdly, that, in fact, there is no provision whatever for imposing any penalty or deprivation of right on a litigant, if the High Court should neglect to comply with its judicial duty as laid down in the section. In other words, the duty is imposed on the Judges for the purpose of ensuring that, if the case involves the specified question of law, the High Court will carry out the intention of the section by giving a certificate which will ensure that the appeal, if any, shall be to the Federal Court; but there is no condition precedent imposed on an appeal to His Majesty in Council in the absence of a certificate. The responsible persons—in this case the Judges of the High Court—may be "blameable"—as Lord Blackburn observed in the instructive case of Justices of Middlesex v. The Queen<sup>1</sup>—but third parties have nothing to do with that.

If the sentence imposing the duty is only directory, as their Lordships think is clear for the reasons stated, an important consequence follows. It is a well settled general rule that "an absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directory enactment be obeyed or fulfilled substantially" [Woodward v. Sarsons<sup>2</sup>; see also Earl of Mountcashell v. Viscount O'Neill<sup>3</sup>]. It is sufficient if the plain object of the directory provision is carried out [Walter v. Rumbal<sup>4</sup> and Jarvis v. Hemmings<sup>5</sup>]. If these principles are applied in the present case, it will be apparent that the following alternative view arises: either s. 205 in imposing on the High Court the duty of giving or withholding a certificate is doing so only in cases where there is a reasonable possibility that the specified question arises or may arise, or, alternatively, the duty is one which need only be complied with in such a case. It is plain that in the vast majority of cases no such question can arise. It seems to their Lordships most difficult to believe that the legislature was intending to lay on the Judges of every High Court an obligation as part of their judicial duties to record their intention to "withhold" a certificate in such cases as an ordinary judgment on a criminal trial or in a libel action or a decree or judgment in an every-day case for the recovery of a trifling sum of money, for example, in a normal action for a debt. Their first duty is "to consider"; but only it would seem when there is in fact something to consider. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the duty imposed on the Judges by words of a directory character is one which arises only in a case where there is some reasonable ground for thinking that the specified question may be involved.

The conclusions on this matter of the construction of s. 205 are accordingly these : First, no question of the jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council can arise unless there is a certificate, in which case the direct appeal lies to the Federal Court. Secondly, if in the absence of a certificate it appears to the Board on an appeal that there is ground for thinking that there is a matter for the consideration of the High Court and that they ought to have given or to have withheld a certificate, the Board ought to decline to hear the appeal until the High Court have had an opportunity of doing one or the other. Thirdly, the section on its true construction is dealing only with cases where there is a reasonable possibility that the specified question may arise, and the duty is imposed on the Judges of the High Court only in those cases.

Their Lordships desire to add that the case of Errol Mackay v. Oswald Forbes<sup>1</sup> related to a case within the second of these propositions. The remarks of the Board as regards the duties of the Judges of the High Court must be read as confined to cases of the nature which arose in that case ; and in that connexion reference may be made to the remarks of Lord Halsbury in Quinn v. Leathem<sup>2</sup> that every judgment must be read as applicable to "the particular facts proved or assumed to be proved since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed or qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found." It may be well to add that their Lordships do not differ from the opinion expressed in that case as to the duty of the Judges of the High Court in a case to which the section is applicable to record a determination to withhold a certificate if they think that is the right course. Preferably that should be done by the Judges who have heard the case ; but it is not essential in every case and may sometimes be impossible, for example, when there are two Judges and they differ on the question whether the certificate should be given or withheld. It may be noted that in the Errol Mackay case<sup>1</sup> their Lordships provided for the event of the High Court making an order at some later date withholding the certificate in question, and that order doubtless could be made by Judges other than those who delivered the original judgment.

It follows from the above observations that the preliminary objection fails, since in the present case there is no possible ground for thinking that any question, still less a substantial one, as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act, 1935, can be involved.

Two other matters were argued on the preliminary objection, first, whether a decision on a reference under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act is "a judgment, decree, or final order" within the meaning of those words in s. 205 ; secondly, whether the certificate given as above mentioned on June 17, 1935, under s. 66A of the Indian Income-tax Act is not a sufficient proof that the certificate under s. 205 of the Government of India Act (if the section was applicable) had been withheld. On these two questions their Lordships do not think it necessary to express any opinion.

Coming now to the appeal by the bank, it may be observed that the High Court rightly appreciated that the question was ultimately one of fact to be decided on the findings of the Commissioner under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, and that the appellant bank had to establish either that the Commissioner had misdirected himself on some question of law or that there was no sufficient evidence to justify his findings. Their Lordships note that the High Court, in deciding that neither of these points had been made good, examined and considered a number of cases most of which related to insurance companies and banks. Their Lordships do not propose to attempt to reconcile all these decisions and the various dicta which are to be found in the reports of them, which might indeed prove to be an impossible task; and they will add that the cases relating to insurance companies largely turn on the nature of the insurance business actually carried on and the way in which reserve funds have been set aside and dealt with.

In the present case it appears that on December 31, 1934, the value of the investments of the bank amounted to Rs. 50,88,550, mainly held in Indian Government securities which, being readily saleable, could if necessary be promptly realised in order to pay claims. During the year 1935 some ten lacs of these Government securities and some shares were sold, and the profit made taking the differences between the cost price of the investments and the prices at which they were sold was Rs. 1,42,588. The grounds on which the bank contends that the profit of Rs. 1,42,588 made on the sale of some of its securities in the year 1935 does not form part of the profits of its business of banking are succinctly stated thus, in the statement of the case: That the bank had treated the investments in shares and securities as a reserve for emergencies and had resorted to their sale in the accounting period 1935 because they had in that year to meet heavy withdrawals of deposits and to deposit Rs. 2,66,000 with the Reserve Bank of India under the provisions of s. 42(1) of the Reserve Bank of India Act, 1934 (No. 11 of 1934). The bank claimed also that it did not "deal in shares and securities" and that therefore the profit made by the sale of shares and securities was not taxable.

In the statement the Commissioner finds that up to 1933 there was no sale of securities. The first sale took place on November 30, 1934. On the other hand, he declines to accept the contention that the bank had to sell the securities in order to meet heavy withdrawals of deposits and to make the compulsory deposit with the Reserve Bank of India. He states from an examination of the books that it is clear that the profits realized by selling shares and securities were utilized in increasing the reserves. A general view of the financial position since 1932 as on December 31 of each year can be gathered from a table contained in the statement which is as follows:—

It is apparent that the decrease of deposits in the year 1935 as compared with the previous year is roughly five per cent. while the decrease in investments as between the two years is more than twenty per cent. So far from there being a finding that the sales of shares and securities were due to any special emergency, the Commissioner says that it is apparent that the bank had been selling the shares and securities in order to take full advantage of the high prices prevailing in 1935. He was of opinion that the bank had been "carrying on business in shares and securities since the closing months of 1934." This may well be the correct view and a sufficient ground for dismissing this appeal; but their Lordships do not wish to give any support to the contention that in order to render taxable profits realised on sales of investments in such a case as that before them it is necessary to establish that the tax-payer has been carrying on what may be called a separate business either of buying or selling investments or of merely realising them.

The principle to be applied in such a case is now well settled. It was admirably stated in a Scottish case, Californian Copper Syndicate (Limited and Reduced) v. Harris<sup>1</sup> and the statement has been more than once approved both in the House of Lords and in the Judicial Committee. [See for example Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, Limited.<sup>2</sup>] Some dicta which appear to support the view that it is necessary to prove that the tax-payer has carried on a separate or severable business of buying and selling investments with a view to profit in order to establish that profits made on the sale of investments are taxable, for example, the dicta in the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. The Scottish Automobile and General Insurance Co., Ltd.<sup>3</sup> cannot now be relied on. It is well established to cite the exact words used in the Californian Copper case<sup>4</sup> (p. 166):—

"...that enhanced values obtained from realisation or conversion of securities may be so assessable, where what is done is not merely a realization or change of investment, but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business."

In the ordinary case of a bank, the business consists in its essence of dealing with money and credit. Numerous depositors place their money with the bank often receiving a small rate of interest on it. A number of borrowers receive loans of a large part of these deposited funds at somewhat higher rates of interest. But the banker has always to keep enough cash or easily realisable securities to meet any probable demand by the depositors. No doubt there will generally be loans to persons of undoubted solvency which can quickly be called in, but it may be very undesirable to use this second line of defence. If as in the present case some of the securities of the bank are realised in order to meet withdrawals by depositors, it seems to their Lordships to be quite clear that this is a normal step in carrying on the banking business, or, in other words, that it is an act done in "what is truly the carrying on" of the banking business.

This, it appears to their Lordships, is the more appropriate and satisfactory ground for dealing with the question arising in the present case. It accords exactly with one of the findings in the statement of the Commissioner agreeing with the views both of the Income-tax Officer who first dealt with the case and the Assistant Commissioner. He observed "that the purchase and sale of shares and securities are so much linked with the deposits and withdrawals of clients that with the existing articles of Association the purchase and sale of shares and securities are as much part of the assessee's business as receiving deposits from clients and paying them off are, and therefore, the profits which arise from the former transactions are as much business profits as the profits arising from the latter transactions are."

There can be no doubt that there is ample evidence to justify this view, and in their Lordships' opinion, as in that of the High Court, it is sufficient to dispose of this appeal.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 11, Sch. II, para. 20—Court declining jurisdiction—Reason for such decision whether binding as res judicata—Indian Registration Act (XVI of 1908), Sec. 17(1)(b)—Award—"Ownership", interpretation of—Compulsory registration of award.

A Court which declines jurisdiction cannot bind the parties by its reasons for declining jurisdiction : such reasons are not decisions, and are certainly not decisions by a Court of competent jurisdiction. On a dispute as to the jurisdiction of a Court to try an issue, the Court, by its reasons for holding that it had no jurisdiction, cannot, upon the principle of res judicata, decide and bind the parties upon the very issue which it was incompetent to try.

Hence, a decision by the High Court that no Court in the province had jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the award within the meaning of para. 20 of sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, which applies the test whether it would have had jurisdiction to try the suit in which the relief claimed was the relief granted by the award, and in so doing construes the award, such construction is not res judicata between the parties on the question of the true construction of the award.

The respondent advanced in 1912 a sum of Rs. 50,000 to the appellant for the purpose of partially clearing of incumbrances on a village upon the term that he should have the option to acquire a half share in the village in lieu of the repayment of his loan. The option was exercised in 1914 and the respondent thenceforward enjoyed a half-share of the profits of the village, but no conveyance was executed. Differences having arisen between the parties, a reference was made to arbitrators, who awarded payment of Rs. 61,400 by the appellant to the respondent, and directed: "The ownership of the second party [i.e. respondent] in one-half of...[the] property shall not cease till after the above sum...be fully paid up." A question having arisen whether the award was compulsorily registrable under s. 17 (1) (b) of the Indian Registration Act, 1908:—

Held, (1) that the aforesaid provision was not framed as one which purported to create or confer an interest in immovable property; but it was framed on the assumption that an interest was already in existence and provided that that existence should not cease until a specified event had happened;

(2) that the mere use of the word "ownership" could not outweigh the consideration that the whole wording of the sentence pointed to the continuance of the status quo, and not to the creation of a new condition of affairs:

(3) that the award did not purport or operate to create, declare or assign any right, title or interest in the village, and therefore did not require registration under s. 17 (1) (b) of the Indian Registration Act, 1908.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and order of the High Court of Judicature at Patna, dated September 28, 1936, which reversed the judgment and order of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Patna, dated February 12, 1935, and directed that a private award be filed and made a decree of the Court.

Het Lal and others (respondents Nos. 1-3) were the sons and respondent No. 4 the grandson of one Ishwari Prasad who died in October, 1924.

In 1908 Upendra Nath Bose (appellant) purchased in execution sale the proprietary right in village Raitar in the Patna district subject to incumbrances. In 1912 Ishwari Prasad advanced Rs. 50,000 to the appellant, who was a close friend, to be applied in clearing the incumbrances, with the option to him to become the appellant's co-sharer in the village to the extent of one half share. In 1914 Ishwari Prasad decided to exercise the option, and, though no conveyance was executed, from then until his death he enjoyed a half share of the profits of the village and took part in its management.

After Ishwari's death in 1924, the appellant at the respondents' request made a written declaration dated April 26, 1925, of his position in relation to Raitar village, stating that as between himself and Ishwari Prasad the village had been provisionally valued at Rs. 1,34,000 and expressing his willingness, once the accounts had been made up, to "execute such proper instrument as you may unanimously wish or in case of difference of opinion among you as a person you refer (to?) may reasonably require" and undertaking in the meantime to administer the village and divide the profits in accordance with rules which had been drawn up by himself and Ishwari Prasad.

In October, 1925, the respondents referred to private arbitration matters arising in the administration of Ishwari Prasad's estate. In their award dated February 13, 1926, the arbitrators gave effect to an agreement reached between the respondents that the village in question should be held jointly by, all but managed by one of the respondents under the appellant's direction and that, should such arrangement prove impracticable, the appellant "will have the first refusal of the lease or purchase of the property."

On the application of respondent No. 4, the said award was on August 6, 1927, followed by a decree of Court in accordance with it.

On April 3, 1928, the appellant of the first part and the respondents of the second part referred to the private arbitration of two named arbitrators differences which had arisen between them "regarding the accounts and transfer of Raitar property." As regards the transfer questions had been raised as to the form which the transfer should take, whether it should be a transfer in favour of the respondents jointly or in favour of each of the respondents severally in respect of the share to which each was entitled, on what terms the transfer should be made or whether the respondents should relinquish their moiety in favour of the appellant and if so for what consideration. There was also a question outstanding whether, in view of a will executed by Ishwari Prasad, which had not however been admitted to probate, the transfer should be in favour of the executors or in favour of the respondents as Ishwari Prasad's heirs.

On August 1, 1930, the arbitrators made their award as follows :—

(1) That the amounts specified in the statement of accounts passed by us attached hereto and marked as Exhibit B should be paid with interest at eight annas per cent. per month within three months of to-day after which period the rate of interest shall be 10 annas per cent. per month on any balance unpaid till the amounts are fully paid up.

(2) That Babu Upendra Nath Basu requested us that instead of transferring the above said Raitar property to the second party he may be allowed to pay any sum fixed by us in lieu thereof so as to save the property from being ruined and we were asked by the parties to fix the sum so to be paid by the first party to the second party. We accordingly direct that the said Babu Upendra Nath Basu do pay rupees fifteen thousand, three hundred and fifty to each of the four gentlemen of the second party, that is to say, a total sum of rupees sixty-one thousand and four hundred as the equivalent of the share of the second party in the said property, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum accruing from the first of October, 1930. If the said amount is not paid by the first of October, 1931, the rate of interest thereafter shall be seven and a half per cent. per annum on the whole or any balance left unpaid.

The ownership of the second party in one half of Raitar property shall not cease till after the above sum of rupees sixty-one thousand and four hundred as well as the amounts mentioned in the statement Exhibit B together with interest specified in respect of both be fully paid up.

The registration of the award was effected on August 14, 1930, before the Sub-registrar of Benares in the United Provinces. It was registered in Book 4, the "miscellaneous register," instead of in Book 1, which is the register of non-testamentary documents relating to immoveable property. The registration failed to comply with the statute in respect also that whereas the award fell to be registered under s. 28 "in the office of the sub-registrar within whose sub-district the whole or some portion of the property to which such document relates is situated," the office of the sub-registrar of Benares did not satisfy this requirement in relation to village Raitar.

On January 10, 1931, respondent No. 1 applied under para. 20 of sch. II. of the Code of Civil Procedure before the Subordinate Judge of Benares that the award be filed in Court, making the appellant and respondents Nos. 2-4 defendants in "the suit."

On January 9, 1932, the Subordinate Judge, treating the award as one for the payment of money by the appellant to the respondents and conceiving himself to be entitled to treat as a nullity that part of which defined the rights of the parties in Raitar, ordered the award to be filed.

The appellant appealed to the High Court of Allahabad.

King and Niamatullah JJ. heard the appeal and on March 2, 1933, reversed the order of the Subordinate Judge. They directed therefore that the application for filing the award be returned to respondent No. 1.

On March 10, 1933, respondent No. 1 made an application in the form of a plaint before the Second Subordinate Judge of Patna, making the appellant and respondents Nos. 2-4, who had refused to join him in the application, defendants.

The trial Judge held that the effect of the second sub-para. of para. 2 of the award was to declare the legal ownership of the respondents in one moiety of Raitar and that the registration of that part of the award was compulsory; that its registration in Benares was no registration in the eye of the law; and that the consequences of non-registration were those enjoined by s. 49 of the Indian Registration Act, namely, that the award could not be received as evidence of any transaction affecting Raitar.

Respondent No. 1 appealed to the High Court at Patna. A bench of the High Court, consisting of Khwaja Mahamad Noor and Madan JJ., heard the appeal, and on September 28, 1936, Madan J. delivered the judgment of the Court allowing it. The order of the Additional Subordinate Judge was set aside, the appeal was allowed and the award was ordered to be filed and made a decree of Court.

There was an appeal to His Majesty in Council.

J. M. Pringle, for the appellant.

W. Wallace, for the respondent.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. This is an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Patna by which it was ordered that the award hereinafter mentioned should be filed and made a decree of the Court.

The relevant facts leading up to this litigation are as follows :—

The appellant, one Upendra Nath Bose, had in the year 1908 purchased in execution sale the proprietary right in the village Raitar in the Patna district subject to incumbrances. In the year 1912 his friend, Ishwari Prasad, advanced to him a sum of Rs. 50,000 for the purpose of partially clearing off the incumbrances and upon the terms that he should have an option to acquire a half share in the village in lieu of the repayment of his loan. This option he exercised in or about the year 1914. No conveyance was executed; the matter continued to rest on contract, but thenceforward he enjoyed a half share of the profits of the village.

This state of affairs continued until the death of Ishwari which occurred in the year 1924. He left him surviving three sons, viz., the respondents Het Lall, Debi Prasad, and Shyam Lall, and a grandson the respondent Prabhakar Prakash.

On April 26, 1925, the appellant executed a document addressed to the respondents in which he set out the facts relating to Ishwari's loan, and his half interest in the village. The appellant also stated his willingness to account, and that he claimed no personal interest in more than half the estate. Clause 6 of this document ran thus :—

" I also hereby agree that as soon as accounts are made up and settled I shall execute such proper instrument as you may unanimously wish, or in case of difference of opinion among you, as the person you refer may reasonably require."

Ultimately the parties referred to two arbitrators differences which had arisen, as stated in the agreement of reference, " regarding the accounts and transfer of Raitar property." In the course of the arbitration it was suggested and agreed between the parties that a sum should be fixed upon the payment of which the respondents should have no claim to share in the village. This course was adopted by the arbitrators, who made their award on August 1, 1930. By paragraph 1 thereof they dealt with the accounts between the parties, finding the amounts due and directing payment with interest. By paragraph 2 they dealt with " the transfer of Raitar property," in the following terms :—

" (2) That Babu Upendra Nath Basu requested us that instead of transferring the above said Raitar property to the second party he may be allowed to pay any sum fixed by us in lieu thereof so as to save the property from being ruined and we were asked by the parties to fix the sum to be so paid by the first party to the second party. We accordingly direct that the said Babu Upendra Nath Basu do pay rupees fifteen thousand, three hundred and fifty to each of the four gentlemen of the second party, that is to say a total sum of rupees sixty-one thousand and four hundred as the equivalent of the share of the second party in the said property, with interest at six per cent. per annum accruing from the first of October 1930. If the said amount is not paid by the first of October 1931, the rate of interest thereafter shall be seven and a half per cent. per annum on whole or any balance left unpaid.

The award was registered before the sub-registrar of Benares, and in Book 4. It is conceded that this registration was made before the official of the wrong district and entered in the wrong book, with the result (which is common ground) that the award has never been registered at all.

In January, 1931, the respondent Het Lall applied, under paragraph 20 of schedule II of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the Subordinate Judge of Benares that the award be filed in Court, making the appellant and the other respondents parties as defendants to that application. Under paragraph 20 the application must be made to " any Court having jurisdiction over the subject matter of the award." The Subordinate Judge made the order ; but on appeal to the High Court at Allahabad this order was reversed, as being made " without jurisdiction " on the ground that proceedings for filing the award could be instituted only in a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the Raitar village was situated.

The respondent Het Lall then, on March 10, 1933, initiated the present proceedings in the form of a plaint before the Second Subordinate Judge of Patna, to which the appellant and the other respondents were joined as defend-

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the application; but on an appeal by the respondent Het Lall to the High Court at Patna, the order of the Subordinate Judge was set aside, and the award was ordered to be filed and made a decree of Court.

The point at issue on the appeal by the appellant to His Majesty in Council can now be stated.

It was contended by the appellant that upon its true construction the award was, within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (b) of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, a non-testamentary instrument which purported or operated to create, declare assign limit or extinguish a right title or interest of the value of one hundred rupees or upwards to or in immoveable property; and that since it had not been registered, then by s. 49 of the same Act it was incapable of affecting the immoveable property in question or of being received in evidence of any transaction affecting that property, with the consequence that the award was incapable of being filed in Court and of having judgment pronounced and decree passed according to it.

The point, it will be noted, is whether upon its true construction that part of the award which deals with the village Raitar falls within the description of non-testamentary instruments contained in s. 17 (1) (b) of the Indian Registration Act. Sections 17 (1) (b) and 49 of that Act are framed thus :—

“17. (1) The following documents shall be registered, if the property to which they relate is situate in a district in which, and if they have been executed on or after the date on which, Act No. XVI of 1864, or the Indian Registration Act, 1866, or the Indian Registration Act, 1871, or the Indian Registration Act, 1877, or this Act came or comes into force, namely :—

(b) other non-testamentary instruments which purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, to or in immoveable property ;

* * * * *

49. No document required by section 17 or by any provision of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, to be registered shall—

(a) affect any immoveable property comprised therein, or
(b) confer any power to adopt, or
(c) be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property, or conferring such power, unless it has been registered :”

The question resolves itself into this :—whether by the last sentence of paragraph 2 of the award the arbitrators purport to confer upon “ the second party ” a right title or interest to or in one-half of the village, which commences with the award and comes to an end when the sum of Rs. 61,400 with interest has been paid, or whether they intend merely to provide that the status quo (i.e., the contractual interest which arose from the exercise of the option) should remain unaltered until the Rs. 61,400 and interest had been paid.

In their Lordships’ opinion the latter is the true view. The sentence is not framed as one which purports to create or confer an interest. It is framed on the assumption that an interest is already in existence, and provides that that existence shall not cease until a specified event has happened. It is true that the interest is called "ownership," while the existing interest of the second party was merely contractual, but the arbitrators were not lawyers but laymen, to whom the rights in respect of the village which were being exchanged or released for cash, might well appear to be not inaccurately described as an ownership which has not to cease until the cash was paid. However that may be, the mere use of the word "ownership" cannot in their Lordships' opinion outweigh the consideration that the whole wording of the sentence points to the continuance of a status quo, and not to the creation of a new condition of affairs.

The award did not purport or operate to create, declare or assign any right, title or interest in the village, and therefore did not require registration under the Act.

A further contention, however, was raised by the appellant, of this nature. Assuming, it was argued, that upon its true construction the award did not purport or operate to create, declare or assign a right title or interest in the village, nevertheless as between the appellant and respondents it must be taken that it did, because the matter of the true construction of the award was res judicata between them.

The foundation for this argument is the decision before referred to of the Allahabad High Court, that the Courts of that Province had no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the award within the meaning of paragraph 20 of sch. II of the Code of Civil Procedure. Undoubtedly in order to test whether the Benares Court had jurisdiction to order the filing of the award, the Judges applied the test whether it would have had jurisdiction to try a suit in which the relief claimed was the relief granted by the award. For the purpose of this test, they construed the award as an award which "did determine that the heirs of Ishwari Prasad had a legal title to half share in the Raitar property which they were entitled to retain until the receipt of specified sums of money"; and they held that just as the Benares Court would have had no jurisdiction to try a suit claiming that relief, since the village was outside the local limits of its jurisdiction, so it had no jurisdiction to order the filing of the award.

It must, however, be borne in mind that the construction of the award was not an issue in the proceedings; it was merely a ground upon which the Court based their decision upon the question which was the issue between the parties, viz., whether the Benares Court had jurisdiction to order that the award be filed and be made an order of Court.

No case for holding that the matter of the construction of the award is res judicata between the appellant and respondents can be based upon s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Indeed this was conceded by counsel for the appellant, who based his case in this regard upon what he termed the general principles of res judicata. But it is difficult to see how those general principles can be applicable to the facts of the present case. The res judicata here was the lack of jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge of Benares, and of the High Court at Allahabad on appeal therefrom—not the reason for that decision. A Court which declines jurisdiction cannot bind the parties

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Arts. 106, 120, 123, and 144—Administration suit—Suit by Mahomedan heir against his co-heirs—Limitation—Immoveable property governed by Art. 144—Moveable property governed by Art. 120—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908) O. I, r. 10—Discretion of Court to add party—Death of defendant having some interest as plaintiff—His heir not brought on record within time—Whether administration suit abates.

Article 106 or art. 123 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, does not apply to a suit for administration brought against Mahomedan co-heirs by a person entitled to part of the interest of an heir. Such a suit is governed as regards immoveable property by art. 144 and as regards moveables by art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, because the heirs of a Mahomedan succeed to his estate in specific shares as tenants-in-common.

Under O. I, r. 10, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, the Court has discretion to add as a party to a suit the representative of a person against whom the suit has abated for the purpose of giving effect to the rights of the parties. Where a Mahomedan brings a suit against his co-heirs for administering the property that has come to their hands, and one of the defendants, who has the same interest and is in the same position as that of the plaintiff, dies, but no application is made by the plaintiff to bring his heir on record, the suit does not come to an end by reason of abatement as against the deceased defendant.

In a suit for administration a particular interest may not be represented before decree, but such interest is either provided for by the decree, or is asserted at a later stage under the decree, or is given effect by a party being permitted to attend certain accounts and enquiries so as to be bound by the result.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay (Beaumont C. J. and Rangnekar J.) dated September 8, 1936, reversing the judgment and decree passed by Barlee J., dated February 17, 1936.

One Esmailji died leaving his widow Jelumboo, and two sons, Ebrahimji and Sarafally, and two daughters, Sakinaboo and Amtoolaboo.

Ebrahimji and Sarafally were jointly carrying on business in Bombay. The two brothers were living together and owned some properties at Kapadvanj in the Kaira District. Out of the profits of their business they had purchased one property in Samuel Street, Bombay. In 1904 Ebrahimji died leaving his widow Fatmabai, a son who was born after his death, and two daughters, Khatizabai and Safiabai. After the death of Ebrahimji one more property was purchased in Abdul Rehman Street, Bombay, out of the profits of the business.

In 1912 Jelumboo, the widow of Esmailji, died.

In 1920 Amtoolaboo, the younger daughter of Esmailji, died leaving two daughters Safiabai (plaintiff) and Asmabai (defendant No. 8).

The plaintiff, Safiabai, filed this suit to assert her rights in the estate of Ebrahimji alleging that Jelumboo had a one-sixth share in the estate of her son Ebrahimji and that she was one of the heirs of Jelumboo.

Defendants Nos. 1 to 5 were the representatives of Ebrahimji and they resisted the claim of the plaintiff on the grounds, that the suit was barred by limitation, that it abated under O. XXII, r. 4, of the Civil Procedure Code, as the heirs of Sakinaboo, another daughter of Jelumboo (defendant No. 7) who died in 1932, were not brought on record within the time limited by law, and that the plaintiff was estopped as her predecessors-in-title had not put forward their claim in another suit based on a partition deed.

Defendant No. 6 was the daughter of Ebrahimji.

Defendants Nos. 9 to 16 were Sarafally's heirs.

Defendants Nos. 6 to 16 supported the plaintiff's claim.

Barlee J. dismissed the suit on February 17, 1936, holding that the plaintiff's claim was barred by limitation. The following is his Lordship's judgment.—

BARLEE J. Two brothers, Ebrahimji Esmailji Bhagat and Sarafally Emailji Bhagat, were joint owners of some immoveable property at Kapadvanj, and partners in a shop in Bombay. Ebrahimji died in 1904 leaving heirs, his mother, widow and children. His estate consisted of an undivided share of the immoveables, including a house which the brothers had bought in Samuel Street, Bombay, and a share in the business (net) assets.

Sarafally remained in sole possession of the shop—with which only I have to deal. It prospered. His mother Jelumboo lived with him till she died in 1912. Her heirs were her son Sarafally and two daughters. Sarafally died in 1924.

A few months before he died he made an arrangement with three of the surviving heirs of Ebrahimji (Ebrahimji's widow, son and daughter) regarding the business. The document (exhibit B) is called a partition deed. In fact it is a declaration of the shares of the parties to it in the property

 ———
 "that the moveable and immoveable properties which appertain to the firm which is being carried on in the name of Ebrahimji Esmailji Bhagat and which are joint and in the possession and belong to us the two parties and in which No. 1 out of us has a share consisting of ten annas in the rupee and No. 2 has a share consisting of six annas in the rupee" etc.

Barles J.
 Sarafally died in 1924 and his nine heirs entered into an agreement with Kikabhai, his mother and sister, by which the latter party agreed to buy the house in Abdul Rehman Street, and the heirs of Sarafally bought the business and other property.

Effect was given to this agreement by a consent decree in C. S. No. 4352 of 1924.

Another suit followed in 1926 between Kikabhai son of Ebrahimji and his sisters—their mother being dead. The result was that his sister Safiabai took Rs. 51,500 and gave up all her claims to the property which had come to them in 1924.

The plaintiff now claims as heir of Jelumboo a share of the property which came to Kikabhai, his mother and sister in 1924. She is a daughter of Amtoolaboo, second daughter of Jelumboo. She joined as defendants, Kikabhai, son of Ebrahimji, and the other surviving heirs of Ebrahimji (defendants Nos. 1 to 6), the heirs of Sarafally (defendants Nos. 9 to 16), and the only surviving heir of Jelumboo (defendant No. 7). Defendant No. 8 is plaintiff's sister.

The most important issue in the case is that of limitation. To decide it I must discover the legal position of the plaintiff and of her mother Jelumboo. On the death of Ebrahimji, Jelumboo became entitled as an heir to one-sixth of his estate, including the shop. She was not a partner in his business but a creditor of Sarafally the sole surviving partner. She was entitled to a one-sixth share of the moveable and immoveable property of the deceased and to a one-sixth share of his share in the assets of the firm. I am not now concerned with anything except the claim to a share in the firm. Her right may have included a right to a share of the profits of the firm after Ebrahimji's death, but this is immaterial for by art. 106 of the Indian Limitation Act her claim was time-barred after three years, and by s. 28 her right was extinguished.

Mr. Somjee, however, has pleaded that this is immaterial since the estate of Ebrahimji was subsequently partitioned and his client is claiming her share of the estate of Ebrahimji in the hands of his other heirs, and is entitled to claim it as a tenant-in-common with them, now that it has been ascertained. He contends that Sarafally held the property up to his death as a co-owner, and that his possession was not adverse to the heirs of Ebrahimji, who were tenants-in-common with him since no act of ouster has been proved. In the same way, he pleads, defendants Nos. 1 to 5 are holding Ebrahimji's estate as tenants-in-common for and on behalf of themselves and the other heirs of Ebrahimji.

This argument would be unimpeachable were the plaintiff claiming the real estate in which Ebrahimji had a share. But his share in the business was personalty and there are no 'estates' in personalty. His right was a share of the net assets on dissolution and his heirs had no higher right. There was no equitable conversion, and the actual conversion which occurred in or about 1917 did not benefit the plaintiff, firstly, because it did not alter the nature of her right—she could not have been forced to take a share of the house property in lieu of her money claim, and, secondly, because Jelumboo's right had already been extinguished. Again each heir had an individual right to a share of the assets of the firm and not a joint right. What defendants Nos. 1 to 5 got, therefore, was in lieu of their own share and not on behalf of other heirs.

Mr. Somjee has relied on certain passages in the agreements B and C and the proceedings in the suits of 1924 and 1926. I can find no admission of plaintiff's claim which can help her. Even if the agreements had contained acknowledgments, the bar of limitation would not have been removed since the period of limitation had expired long before 1923; and as she was not a party to any of the proceedings, she cannot plead a contract valid under s. 25 of the Indian Limitation Act.

My finding then is that the plaintiff's claim is barred by time.

My finding on issue No. 1 is in the negative. This has already been decided in my previous order.

My finding on issue No. 3 is that the plaintiff is not estopped by conduct, but that the defendants who are heirs of Sarafally are estopped from claiming any share in the estate of Ebrahimji. Mr. Munshi relied on estoppel under s. 115, but the estoppel in my view is by record. The heirs of Sarafally had an opportunity of claiming as heirs of Jelumboo in the suit filed by them against Kikabhai and others. They failed to take advantage of that opportunity and cannot do so now. Mr. Somjee argues that they cannot rely on this ground since they have not pleaded estoppel by record. But this plea arises out of the evidence which they themselves have led and therefore is available to the other side.

My findings on issues 5 and 6 are in the negative for the reasons I have already given.

The suit is dismissed with costs.

Mr. Desai argues that I should make an order that the heirs of Sarafally should be liable along with the plaintiff for their costs, and he refers me to an authority mentioned at p. 146 of Sir Dinshah Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, 10th edn. I have no doubt that in a suitable case one defendant may be ordered to pay the costs of another defendant, but in this particular case I do not think such an order is justified, since the defendants, the heirs of Sarafally, have done nothing except to ask that there be a division and their share be given to them. This request therefore must be rejected.

The plaintiff must pay the costs of defendants Nos. 1 to 5, the other defendants should pay their own costs.

On appeal, the Appeal Court (Beaumont C. J. and Rangnekar J.) reversed the decree of the lower Court (September 8, 1936). The following judgment was delivered by Rangnekar J.—

RANGNEKAR J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Barlee whereby the learned Judge dismissed the plaintiff's action. The material facts may be stated shortly as follows. One Esmailji died leaving his widow Jelumboo, and two sons Ebrahimji and Sarafally, and two daughters Sakina-boo and Amtoolaboo. After the death of Esmailji, Ebrahimji and Sarafally were carrying on business jointly in Bombay. Ebrahimji died in 1904 leaving his widow Fatmabai, a son, who was born after his death, and two daughters, Khatizabai and Safiabai. Jelumboo died in 1912. The two daughters of Esmailji were married. One of them, Amtoolaboo, died in 1920, leaving Safiabai, who is the plaintiff, and Asmabai, who is defendant No. 8 in the suit. It is common ground that the two brothers were living together, and that they owned some properties situate at Kapadvanj, and they had also purchased one property in Samuel Street out of the profits of their business. After Ebrahimji's death one property at Abdul Rehman Street was purchased, admittedly out of the profits of the business. It is not disputed that Jelumboo was an heir of Ebrahimji and that she had a one-sixth share in his estate, nor is it disputed that her heirs would be Sarafally and her two daughters. This suit was instituted by Safiabai, the daughter of Amtoolaboo, to assert her rights in the estate of Ebrahimji, and her claim was that in that estate Ebrahimji's mother Jelumboo had a one-sixth share, and that she was one of the heirs of Jelumboo. Of the defendants, defendants Nos. 1 to 5 are the representatives of Ebrahimji. Defendant No. 7 is the other daughter of Jelumboo, and defendant No. 8 is another daughter of Amtoolaboo. Defendants Nos. 9 to 16 are Sarafally's heirs. All defendants except defendants Nos. 1 to 5 supported the claim of the plaintiff. Defendants Nos. 1 to 5 resisted it on various grounds, and accordingly, at the trial, several issues were raised, one of them being that the suit was barred by the law of limitation. The learned Judge, as appears from his judgment, seems to have considered that to be the principal question in the case. He held that the suit was barred under art. 106 of the Indian Limitation Act. But he went on to record, and has recorded, findings on some of the issues, which will be adverted to presently. The question then is whether the suit is barred by limitation. That, I think, must plainly depend upon the nature of the claim as set up in the plaint. In the plaint, after setting out the relationship between the parties to the suit, and referring to certain transactions to which I shall presently refer, the plaintiff alleged that all the parties were living jointly and as members of a joint family until at any rate 1926, and that at no time was any exclusion set up by the contending defendants against them. The plaintiff further complained that defendant No. 1 deliberately avoided filing a suit for administration of the estate of Ebrahimji, well knowing that in that event he will have to make the plaintiff and all other heirs of Jelumboo parties thereto, and to pay them their respective shares, and submitted that in those circumstances the suit was not barred by the law of limitation. The first prayer is for a declaration that Jelumboo was entitled to a one-sixth share in the estate left by Ebrahimji as his mother, and that after her death her own heirs became entitled to the same, and the second for a further declaration that the plaintiff, defendants Nos. 7 and 8, and the heirs of Sarafally would be entitled to a one-sixth share in the estate of Ebrahimji. The next prayer is for partition of the properties between the parties entitled thereto, and the ascertainment of their shares, and for separate possession. Then there is a prayer for a complete discovery against defendant No. 1, and for all accounts being taken, inquiries made, and necessary directions given, and proper orders being passed for these purposes. It is true that there is no specific prayer for administration, but we are clearly of opinion, having regard to the plaint as a whole, that the suit was substantially for administration of the estate of Ebrahimji, and for the ascertainment of the rights of the heirs of Jelumboo, who herself was an heir in that estate. If then the suit is for administration, then, as the parties are Mahomedans, time will not run unless there was an exclusion or an ouster. It is well established that Mahomedan heirs succeed to the estate as tenants-in-common with specific shares, and unless a case of exclusion or ouster is made out against any of the heirs, the mere fact that one or some of the heirs are in possession of the whole estate will not deprive the other heirs of their rights as heirs in such estate. It is not necessary for me to refer to the authorities on this point, as it does not appear to me to be open to dispute. The way in which, however, the case was put before the learned Judge was this. It was contended that the suit in substance was one for taking partnership accounts of a partnership between Sarafally and Ebrahimji, and for recovery of the latter's share in the partnership and in the properties purchased out of the profits of the partnership. It appears that after the death of Ebrahimji the business was continued by Sarafally, and the respondents' contention was that in that business Sarafally and they, as heirs of Ebrahimji, were the only partners. This was met by the plaintiff by the contention that after the death of Ebrahimji the share of Ebrahimji was continued in the business by Sarafally with the consent of the then heirs for the benefit of the estate of Ebrahimji, and until at least 1923 the business was carried on by Sarafally for and on behalf of himself and the estate of Ebrahimji. The learned Judge has recorded no finding on this issue, but he has distinctly found that the estate of Ebrahimji was not held and enjoyed by his widow and children to the exclusion and adversely to Jelumboo and her heirs. If it had been necessary on the facts to determine the question as to whether the business was continued by Sarafally only for himself and the widow and children of Ebrahimji and not, as the plaintiff contends, for the benefit of Ebrahimji's estate, we would have remanded the case for a finding on the issue. But, in view of the facts, we do not think it is necessary. As stated above, the learned Judge had found there was no exclusion or ouster against Jelumboo and her heirs. The fact remains that the business was continued admittedly with the help of Ebrahimji's share therein, and the evidence shows that all the property, both moveable and immoveable, including the business, was treated by common consent of the family as joint, in which not only Sarafally but the estate of Ebrahimji was interested. This is clear from certain subsequent events, to which it will now be convenient to refer. As stated above, the Abdul Rehman Street property was admittedly purchased out of the profits of the business, and the rest of the immoveable property was admittedly joint property of Ebrahimji and Sarafally.

ALLY TYEBALLY
v.
SAFIABAI
Rangnekar J.

P. C. It appears that Sarafally, who apparently was the head of the family, 1940 fell ill in 1923. On July 13, 1923, he called together all the heirs of Ebra— himji except Khatizabai, and the heirs of Jelumboo, Jelumboo herself being MAHOMED- already dead then. They then entered into an agreement, the effect of which ALLY was to distribute all the properties between Sarafally and respondents Nos. 1 TYEBALLY to 5 and Safiabai, the daughter of Ebrahimji. Khatizabai, who, as I have
 v. said, was admittedly an heir, was not a party to this agreement, nor were SAFIABAI heirs of Jelumboo parties. The agreement in one place is called a partner— ship deed and in another a partition deed. The properties are described as Rangnekar J. joint and in the possession of the parties to the agreement. But the fact remains that all of them with the exception of the Abdul Rehman Street property admittedly belonged jointly to Sarafally and Ebrahimji. Then the properties are described as belonging to the firm "which is being carried on in the name of Ebrahim". The business assets are described as belonging to this firm. It is clear that the agreement was made by Sarafally and some of the heirs of Ebrahimji. How can it then be contended that the agreement shows that the business and the joint property of Ebrahimji and Sarafally belonged exclusively only to the parties to the agreement, and in any event how can it bind the heirs of Jelumboo who were not parties to it?
 Some only of the heirs of Ebrahimji and Sarafally cannot by agreement between them change the nature of the property, which, the agreement shows, was treated as belonging to the heirs of Ebrahimji and Sarafally, behind the back of the other heirs of Ebrahimji. At the most it may be evidence of exclusion, if the other heirs of Ebrahimji were aware of the agreement, but there is no evidence of that, and the learned Judge's finding, which, in our opinion, is correct, is to the contrary. But even if the agreement be treated as evidence of exclusion, the suit is within twelve years of it. Then shortly after the agreement, that is on August 5, 1923, Sarafally died, and thereafter another agreement was entered into on September 23, 1924. By this the heirs of Sarafally and respondents Nos. 1 to 5 agreed to wind up the estate and divide it among themselves in a particular manner again behind the back of the heirs of Jelumboo. This agreement was made to carry out the earlier agreement of July 13, 1923. This was followed by a suit brought by respondent No. 1, Khatizabai, who is now represented by defendants Nos. 2 to 5, and the widow of Ebrahimji against the heirs of Sarafally and Safiabai. The plaint incidentally shows that, even according to the respondents, Ebrahimji and Sarafally were tenants-in-common. By consent the suit was referred to arbitration. An award was made and decree taken in terms of it. The result of it was to divide the whole estate belonging to Ebrahimji and Sarafally among the parties to the suit. To these proceedings, as well as to a subsequent suit between respondent No. 1 and his sisters Jelumboo's heirs were not parties. It is significant to note, however, that in the latter suit Safiabai did raise the question that Jelumboo's heirs were necessary parties. The position, then, is that these facts show that the whole property, including the business, was treated as joint property of Ebrahimji and Sarafally in which they were tenants-in-common, and after the death of the former his heirs were tenants-in-common with Sarafally, and after his death with his heirs. Therefore, in my opinion, the learned Judge was right in holding that there was no exclusion or adverse possession against the heirs of Jelumboo. Merely because some only of the heirs of Ebrahimji enter into an agreement with the other joint owner, and, after the latter's death, with his heirs, to divide the common estate among themselves, cannot affect the rights of the other heirs of Ebrahimji. The position, then, is that the suit is for administration of the estate of Ebrahimji brought by an heir of one of the heirs of Ebrahimji against the other heirs of Ebrahimji and the heirs of Sarafally. According to her, the estate is now in the hands of the contending defendants, and she wants her share in it. The suit is not, therefore, a partnership suit, or a suit to wind up the partnership business and to recover her share therein, as an heir of a deceased partner. According to her, that has been done, and the deceased partner's share is now held and in the possession of the contending defendants. In my opinion, art. 106 clearly cannot apply to such a suit. Mr. Munshi referred to certain Privy Council cases, which, in my opinion, have no bearing on the question which arises on the facts of this case. He relied on Gopala Chetty v. Vijayaragavachariar<sup>1</sup> in which the judgment of the House of Lords in Knox v. Gye<sup>2</sup> was explained by Lord Phillimore. But the judgment shows that even in the case of two partners, where the partnership has been dissolved, accounts made up, and assets distributed, if subsequently an asset, which belonged to the partnership, came into the hands of one of the partners, it will have to be divided between him and the other partner. The facts in the present case seem to me to be much stronger than the facts in that case. I think, therefore, the view taken by the learned Judge in the trial Court on the question of limitation is clearly unsustainable.

The next point, which is raised on behalf of the respondents, is that the whole suit abated under O. XXII, r. 4, of the Civil Procedure Code, as the heirs of Sakinaboo, who was the original defendant No. 7, were not brought on record within the time limited by law. It appears that the lady died in March, 1932, and the present defendant No. 7 applied to the learned Judge for being brought on record as her heir, and for her rights being ascertained and given effect to, about two years after the death of Sakinaboo. The learned Judge accepted the application, and made an order that she should be brought on record. Accordingly that was done. The learned Judge clearly had jurisdiction to excuse the delay on the part of the heirs in making the application for being brought on record. The learned Judge exercised the jurisdiction, and no sufficient ground is shown why we should interfere with it. Apart from that, it seems to me that there is no clear authority for the view, which is pressed by Mr. Munshi, that in a suit like the present, when one of the defendants, who himself was joined as an heir, dies, and his heirs are not brought on record within ninety days, the whole suit must abate. The wording of O. XXII, r. 4, is clearly against such a contention, and at the most it may be that the suit may abate against the heir of the deceased party. If it is to the interest of the other parties that all questions should be determined at one time in one proceeding, then clearly it is their duty to bring the heir of a deceased party on the record. If they do not do it, they take the risk of the heir turning up subsequently and contending that he was not bound by any decree made in the litigation. The case on which Mr. Munshi relies is a case of Hindu joint tenants, and there is a clear distinction between the position of heirs of a deceased Mahomedan under the Mahomedan law and the position of an heir of a joint tenant. But all that was said in that case was that to a suit for partition all the coparceners were necessary parties, and if any of the coparceners is not joined, the suit is not well constituted. I respectfully agree with the decision, but it is difficult to see how it can apply to the facts of this case. I think, therefore, that this contention must be rejected.

The third point taken by Mr. Munshi is one about estoppel, which is based on the agreement of 1923 and the subsequent events which are set forth above. Now the contention is that in these transactions the heirs of Sarafally, now represented by defendants Nos. 9 to 16, did not assert that Jelumboo or rather Jelumboo's heirs were also heirs to the estate of Ebrahimji, and therefore they are now estopped from contending, as they undoubtedly do, that Jelumboo and her heirs are entitled to their shares in the estate of Ebrahimji. The learned Judge accepted this contention not as regards defendant No. 7, but as regards the heirs of Sarafally, represented by defendants Nos. 9 to 16. But he held that this was an estoppel by record. Mr. Munshi does not support this conclusion. But he argues that these facts clearly raise an estoppel by conduct. To establish an estoppel of that character it is necessary to show, first, that there was a representation made by the party against whom the estoppel is raised, secondly, that the representation was made to the party with intent that it should be acted upon, and, thirdly, that the other party acted upon it and changed his position or acted to his prejudice. In my opinion, there is no evidence to establish these points. In the first place, there was no assertion made by one of the defendants that Jelumboo was not an heir to Ebrahimji's estate. They only came forward as heirs of Sarafally, who was a party to the agreement, and in order to carry out the agreement. The question of Jelumboo's rights did not arise in the matter at all. The facts are that the estate was agreed to be divided between Sarafally and some of the heirs of Ebrahimji, and after Sarafally's death the method of distribution was agreed upon in the second agreement between the heirs of Sarafally and the defendants, who were some of the heirs of Ebrahimji. The second agreement was made to carry out the first agreement. Both the parties having proceeded by consent on the footing that Jelumboo had no interest in the estate, it is difficult to see how the contending respondents' position was prejudiced. It is difficult to hold on these facts that there is any case of estoppel made out against these heirs. I think, therefore, that contention must also be rejected. Mr. Munshi referred to a Privy Council decision in Muhammad Wali Khan v. Muhammad Mohi-ud-din Khan.<sup>1</sup> The facts, in my opinion, of that case are clearly distinguishable.

It is now necessary to consider the order which should be made in this appeal. It seems to me that the parties did not appreciate the proper position which arose upon the pleadings. There is no doubt that the plaintiffs are entitled to the declarations claimed in prayers (a) and (b), and that being so, I do not think it is necessary to remand the case for a finding on some of the issues on which no express finding has been recorded by the Judge. The principal question agitated by the parties before the learned Judge was that the suit was barred by limitation, as there was exclusion and ouster against the plaintiff and the other heirs of Jelumboo, and that was the case with which they came to Court by their written statement. That issue was found by the learned Judge against them. The position then is that the plaintiffs have prima facie established their cause of action, and are entitled to a preliminary decree for administration. But having regard to the facts and the difficulties in the case, we propose that the decree should be for declarations claimed by prayers (a) and (b), and for an order that the suit be referred to the Commissioner for taking accounts to take an account of the estate of Ebrahimji and of the properties, if any, forming part of the estate, come to the hands of defendants Nos. 1 to 5, and that the property be applied in due course of administration. Mr. Munshi has asked us to give special directions to the Commissioner as regards his contention that some of the properties do not belong to the estate, and did not form part of the estate of Ebrahimji. Having regard to the decree which we are making, I do not think it necessary to do so. Two questions arise. One would be, what is the estate of Ebrahimji, and, secondly, what part of that estate is in the hands of the defendants? And it will be perfectly open to the parties to raise all proper contentions allowed by law on this decree before the Commissioner. In my opinion, no such specific directions are required. The appeal, therefore, will be allowed. Respondents Nos. 1 to 5 to pay the costs of the appeal. Costs in the suit and further directions will be reserved.

BEAUMONT C. J. I agree and have nothing to add.

SIR GEORGE RANKIN. This case concerns the administration of the estate left by one Ebrahimji who died in 1904. He was a Dawoodi Borah governed by the Shia School of Mahomedan law and had carried on business in Bombay with his brother Sarafally as merchants and commission agents. A pedigree table of the family is given hereunder. They belonged to Kapadvanj in the Kaira District of the Bombay Presidency, and the brothers were co-owners of certain immovable properties there in addition to their interests in their ancestral home. Their Bombay business was a profitable one and a house in Samuel Street in Bombay had been acquired out of the profits.

The heirs of Ebrahimji, according to the Shia system of "sharers" and "residuarys" were (1) his mother Jelumboo entitled to a sixth share, (2) his widow Fatmabai entitled to an eighth share, (3) his son Kikabhai, and his two daughters by different wives (4) Safiabai and (5) Khatizabai. These children took shares in the residue left after deduction of the mother's and widow's shares, the son taking twice as much as a daughter. His brother Sarafally and his two sisters Sakinaboo and Amtoolaboo were not heirs. The business was continued by Sarafally, the share of Ebrahimji being left in the business. Jelumboo lived with her son Sarafally until her death in 1912. Another Bombay house—in Abdul Rehman Street—was acquired out of the profits in or about 1917. Amtoolaboo died in 1920 leaving as her heirs two daughters the plaintiff Safiabai and Asmabai (defendant No. 8).

In 1923 Sarafally was ill : he died in August of that year. On July 13 before his death he entered into an agreement in writing intended to regulate and define the respective interests of himself and Ebrahimji's estate in the business and in the various properties at Bombay and Kapadvanj. The other parties to this agreement were Ebrahimji's son Kikabhaj, his daughter Safiabai and his widow Fatmabai. Provision was made for the other daughter Khatizabai joining therein, which she afterwards did. The agreement treated the widow, son and daughters of Ebrahimji as his only heirs, ignoring the facts that his mother Jelumboo had inherited from him a sixth share of his estate, and that of her interest only a half had devolved on Sarafally, the other half belonging to his sister Sakinaboo and the two daughters of his deceased sister Amtoolaboo—namely, the plaintiff and Asmabai.

On this footing the agreement provided that the respective shares of Sarafally and Ebrahimji's estate should as to two plots of land in Kapadvanj be equal, but as to the business and the houses in Abdul Rehman Street and Samuel Street should be as follows : ten annas to Sarafally and six annas to Ebrahimji's estate. The ancestral house at Kapadvanj had already been partitioned by metes and bounds.

On Sarafally's death (August 5, 1923), his estate devolved on his widow, his four sons and his four daughters. On September 24, 1924, an agreement in writing was made between them as Sarafally's heirs of the one part and the widow and three children of Ebrahimji as representing Ebrahimji's estate of the other part. No notice was taken in this agreement of Jelumboo or her heirs as having any interest in the estate of Ebrahimji. The agreement of July 13, 1923, was approved. The house at Abdul Rehman Street and its contents and two immovable properties at Kapadvanj were to be taken by Ebrahimji's heirs, and Sarafally's heirs were to get the Samuel Street house and the business. These assets were to be taken at certain valuations : the figure for the business to be fixed by one Metaji Chaturbhuj Motichand who was to make up the final account. Some properties at Kapadvanj were not included in this arrangement but it was recited that these had already been divided.

On December 11, 1924, the widow and son of Ebrahimji together with one daughter (Khatizabai) sued for partition in accordance with the agreement of September 24, 1924. The other daughter (Safiabai) was made a defendant but the suit was brought against Sarafally's eight children and widow as representing his estate : a preliminary decree for partition and accounts was obtained on May 5, 1925, and a final decree on June 11, 1926. The widow of Ebrahimji died meanwhile in 1925 and her interest passed to her children. The widow of Sarafally died in 1926 : this produced certain changes in the representation of Sarafally's estate which will be taken account of in due course.

On July 17, 1926, Ebrahimji's son Kikabhai sued his sister Khatizabai and his half-sister Safiabai for sale and division of the property which had come to them under the decree in the previous suit. Safiabai by her written statement filed on November 8, 1926, set up that Jelumboo, her father's mother, was one of his heirs, and that the present plaintiff together with her sister Asmabai and her aunt Sakinaboo and other persons should be brought before the Court as necessary parties. Khatizabai having died in 1926, her husband and children were substituted in her stead. On February 21, 1929, a decree was passed by consent directing that Safiabai should take a sum of Rs. 51,500 with certain interest in full satisfaction of her share in her father Ebrahimji's estate. This was paid to her and a release was executed by her on January 31, 1930. Their Lordships do not stop to consider the propriety of these proceedings having regard to the facts brought to notice by the lady's own written statement as already mentioned.

On July 23, 1930, the present suit was filed. At some date before that but after 1926 the death of Halimabai occurred. She was the mother of Sarafally's wife and had been one of her heirs. The result of Halimabai's death was that the persons entitled to the estate of Sarafally were now his four sons, his four daughters and three sisters of his wife. These eleven persons may be described as the second set of defendants to the present suit—namely defendants Nos. 9-19 inclusive. The plaintiff was Safiabai, one of the two daughters of Amtoolaboo, sister to Ebrahimji. The first set of defendants (so to call them) were Kikabhai, and Khatizabai's representatives; these were defendants Nos. 1-5. Among other defendants was Kikabhai's half-sister Safiabai (defendant No. 6) who has been paid out as already mentioned. The plaintiff's sister, Asmabai, was defendant No. 8 and the plaintiff's aunt, Sakinaboo, was defendant No. 7. These two ladies were in the same position as the plaintiff, being persons entitled along with the plaintiff to a half of the one-sixth interest which Jelumboo had in her son Ebrahimji's estate. The other half of that one-sixth interest belonged at the date of the suit to Sarafally's representatives—that is defendants Nos. 9-19—unless by the agreements of 1923 and 1924 they had lost their interest.

It is necessary to direct attention to the frame and scope of the suit. It was brought on the Original Side of the High Court at Bombay. The plaint set forth the various relationships of the parties and the devolution of interests in the respective estates of Ebrahimji and Sarafally. It recited the agreements of July 13, 1923, and September 23, 1924, and the two previous suits brought thereupon; it stated that the plaintiff had had no knowledge thereof and had not consented thereto; but it did not claim that the plaintiff's interest in the estate of Ebrahimji should be ascertained as between herself and the estate of Sarafally as though these agreements had never been made. In effect, as their Lordships read the plaint, it merely asked that Jelumboo's one-sixth share in what Ebrahimji's widow and children had received as representing his estate should be given to the persons entitled thereto. Defendants Nos. 9-19, Sarafally's representatives, supported the plaintiff: the contesting defendants were the defendants Nos. 1-5.

The suit having been filed on July 23, 1930, Sakinaboo (sister of Ebrahimji), who was defendant No. 7, died on March 14, 1932, leaving her daughter Rukhiaboo as her heir. No application to make the daughter a party to the suit having been made within ninety days the suit abated as against Sakinaboo under O. XXII, r. 4, cl. 3, of the Civil Procedure Code. No application was made within sixty days thereafter to set aside the abatement under r. 9 of the same Order. But on May 10, 1936, Rukhiaboo herself applied to be brought on the record in her mother's stead and claimed to share in the relief asked by the plaint. Acting under r. 10 of O. I of the Code, Barlee J., on January 22, 1936, added her as defendant No. 7 to the suit. At the trial the learned Judge on February 17, 1936, dismissed the suit, holding that the plaintiff's claim was within art. 106 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, which prescribes a period of three years from the date of dissolution for a suit for an account and a share of the profits of a dissolved partnership. On appeal this decree was set aside by a division bench (Beaumont C. J. and Rangnekar J.) who directed an account to be taken of the estate of Ebrahimji come to the hands of Kikabhai and the heirs of Khatizabai and ordered that the estate of Ebrahimji be applied in due course of administration. This decree was dated September 8, 1936, and is the decree from which the present appeal is brought by the heirs of Khatizabai.

It is not contended that the plaintiff's claim is for anything more than her prima facie rights in Ebrahimji's estate, but three points are taken for the appellants. It is said (1) that the suit had come to an end by reason that it had abated as against Sakinaboo, (2) that it is barred by limitation, and (3) that defendants Nos. 9-19 can make no claim against the appellants in respect of Sarafally's interest in Jelumboo's estate as this would be contrary to the agreements of July 13, 1923, and September 23, 1924, and to the decree of the Court made (June 11, 1926) in the suit of 1924 which gave effect to these agreements.

On the first point their Lordships are of opinion that it is impossible to hold that the suit for administration of Ebrahimji's estate came to an end by reason of abatement as against Sakinaboo. Sakinaboo and her daughter Rukhiaboo are persons having the same interest as the plaintiff, and though the plaintiff by reason of laches may be supposed in certain circumstances to lose her rights as against them, it is paradoxical to suppose that the plaintiff's laches have deprived them of rights. There is nothing in O. XXII to take away their interest in the estate of Ebrahimji and they could (so far as that Order is concerned) have brought an administration suit of their own, notwithstanding any abatement of the plaintiff's suit. The presence of someone to represent Sakinaboo's interest was very proper and highly desirable in the interest of every other party, but it is putting it too high to say that the suit could not possibly go on without her. It not uncommonly happens, in a suit for administration, that for one reason or another a particular interest is not represented before decree, but is either provided for by the decree, or is asserted at a later stage under the decree, or is given effect by a party being permitted to attend certain accounts and enquiries so as to be bound by the result. Still, it would have been very bad practice if in the present case Rukhiaboo had not been joined as a party and this was properly done by Barlee J. on her own application under O. I, r. 10. Their Lordships are of opinion that it is open to the Judge in his discretion under O. I, r. 10, to add as a party to the suit the representative of a person against whom the suit has abated for the purpose of giving effect to the rights of the parties. The contention that the plaintiff's suit had abated as a whole is fundamentally mistaken. It involves that the plaintiff was claiming relief against Sakinaboo, that because Sakinaboo's heirs were entitled to resist the grant of this relief in the present suit by reason of the plaintiff's laches, the plaintiff could not be given relief against the present appellants. No step in this reasoning can be justified.

It was not contended before the Board that the plaintiff's suit is of the character mentioned in art. 106 of the Indian Limitation Act. It is a suit against certain Mahomedan co-heirs by a person entitled to part of the interest of an heir, and the High Court on appeal rightly held that to such a suit neither art. 106 nor art. 123 is applicable. The heirs of a Mahomedan succeed to his estate in specific shares as tenants-in-common and the plaintiff's suit against the son and daughters of Ebrahimji for due administration of what came to their hands as property left by their father is governed as regards immovable property by art. 144 and as regards movables by art. 120 (Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Mussumat Hasin Banu<sup>1</sup> and Ghulam Mohammad v. Ghulam Husain.<sup>2</sup>) Upon the proper application of art. 120 as between tenants-in-common it will be sufficient to refer to Bolo v. Kokhar<sup>3</sup> and Yerukola v. Yerukola.<sup>4</sup> It does not appear that the widow, son or daughters of Ebrahimji received what was to come to them under the agreement of September 24, 1924, until the suit of 1924 had been decreed in 1926 which is well within six years of the filing of the present suit on July 23, 1930. But their Lordships think it right to add that on the evidence they find no reason for holding that there had been an ouster or exclusion of the plaintiff prior to July 23, 1924: indeed there are concurrent findings of the Courts in India which are inconsistent with any such contention.

The third point taken by the appellants is in their Lordships' opinion good against those claiming under Sarafally an interest in Jelumboo's one-sixth share of Ebrahimji's estate. As the suit of 1924 resulted in a decree there is an element of estoppel by record, but the matter may be put sufficiently as resting on agreements made in 1923 and 1924 between Sarafally and Sarafally's heirs on the one part and the widow and the children of Ebrahimji on the other. Defendants Nos. 9-19 cannot claim to make the present appellants liable on the footing that Sarafally was entitled to more than these agreements gave him, though it be true enough that since 1912 he had been entitled to a half of his mother's one-sixth share. If the plaintiff by her suit had challenged the rights of Sarafally's heir under the agreements of 1923 and 1924, it may well be that she could have required Sarafally's heirs to account upon a footing which would have made it impossible to give any effect to these agreements: even as between the parties to them. But the plaintiff by her suit has not sought relief upon any such basis and the agreements have their effect between Sarafally (and his representatives) and the children of his brother.

Their Lordships are of opinion that on this point the appeal succeeds but only as against defendants Nos. 9-19 (respondents Nos. 5-15). The decree of the High Court dated September 8, 1936, should be varied (a) by limiting the second of the declarations therein made to a declaration that the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 7 and 8 are entitled to a one-twelfth share in the estate of Ebrahimji Esmailji Bhagat, the plaintiff and defendant No. 8 being each entitled to one-quarter of the said one-twelfth share and defendant No. 7 being entitled to the remaining half thereof; (b) by adding to the order for administration the words "so far as regards the one-twelfth share to which the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 7 and 8 are entitled as aforesaid."

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly. They see no need to disturb the High Court's order as to costs. As regards the costs of this appeal the appellants must pay one-half of one set of costs to the contesting respondents—that is, respondents Nos. 1, 3 and 5-12 who have joined in resisting the appeal.

Where in a document there is an apparent inconsistency according to the literal construction of the words used, if by any other reasonably possible construction the apparent inconsistencies can be reconciled, that construction should be adopted.

It is not for a Court to speculate as to the reasons which may have dictated the employment of the language used in a contract.

A clause in an agreement contained two provisions which, if construed according to their literal and grammatical meaning, were inconsistent with each other. But of the two inconsistent provisions one was susceptible of a possible construction different from its literal meaning, while the other was not; and if the possible construction was applied all inconsistency disappeared :—

RANEEGUNJ APPEAL from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at COAL Bombay (Beaumont C. J. and Blackwell J.), dated September 20, 1937, con-ASSOCIATION, firming, with a slight variation, the judgment and decree of that Court LTD. (Engineer J.), dated May 24, 1937.

v.
TATA IRON The defendants, the Raneegunj Coal Association Ltd., entered into an agree-& STEEL CO., ment in writing, on January 16, 1919, with the plaintiffs, the Tata Iron and LTD. Steel Corporation Ltd., to sell to the plaintiffs their output of coal from certain seams in their mines. The contract was for twenty-five years and was to operate from April 1, 1920.

Dispute arose between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to the interpretation of cl. (4) in the contract. [The clause is reproduced in the judgment of their Lordships.]

In pursuance of the agreement the defendants supplied to the plaintiffs 4,96,539, tons and 3 cwts. of coal for the contract year from April 1, 1932, to March 31, 1933. The price to be paid by the plaintiffs was not settled in January, 1932, as provided by cl. (4).

On April 19, 1932, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs that on construing the contract on the basis of the various rates of purchases made by the Railway Board the price for the coal during the year 1932-33 would come to Rs. 4-4-11 per ton and inquired whether the plaintiffs were agreeable to settle and adjust the price at that figure.

On April 27, 1932, the plaintiffs replied that there was no contract entered into by the Railway Board for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal during the period between July 1, 1931, and January 31, 1932, and that the price payable by the plaintiffs for the coal could not therefore be based on the rates of the contracts of the Railway Board, and that the plaintiffs were prepared to pay the minimum price of Rs. 3-12-0 as stated in cl. (4).

On March 29, 1933, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs that they had decided to refer the dispute between them to arbitration under cl. (13) of the agreement, and that accordingly they were submitting their case to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce Tribunal of Arbitration.

On April 1, 1933, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce informed the plaintiffs that the defendants had applied for arbitration and that the plaintiffs should submit their case.

The plaintiffs filed the present suit in the High Court stating that disputes as to the price payable for the coal supplied by the defendants had arisen between the parties from time to time by reason of the difficulty of construing cl. (4) of the agreement, that it was necessary in the interest of the parties that cl. (4) should be properly construed once for all by a Court of law so that the basis on which the price of the coal to be supplied by the defendants to the plaintiffs might be fixed, that the price of Rs. 3-12-0 per ton paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants for the coal supplied for the year 1932-33 was the proper price thereof and the defendants were not entitled to recover from them anything more, that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to pay to the defendants at the rate of Rs. 3-12-0 per ton for the coal to be supplied during the year 1933-34, and that the plaintiffs were prepared to pay such price as might be fixed by the Court on the true construction of cl. (4) for both the years 1932-33 and 1933-34. The plaintiffs also submitted the construction which they sought to be placed on cl. (4).

The plaintiffs prayed for the construction of cl. (4). This prayer was subsequently amended and the following question was submitted for the decision of the Court :—

“Whether on the true construction of clause 4 of the Agreement of January 16, 1919, and on the basis of there being no contract for the purchase of 1st class Jharriah coal made by the Railway Board or any similar authority between July 1 and January 31 following, the plaintiffs are entitled to have the price of the coal supplied by the defendants under the agreement in the year commencing from the following April 1 calculated on the footing of the latest purchaser's contract in the Calcutta market entered into during the said period i.e. between July 1 and January 31 following ; or on what other basis such price should be calculated.”

The plaintiffs also prayed for an order and injunction restraining the defendants from proceeding with the arbitration pending before the Bengal Chamber of Commerce.

The defendants in their written statement contended inter alia that the plaint disclosed no cause of action, that no suit for the relief claimed could be maintained except with the consent of the parties and on agreed facts, that the plaintiffs had filed the suit after they had submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration, that if there was any dispute regarding the construction of cl. (4) it could be disposed of by the Tribunal of Arbitration and that the construction sought to be placed on cl. (4) by the plaintiffs was not correct. The defendants also submitted the construction which they put on cl. (4).

Engineer J., who heard the suit, held that the plaint disclosed a cause of action, that the suit as framed was maintainable, and that on the true construction of cl. (4) and on the basis of there being no contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal made by the Railway Board or any similar authority between July 1 and January 31 following, the plaintiffs were entitled to have the price of the coal in the year commencing from April 1 calculated on the footing of the latest purchaser's contract in the Calcutta market entered into during the period between July 1 and January 31 following.

ENGINEER J. This suit arises out of an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants made on January 16, 1919, by which the defendants agreed to sell their output of coal from certain seams in their mines to the plaintiffs.

The contract is for twenty-five years and commenced to operate from April 1, 1920. Thus when the suit was filed in 1933 there were still twelve years to run before the contract would come to an end.

The dispute that has arisen between the parties is as regards the construction of cl. (4) of the contract which lays down the basis on which the price of coal supplied by the defendants to the plaintiffs is to be fixed. The prayers in the suit originally were as follows :—

(a) For construction of cl. (4) of the said agreement.

(f) For the costs of the suit and such further and other relief as this Hon'ble Court shall think fit.

On January 29, 1933, the defendants took out a chamber summons for stay of the suit on the ground that the disputes between the parties should be left to be decided by arbitration as provided by the contract. For one reason or another the summons was not decided until December 14, 1936, on which date it was dismissed by Mr. Justice Rangnekar. The defendants appealed (Appeal No. 7 of 1937) against the order dismissing the summons. The Appeal Court (Beaumont C. J. and Blackwell J.) dismissed the appeal on March 10, 1937. What happened in the Appeal Court will appear from the following extract from the judgment of the Appeal Court :—

"But there is this criticism to be made on the plaintiffs' suit, namely, that the reliefs asked for involved partly matters of fact, and the question of construction which arises is raised in much too general terms. What the plaintiffs have asked for in cl. (a) of their prayers is for construction of cl. (4) of the agreement. It is obvious that the Court cannot be asked merely to construe an agreement, a course which would involve the Court in giving a lecture as to the true meaning and effect of the agreement in various hypothetical events which might arise. No Court can be asked to do that. What the Court can be asked to do under High Court Rule 237 is to determine a question of construction arising on a document, and declare the rights of the persons interested. It is, I think, possible from the plaint to ascertain what the real question of construction which the plaintiffs desired to raise was. That I think appears from paragraphs 9 and 10, but the point should be raised specifically. Mr. Munshi on behalf of the plaintiffs has agreed to strike out altogether prayers (b) and (c) of the plaint, which involve matters which might be more suitably dealt with by arbitrators, and in place of the present prayer (a), he claims by way of amendment to raise the following question, namely, whether on the true construction of cl. (4) of the agreement of January 16, 1919, and on the basis of there being no contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal made by the Railway Board or any similar authority between July 1 and January 31 following,—the plaintiffs are entitled to have the price of the coal supplied by the defendants under the agreement in the year commencing from the following April 1 calculated on the footing of the latest purchasers' contract in the Calcutta Market entered into during the said period between July 1 and January 31 following, or on what other basis such price should be calculated. It seems to me that that question will raise the point of construction which arises under cl. (4), and which it is in the interests of both parties to get determined. Otherwise, I am satisfied that the parties will go on disputing as to the basis of calculation of the price during the remaining years for which this contract is to run. If that question is raised, then it seems to me that it can be determined without any evidence; and in view of the unfortunate fact that the determination of this chamber summons seems to have involved a delay of three and a half years, I propose to give directions to have that question placed before the Court, so that it will be determined before the rising of the Court in April next. On the plaintiffs agreeing to amend their prayer in the manner indicated, I think that the suit ought not to be stayed, and the appeal will therefore be dismissed."

Engineer J.

The plaint was accordingly amended as stated in the judgment of the Appeal Court, and the suit is now before the Court with the amended prayers.

Among the issues which the defendants sought to raise at the hearing were the following two issues:—

"3. Whether prior to the year in dispute whenever there was absence of purchase by the Railway Board prior to January 31 prices were fixed by the parties under cl. (4) of the agreement on the rates of purchases made by the Railway Board during the next two months?

"4. Whether the plaintiffs raised before the Tribunal of Arbitration of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce in 1928 the same contention with regard to the construction of cl. (4) of the said agreement as they have raised in this suit, namely, that as in the month of January, 1927, there were no Railway Board contracts, the Steel Company (plaintiffs) were chargeable only with the market rate plus eight annas and their counsel abandoned the same and agreed to the construction adopted by the parties in the previous years?"

Obviously these are not issues proper to be raised and I gave my ruling as follows:—

"Issues 3 and 4 (namely the issues in question) are not issues in the suit. The defendants may, if they are so advised, tender evidence to prove the allegations comprised in issues 3 and 4, contending that such evidence is relevant on the question of construction. The admissibility or otherwise of such evidence will be considered when it is tendered. Issues 3 and 4 will be struck out."

The first and the second issues raised by the defendants are as follows:—

- (1) Whether the plaint discloses a cause of action?
- (2) Whether the suit as framed is maintainable?

Counsel for the defendants asked me to decide these issues as preliminary issues, contending that in the event of my deciding these issues in favour of the defendants I ought not to try the other issues at all. In view of the course which the suit has taken up to now I did not think it desirable to try issues 1 and 2 as preliminary issues, and I decided to try the whole suit.

I will first consider the issues whether the plaint discloses a cause of action, and whether the suit as framed is maintainable. But before I do so, I should notice two contentions raised by counsel for the plaintiffs. He contended that according to the order of the Appeal Court only the question of the construction of the contract was before me and that the defendants were not entitled to raise the said issues. This contention is based on the sentence in the judgment of the Appeal Court extracted above which runs as follows:—

"I propose to give directions to have that question placed before the Court, so that it will be determined before the rising of the Court in April next."

I cannot accept the plaintiffs' contention. The only question before the Appeal Court was whether, in view of the arbitration clause which existed in the contract, the suit should be stayed. In fact the defendants had not

P. C. even filed their written statement at that time, as they could not take any 1940 step in the proceedings so long as the question of stay was pending. In my opinion, all that the Appeal Court meant was that the original prayers (b) RANNEGUNJ and (c) of the plaint having been deleted by the amendment, the only sub-COAL stantial question which remained to be decided in the suit was that of the ASSOCIATION, construction of cl. (4). But this does not mean that the defendants are LTD. precluded from taking such defences as are open to them including the
 v. question as to the maintainability of the suit.
 TATA IRON
 & STEEL CO., LTD.

Engineer J.

The next contention urged on behalf of the plaintiffs was that the issues as regards the plaint not disclosing a cause of action and as regards the suit not being maintainable, are res judicata. This contention is based on the fact that in support of the defendants' application for stay, it was urged both in the Court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal, that the suit was not properly framed. Reliance was placed on behalf of the plaintiffs on the following portion in the judgment of Mr. Justice Rangnekar who dismissed the summons (December 14, 1936) :—

"It is next said that there is no cause of action. That is a question which would more appropriately be raised at the trial of the action and is not material or relevant on the present summons. But I am unable to accept that contention. It is open to parties under our rules by an originating summons to raise a question of construction of a contract or a clause therein, and what can be done on an originating summons can certainly be done by a plaint if the suit is of a civil nature. It is not disputed that the suit is of a civil nature. Apart from that, there is support for this view in the decision to which I have referred. The case brought before Mr. Justice Lawrence was brought by an originating summons, and there was no question raised that the action was incompetent."

Reliance was also placed on grounds 11 and 12 of the memorandum of appeal which are as follows :—

(11) That the learned Judge should have held that the frame of the suit was bad and that the suit was not maintainable.

(12) That having regard to the frame of the suit the learned Judge should have ordered it to be stayed.

In my opinion, it is elementary that the matter cannot be said to be res judicata. As observed by Mr. Justice Rangnekar in his judgment, the question was not material or relevant on the chamber summons. I hold that it is open to the defendants to raise the two issues and that the question involved in these issues is not res judicata, and I proceed to consider whether there is any substance in the objections embodied in those issues.

I summarise the defendants' contentions and arguments on this point as follows :—

Only a person who has a right and not a person under liability can be a plaintiff either in a suit or in an originating summons. The right to have a contract construed is not a right at all. There is no cause of action in the abstract to have a contract construed. The suit is not an originating summons and, therefore, r. 237 of the High Court Rules has no application. In any event the rules as regards an originating summons are merely matters of procedure; they cannot create a cause of action. The suit does not fall under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act as there is no question of legal character or a right as to any property. Section 42 is exhaustive of declaratory decrees and as according to the defendants the suit does not fall under s. 42, the High Court Rules relating to originating summonses for the construction of an instrument cannot support the present action, and unless the parties agree to bring the matter before the Court in the form of a special case under O. XXXVI of the Civil Procedure Code, no suit will lie and no originating summons can be maintained. Lastly, the defendants contend that in substance the plaintiffs want the Court to declare what their liabilities are under the contract, and that the Court has no jurisdiction to make such a declaration.

TATA IRON

Engineer J.

The objections raised by the defendants can be dealt with conveniently by considering the provisions of the law in India applicable to the case, and considering in what respects, if any, they differ from the corresponding provisions of law in England. Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act is as follows :—

"Any person entitled to any legal character, or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit against any person denying, or interested to deny, his title to such character or right, and the Court may in its discretion make therein a declaration that he is so entitled, and the plaintiff need not in such suit ask for any further relief :

Provided that no Court shall make any such declaration where the plaintiff, being able to seek further relief than a mere declaration of title, omits to do so."

Rule 237 of the High Court Rules provides as follows :—

"Any person claiming to be interested under a deed, will, or other written instrument, may apply in Chambers by originating summons for the determination of any question of construction arising under the instrument, and for a declaration of the rights of the person interested."

The provision of law in England corresponding to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act is to be found in O. 25, r. 5, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which is as follows :—

"No action or proceeding shall be open to objection, on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the Court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not."

It is contended on behalf of the defendants that this provision is wider than that contained in s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, and that s. 42 does not apply to cases where it is not possible to ask for consequential relief. But in my opinion this contention is not sound. The argument on which this distinction is sought to be raised loses sight of the proviso to s. 42 which says that no Court will make such a declaration where the plaintiff being able to seek further relief than a mere declaration of title omits to do so. These words show that the section does contemplate a person instituting a suit for a declaration, although not able to seek any further relief than a mere declaration. The only requirement of the section is that if the plaintiff is able to seek further relief he must do so.

The provision in the Rules of the Supreme Court corresponding to r. 237 of our High Court Rules is to be found in O. 54A, r. 1, which is as follows :—

"In any Division of the High Court, any person claiming to be interested under a deed, will, or other written instrument, may apply by originating summons for

P. C. the determination of any question of construction arising under the instrument; 1940 and for a declaration of the rights of the persons interested."

It is contended that O. 54A, r. 1, is wider because it speaks (in the plural) of the rights of the persons interested. It is contended that under r. 237 a declaration can be asked for only as regards the right of the person interested who takes out the originating summons, i.e. the plaintiff in the originating summons. I, however, fail to see any such distinction. But even if there is such a distinction, I think the plaintiff in this suit does ask for a declaration of his right, viz. the right under the contract to be supplied by the defendants with coal at a rate fixed in a particular manner.

Engineer J. In my opinion, the suit as framed is maintainable! The case clearly falls under r. 237 of the High Court Rules, the contract being a written instrument, a question of construction having clearly arisen and a declaration being asked of the rights of the person interested.

The defendants contend that what the plaintiffs seek to obtain here is not a declaration of their right but a declaration that their obligations are not what the defendants allege and that the cause of action is not in the plaintiffs but in the defendants. But I see no reason why, as stated above, the suit should not be regarded as one asking for a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to be supplied with coal by the defendants at the lesser rate which they contend for and not at the higher rate which the defendants contend for. If the plaintiffs can by an originating summons ask for the construction of the contract and ask for a declaration that they have a right under the contract to be supplied with coal at a rate fixed in a particular manner, there is no reason why they cannot get the same relief by a suit instead of by an originating summons.

As observed by Mr. Justice Rangnekar in his judgment on the chamber summons for stay, what can be done on an originating summons can certainly be done by a suit if the suit is of a civil nature. In my opinion, no authority is necessary for that proposition, but if one is necessary, it is to be found in Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company<sup>1</sup> where Lord Justice Bankes makes the following remarks (p. 573) :—

"Order LIV-A, r. 1, deals in terms with a case where anticipatory relief depending upon the construction of a document is claimed. This rule gives the applicant a right to proceed by originating summons, but this is for convenience merely. I cannot doubt that if the applicant preferred to proceed by action the Court would have jurisdiction to deal with his claim under Order XXV, r. 5."

In any event if necessary I am prepared to deal with the suit as if it was an originating summons.

The defendants' contention that the Court has no jurisdiction to make such a declaration is, in my opinion, erroneous and is due to the confusion of two different senses in which the word "jurisdiction" is used, as pointed out in Guaranty Trust Company of New York case<sup>2</sup> (p. 563) :—

"The first and... the only really correct sense of the expression that the Court has no jurisdiction is that it has no power to deal with and decide the dispute as to the subject-matter before it, no matter in what form or by whom it is raised. But there is another sense in which it is often used, i.e., that although the Court has power to decide the question it will not according to its settled practice do so except in a certain way and under certain circumstances."

1 [1915] 2 K. B. 536.

Once it is conceded that the declaration could be made if asked for by some one who wanted it for the purpose of getting consequential relief, it follows that what r. 237 has done is to remove the restriction imposed upon the making of such a declaration by the practice of the Court.

If we take the suit to be one asking for a declaratory decree, in my opinion, it falls within s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act. I do not see any reason why a limited meaning should be given to the word "property" in s. 42. It should be noted that the words are not "right to any property" but "right as to any property". I do not see why the benefit which a party is entitled to get out of a contract cannot be said to be his right as to property. The contention that s. 42 is not applicable where the plaintiff seeks a declaration as regards his liability is also, in my opinion, not correct. The best answer to that contention is to be found in ill. (c) to s. 42 which contemplates a suit to obtain a declaration by a person who has entered into a covenant to settle after-acquired property that the covenant is void for uncertainty even before any such property accrues, or any persons entitled under the trusts are ascertained.

The defendants' contention that even under the rules relating to originating summonses only a person who is entitled to a right can take out an originating summons and not a person who is under a liability, is also not maintainable. To give effect to that contention would be tantamount to saying that only one party to an instrument can ask for its construction. If the defendants' contention were correct, a vendor of immoveable property would not be entitled to take out an originating summons to have it determined that he is not bound to answer a general requisition as to encumbrances not noticed in the abstract, but a purchaser would be able to take out an originating summons to have it determined that the vendor is so bound. According to the defendants' contention a purchaser cannot take out an originating summons to have it determined that he is not liable to pay interest, while a vendor would be entitled to take out an originating summons to have it determined that he is entitled to interest. Similarly as regards compensation for deficiency in area, according to the defendants' contention, a purchaser can take out an originating summons for a declaration that he is entitled to compensation but a vendor cannot take out an originating summons to have it declared that the purchaser is not entitled to compensation. In rejecting this contention of the defendants I need only add that I would not have dealt with it at this length but for the emphasis with which the point was urged before me.

As regards the issue whether the plaint discloses a cause of action, if by the words "cause of action" the defendants mean a right to some relief in addition to a mere declaration, it may be said that there is no cause of action disclosed in the plaint as it stands. But I do not see why averments establishing a right to obtain a declaration from a Court of law without asking for further relief in cases where such declarations are allowed to be asked for do not constitute a good cause of action. There is no inherent want of jurisdiction in a Court to make a declaration without granting consequential relief. It was only because it was the settled practice of Courts not to make such declarations that actions for mere declarations were not allowed to be maintained. Once that disability is removed by a rule made by the Court there is no bar to such a suit, and the plaintiff who establishes facts which entitle him to obtain a declaration from the Court can be said to have a cause of action.

On behalf of the defendants reliance was placed on the case of Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company.<sup>1</sup> It seems to me that the defendants sought to rely more on the dissenting judgment of Lord Justice Buckley than on the propositions of law laid down in that case. Lord Justice Pickford in that case said that O. 25, r. 5, cannot be confined to cases where there is a cause of action apart from the rule, and that its effect was to give a general power to make a declaration whether there be a cause of action or not, and at the instance of any party who is interested in the subject-matter of the declaration. Lord Justice Bankes held that the rule applies where a person seeks relief, or in whom a right to relief is alleged to exist, and his application for a declaration is not refused merely because he cannot establish a legal cause of action, and that relief is not confined to relief in respect of a cause of action. Even Lord Justice Buckley who gave the dissenting judgment distinguished the case from those where declarations were asked for as to the construction of a document. At p. 554 he states as follows :—

"There are several cases...in which declarations have been made as to the construction of a document at the instance of some one of the parties to the document against the others. Those cases, in my opinion, throw no light upon the question which arises in the present case. There is a cause of action as between parties who by personal contract or statutory obligation are bound towards each other, and it arises from their mutual obligation."

In Clay, In re : Clay v. Booth,<sup>2</sup> certain beneficiaries asked for the construction of a deed of indemnity and for a declaration that the defendant who claimed to be indemnified under such indemnity was not entitled to repayment of the costs ordered to be paid by him. In that case the authority of Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company was recognised, but it was held that the Vice-Chancellor had no jurisdiction to make a declaratory order against the defendant as he had never made a claim that he was entitled to recover or to be repaid the costs, but he merely stated that he reserved his rights under the deed. Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company<sup>3</sup> was again followed by Earl of Reading C. J. in Barwick v. S. E. & C. R. Cos.<sup>4</sup> At pp. 196 and 197 he says as follows :—

"The law relating to the making of declarations under the Rules of the Supreme Court Order XXV, r. 5, was very elaborately discussed by the Court of Appeal in Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company, and no useful purpose would be served by again reviewing it. The Master of the Rolls, then Pickford L. J., said (p. 562) :—

'...the effect of the rule is to give a general power to make a declaration whether there be a cause of action or not, and at the instance of any party who is interested in the subject matter of the declaration.' I think the plaintiffs were interested in the subject matter, as were also the defendants. I find no authority which would preclude the Court from making the declaration. Indeed, in both decisions relied upon, I find support for the proposition that in an exceptional case where it is reasonably necessary for the purpose of doing justice, and where the declaration is sought by a party who is interested in the subject matter of the litigation, the Court could and should make the order."

The House of Lords by a majority judgment again affirmed the same principle in Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. British Bank for Foreign Trade, Ltd.<sup>1</sup> Lord Sumner at p. 452 said as follows :—

"For many years it had been accepted practice in cases in the Commercial List to hear and determine claims for a declaration of right, when a real and not a fictitious or academic question is involved and is in being between two parties, in order that they may know what business course to take without having to run the risk of acting and finding themselves liable in damages, when at last the matter is brought before the Court. I believe this practice, as hitherto applied, to be warranted by the rules, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal to that effect in the Guaranty Trust Case was correct."

Cases are not wanting in the English Courts where declarations have been made in respect of a liability instead of a right. In Societe Maritime Et Commerciale v. Venus Steam Shipping Co.,<sup>2</sup> where a contract "if it had been binding" would have continued in force for a year and a half and the breach of it would have involved the plaintiffs in heavy damages, the Court in an action brought by them claiming a declaration that they were not bound to perform the contract, granted the declaration as prayed. In Dyson v. Attorney-General<sup>3</sup> the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was under no obligation to comply with a particular notice issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or to furnish certain particulars to the person named in the notice. A summons to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action was dismissed, and ultimately when the case was argued on the merits, the declaration as asked for was given as in Dyson v. Attorney-General.<sup>4</sup>

The plaintiffs contend that s. 42 is not exhaustive of declaratory suits which can be entertained by Courts. So far as I am concerned, I am bound by the decision of the Appeal Court in Bai Shri Vaktuba v. Thakore Agar-singhji Raisinghji,<sup>5</sup> where at p. 680 Scott C. J. says as follows :—

"It has long been established that the general power vested in the Courts in India under the Civil Procedure Code to entertain all suits of a civil nature excepting suits of which cognizance is barred by any enactment for the time being in force, does not carry with it the general power of making declarations except in so far as such power is expressly conferred by statute."

Two decisions of the Privy Council may, however, be noticed. In Fischer v. Secretary of State for India in Council : Fisher v. Orr,<sup>6</sup> the suit was in substance to have the true construction of a statute declared and to have an act done in contravention of the statute rightly understood pronounced

Engineer J. character or title which would authorise them to ask for a declaratory decree — sought.

It might be open to the plaintiffs to contend, if necessary, that they need not even ask for a declaration, and that in fact no declaration is sought, and the decree in the suit if granted is not a declaratory decree. It might be open to them to contend that under r. 237 they are entitled to ask for the construction of the instrument without asking for a declaration of rights of the person interested. In fact prayer (a) as it stands at present does nothing more than ask for the construction of cl. (4) of the contract. It is not necessary for me to pursue this point further.

I am aware of the decision of Mr. Justice Mirza in Sripadnao v. Shankarrao,<sup>2</sup> where he held that a declaratory suit cannot lie in respect of rights arising out of a contract, following the decision in Ramkrishna v. Narayana.<sup>3</sup> In that suit, after referring to the judgment of the Appeal Court in Bai Shri Vaktuba v. Thakore Agarasinghji Raisinghji<sup>4</sup> and the decision in Ramkrishna v. Narayana, Mr. Justice Mirza said (p. 209) :—

“The present case is in respect of alleged rights arising out of a contract and such rights, in my opinion, cannot form the subject-matter of a declaratory suit.”

No English decisions on the question are referred to.

Earlier in my judgment I have referred to several cases where declarations were made in respect of contracts and I need not do more than only refer to the observations in the judgment of Lord Justice Buckley at p. 555 in Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay & Company,<sup>5</sup> where he says as follows :—

“There is a cause of action as between parties who by personal contract or statutory obligation are bound towards each other, and it arises from their mutual obligations.”

Even Ramkrishna v. Narayana,<sup>6</sup> which is followed by Mr. Justice Mirza, says (p. 83) :—

“... we do not think that there are exceptional circumstances in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule.”

It is contended that this decision of Mr. Justice Mirza is binding on me. But I am of opinion that it is merely obiter. Mr. Justice Mirza actually passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff for the amount which the plaintiff had since the institution of the suit paid in full satisfaction of his liability to the creditor. There was, therefore, no declaration left to be made. In any event I think that that decision is clearly distinguishable. In the first place there was no question of construction in the suit before Mr. Justice Mirza. The declaration asked for was nothing but the enunciation of a truism. Secondly, consequential relief was in fact asked for. Mr. Justice Mirza answered the issue, whether the plaint disclosed any cause of action, in the affirmative, and as regards the issue whether the suit was maintainable, he held that it was not maintainable in respect of declaratory prayer (a), but was maintainable in respect of prayer (b). I need not say more than that with all respect I doubt whether the proposition in the wide form in which it is laid down, namely, that a declaratory suit cannot lie in respect of rights arising out of a contract, is correct. It is, however, for the Appeal Court to deal with the matter if and when necessary.

Before I leave this part of the case, I ought to mention an argument advanced on behalf of the plaintiffs that s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act is not exhaustive of declaratory decrees so far at any rate as the Original Side of the High Court is concerned. The argument is put in the following manner :—

Supreme Courts were established in India in 1823. In 1852 for the first time Courts in England were given a right to make certain declaratory decrees by Statute 15 & 16 Vic. c. 86, known as the Chancery Procedure Act. A similar provision was enacted in India by Act VI of 1854, s. 29 of which was word for word the same as s. 50 of the Chancery Procedure Act of 1852. Act VI of 1854 applied only to Courts established by Royal Charter. Then followed Act VIII of 1859 which applied to Courts not established by Royal Charter. Section 15 of it was word for word the same as s. 29 of Act VI of 1854. Supreme Courts were abolished in India, and High Courts were established by the Charter of 1861. Both by this Charter and the amended Charter of 1863, the existing provisions applicable to Supreme Courts were declared applicable to High Courts. It is contended for the plaintiffs that Act VI of 1854 was never repealed, and that therefore under s. 29 of the Act, the Original Side of the High Court is entitled to make declaratory decrees. But this argument overlooks the fact that by cl. 37 of the Charter, Act VI of 1854 ceased to be applicable. At any rate that is how cl. 37 has always been construed. Apart from this, even if s. 29 of Act VI of 1854 were still in force, it has been held by the Privy Council that on a proper construction of that section Courts were entitled to make declarations only where further relief could be claimed but was not claimed. The decision I refer to is that in Kathama Natchiar v. Dorasinga Tever<sup>1</sup>. At p. 179 et seq. Sir James Colville discusses the question, and ultimately holds that on a proper construction of the section a declaratory decree cannot be made by the Court unless there be a right to consequential relief capable of being had in the same Court or in certain cases in some other Court. In that case it is stated that when the Supreme Court of

P. C. Calcutta ceased to exist, and the High Court was created, the Charter of 1940 the new Court required that Court to be guided in its original jurisdiction by the principles which had governed the Supreme Court. The judgment RANEEGUNJ then proceeds to state as follows (p. 187) :—
 COAL
 ASSOCIATION, “Unless, therefore, the limited construction put upon the clause by the Supreme LTD. Court is to prevail generally in all the Courts of India, we must come to the
 v. absurd conclusion that the same words are to be interpreted by the High Court
 TATA IRON in one sense when it is exercising its original jurisdiction or sitting on an appeal & STEEL CO., from a decree made under that jurisdiction, and in a different sense when it is LTD. sitting on an appeal from a Mofussil Court; and further that the Legislation has by the same form of words intended to make one law for the Mofussil Courts Engineer J. and another for those of the Presidency towns.”

Holding, as I do, that the Court has jurisdiction to make the decree asked for, and that the suit as framed is maintainable, I have no hesitation in saying that if it is a question of discretion, this is eminently a case where discretion should be exercised in favour of making a declaration. The wisdom of making such a declaration in a contract which has still some years to run, and under which situations like those in the two years mentioned in the plaint are likely to arise again and again, has been sufficiently indicated in the judgment of the Appeal Court when the matter was before it on the summons for stay.

I will now proceed to consider the question of the construction of cl. (4) of the contract. The agreement has already figured before the Privy Council in order to have another portion of it construed, and their Lordships of the Privy Council described the document as one whose drafting precision was imperfect thereby making greater liberty of interpretation permissible.

A year for the purpose of the contract is by cl. (4) stated to be a period of twelve calendar months commencing from April 1 and ending on March 31. Disregarding words which are not relevant in the present case cl. (4) of the contract stands as follows :—

“In the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year the price payable by the Buyers for the coal to be delivered during such year shall be settled and adjusted at annas eight per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal entered into by the Railway Board or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board for 9 months prior to the commencement of such year then by purchasers in the Calcutta Market Provided nevertheless that the price so to be settled and adjusted as aforesaid shall in no case be less than rupees three and annas twelve per ton.”

It is clear from the clause that the price is to be settled and adjusted in the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year. It is also clear that the price is to be settled and adjusted at annas eight per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract entered into by the Railway Board, that is, the latest contract up to January 31 immediately preceding the commencement of a year. It is also clear that the words “in the month of January etc.” at the commencement of cl. (4), as well as the words “the then latest contract” apply also to the words “by purchasers in the Calcutta Market”. Except for the difficulty created by the words “for nine months prior to the commencement of such year," it is clear that what the clause contemplates is that if there is no contract made by the Railway Board up to January 31 the price is to be settled and adjusted at annas eight per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract entered into by purchasers in the Calcutta market. The whole difficulty in construing the clause arises from the fact that in respect of the second alternative, namely, the one which contemplates the rates of contracts by private purchasers being made the basis of fixing the contract rate, the words used are "for nine months prior to the commencement of such year". It is common ground that there was no contract by the Railway Board or other similar authority up to January 31, but that there were contracts entered into by the Railway Board after January 31 and before April 1. The defendants contend that on the proper construction of cl. (4) the price is to be fixed at annas eight per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the latest contract between February 1 and March 31 immediately preceding the commencement of the year. The plaintiffs deny this construction. They say that to give effect to it would be to ignore and in fact to contradict two clear provisions in the contract, viz., (a) that the price is to be settled and adjusted in the month of January, and (b) that the contract of purchasers in the Calcutta Market, which is to form the basis of fixing the contract rate must also be the latest contract up to January 31.

It is clear that the earlier part of the clause which mentions the month of January defines the end of the period in which contracts entered into either by the Railway Board or by purchasers in the Calcutta market are to be taken into consideration. If nothing more was said, there would be no indication of the commencement of that period. If the commencement of the period is not defined, it would be open to the parties to contend that the basis of fixing the contract rate should be the rate of a contract entered into by the Railway Board at any time, no matter how long before January 31. It was for this reason that the words ("for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" seem to have been put in.

I will first consider whether it is possible to read cl. (4) in the manner suggested by the defendants. The defendants want the clause to be read as containing a provision that in the event of there being no contract by the Railway Board between July 1 and January 31, the rates of contracts entered into by the Railway Board in the months of February and March following, should form the basis for fixing the contract rate. It is contended for the defendants that the intention of the parties was to take as far as possible the rates of the Railway Board, but only preference was to be given in the first instance to contracts made up to January. They cannot support this construction unless they ask the Court, which they do, to delete the words "in the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of the year" which occur in the commencement of the clause, and which clearly apply to both the alternatives, viz., to the taking of the rates of contracts of Railway Board, as well as to the taking of the rates of contracts of private purchasers. They also ask the Court, in order to support their construction, to delete the words "the then latest." In my opinion it is impossible to read into the clause a provision by which the rates of contracts

P. C. entered into by either the Railway Board or private purchasers after January 1940 31 are to form the basis of fixing the contract rate. Even if the words "for RANERGUNJ nine months prior to the commencement of such year" are read strictly in COAL their literal sense, all that can be urged is that the contingency on which the ASSOCIATION, rates of contracts entered into by private purchasers are to be taken into LTD. consideration, has not occurred. I asked counsel for the defendants to put
 v. down in writing the clause, as he wanted the Court to read it, and to state TATA IRON how the defendants asked the Court to read cl. (4) in that way. The diffi-& STEEL CO., culty of asking the Court to read the clause in the manner suggested by the
 LTD. defendants became obvious when this was attempted. Ultimately counsel Engineer J. for the defendants suggested two alternatives of reading cl. (4), so as to bring out the sense which he suggested. The first rendering suggested was as follows :—

"In the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year (which term shall for the purpose of this agreement be deemed to mean a period of twelve calendar months commencing on April 1 and ending on March 31), the price payable by the buyers for the coal to be delivered during such year shall be settled and adjusted at annas eight per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal loaded into waggons at Colliery Siding entered into by the Railway Board or if that Board shall have been abolished then by such authority as shall be constituted or established in its place (or if there be no such contract the price payable shall be settled and adjusted at eight annas per ton above the price payable under contracts made by such Board or authority during the next two months) or if no such authority shall be established or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year then by purchasers in the Calcutta Market provided nevertheless that the price so to be settled and adjusted as aforesaid shall in no case be less than Rupees three and annas twelve per ton."

The second rendering suggested was as follows :—

"The price payable by the buyers for the coal to be delivered during any year shall be settled and adjusted at annas eight above the price payable under or in respect of the latest contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal loaded into waggons at Colliery Siding entered into by the Railway Board or if that Board shall have been abolished then by such authority as shall be constituted or established in its place (in the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year which term shall for the purpose of this agreement be deemed to mean a period of twelve calendar months commencing on April 1 and ending on March 31), or if there be no such contract then under purchasers by such Railway Board or authority during the next two months, or if no such authority shall be established or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year then by purchasers in the Calcutta market provided nevertheless that the price so to be settled and adjusted as aforesaid shall in no case be less than Rs. 3 and annas 12 per ton."

According to the first rendering, the defendants want the Court to add into the clause the words "or if there be no such contract, the price payable shall be settled and adjusted at annas eight per ton above the price payable under contracts made by such Board or authority during the next two months." Besides this addition, the rendering suggested by the defendants involves the alteration that the rate to be taken in respect of contracts made by purchasers in the Calcutta market is not to be the rate of the latest contract up to January 31 but the rates of contracts entered into for nine months prior to the commencement of the year. The rendering suggested by the defendants also involves the deletion of the provision that in all cases the rates are to be fixed in January.

P. C.
1940

The second rendering suggested involves even more radical alterations. The words in the commencement of the clause "in the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year" are taken away, and the word "then" before "the latest" is also deleted, and the words "in the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year" are put after the words "or established in its place." The effect of this alteration is to take away from the clause the meaning which is plain as the clause now stands that the price is to be fixed in January, and instead of that the words "in the month of January" are made to qualify the words "the latest contract." As this is not enough to bring out the sense for which the defendants contend, they have to add the words "or if there is no such contract then under purchases by such Railway Board or authority during the next two months." The effect of the alteration so made includes the effect of the purchasers' contract being not the latest contract up to January but up to March.

TATA IRON
LTD.
Engineer J.

I confess I do not see how the Court in construing the clause is entitled to make such radical alterations as are suggested by the defendants, and which are necessary in order to bring out the sense which the defendants contend for.

The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the instrument as it stands, aided by facts showing in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts. On the language of cl. (4) as it stands, there can be no doubt that the intention of the parties was that the price was to be fixed in January and that the basis of such price was to be the then latest contract either of the Railway Board or failing that of purchasers in the Calcutta market. It is true that the words "if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" do not harmonize with the words "then by the purchasers in the Calcutta market" governed as these words are by the phrase "the then latest contract entered into." But the utmost that can be contended on behalf of the defendants is that if the words "if no such purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" are read in their strict literal sense, then in the circumstances which have happened, viz., that there is no contract by the Railway Board up to January 31 but there are contracts subsequent to January 31 and before April 1, the alternative by which the price payable under contracts by purchasers in the Calcutta market is to form the basis does not come into operation at all. There are, therefore, two alternatives before the Court construing the clause, (1) that the contract makes no provision for the price being fixed in the event of there being no contract of the Railway Board up to January 31, but there being contracts after January 31 and before April 1—a situation which could hardly have been intended by the parties—and (2) that the words "for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" should be so construed as to always bring into operation when necessary the second alternative, namely "the price payable under contracts

P. C. entered into by purchasers in the Calcutta market" as the basis of fixing the 1940 contract rate. In view of the fact that in both the alternatives the clause — contemplates the fixing of the rates in January, I am of opinion that in con-RANNEGUNJ COAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. struing the document the strict meaning of the words "for nine months"
 " should not be adopted. If once it is clear that the clause does not contemplate taking into consideration the rates of contracts entered into by the TATA IRON & STEEL CO., LTD. Railway Board subsequent to January 31, the contingency of there being no — contract by the Railway Board in February or March is irrelevant for the purposes of the contract. In my opinion, the words "for nine months prior Engineer J. to the commencement of such year" were used only in order to fix the start— ing point of the period in which contracts either of the Railway Board or by private purchasers were to be the basis of fixing the contract rate, the terminus having already been clearly fixed as January 31. I, therefore, hold that the words "for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" should be read as "for a period commencing from nine months prior to the commencement of such year." The construction which I adopt has, I think, the merit of making cl. (4) exhaustive and of not doing violence to any of the unequivocal provisions of the clause.

It is contended that even in the clause as it stands, the fixing of the rates in January is not possible, if either of the parties chooses to wait up to the last day of the month for the latest contract in January. That argument, however, does not appeal to me. On January 31 the parties are entitled under the clause to sit together to fix the rates and the price of the then latest contract made by the Railway Board would be the basis of fixing the price.

If, however, I am wrong in the construction which I put on the words "for nine months prior to the commencement of such year," and if the words are to be read according to their strict literal meaning, the only result would be that the parties have made no provision by their contract for the price being fixed in the event of there being no Railway contract up to January 31, but there being Railway contracts in February or March and in that event the purchasers would be bound to pay and the sellers would be entitled to recover price for the coal supplied at a reasonable price. It is conceded by both sides that the proviso at the end of the clause fixing the minimum rate of Rs. 3 and annas 12 only applies if the rate is fixed in either of the ways mentioned in the clause.

The defendants wanted to lead extrinsic evidence to support their construction of the clause. They wanted to put in certain letters in order to prove (a) that as a matter of fact the parties never fixed the rates in January and (b) that when there were no contracts of the Railway Board up to the end of January the parties settled the rates on contracts of the Railway Board in February or March. The letters which the defendants tendered were marked Y-1. The plaintiffs contended that the evidence tendered was inadmissible, that if the evidence was admitted, the whole correspondence should be admitted and the letters which they submitted would in that event be relevant were marked X-1. The defendants also wanted to prove that in the years 1930-1931 and 1931-32, the plaintiffs paid to the defendants at a rate of annas eight above that of the Railway Board contracts later than January in the preceding year. The object of proving the said allegations was to show that in fact the agreement between the parties was not to fix a price in January, and to show that they did agree to take the rates of contracts by the Railway Board subsequent to January 31. But I held that evidence to be inadmissible. If the clause clearly states, as I hold it does, that the price is to be fixed in January, in my opinion, no evidence can be led to contradict it. If the clause contains no provision that the rates of contracts either of the Railway Board or of private purchasers entered into subsequent to January 31 are to be taken into account, in my opinion, no evidence can be led to add to the terms of the clause by putting in the provision which the defendants seek to do in either of the renderings which they suggested of cl. (4).

The question of the admissibility of this evidence was argued at great length before me. Some ancient and modern authorities were cited by counsel for the defendants in support of their contention that the evidence was admissible. The latest English authority cited on the point was Watcham v. East Africa Protectorate,<sup>1</sup> where it was held that—

“The principle that when an instrument contains an ambiguity evidence of user under it may be given in order to show the sense in which the parties used the language employed, applies to a modern as well as to an ancient instrument, and where the ambiguity is patent as well as where it is latent.”

In my opinion, English authorities on the point are entirely out of place. In Balkishen Das v. Legge,<sup>2</sup> decided in 1899, the Privy Council in the judgment delivered by Lord Davey observed as follows (p. 65) :—

“Evidence of the respondent and of a person named Mani was admitted by the Subordinate Judge for the purpose of proving the real intention of the parties, and such evidence was to some extent relied on in both Courts. Their Lordships do not think that oral evidence of intention was admissible for the purpose of construing the deeds or ascertaining the intention of the parties. By s. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act ... no evidence of any oral agreement or statement can be admitted as between the parties to any such instrument or their representatives in interest for the purpose of contradicting, varying, or adding to or subtracting from its terms subject to the exceptions contained in the several provisos. It was conceded that this case could not be brought within any of them. The cases in the English Court of Chancery which were referred to by the learned Judges in the High Court have not, in the opinion of their Lordships, any application to the law of India as laid down in the Acts of the Indian Legislature. The case must therefore be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves, with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as may be required to shew in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts.”

Even after this decision, there was a conflict of decisions in India as to whether notwithstanding the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, equitable principles applied by Courts in England in order to give relief were applicable in India. So far as our High Court is concerned, Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Dattoo v. Ramchandra<sup>3</sup> observed as follows (p. 670) :—

“But it has been pointed out by the Privy Council in Balkishen Das v. W. F. Legge that in questions of this kind the Courts in India must be guided by s. 92 of the Evidence Act; and that we cannot have recourse to those equitable principles which enable the Court of Chancery to give relief in those cases of which Alderson

RANBEGUNJ COAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. In my opinion it makes no difference whether the extrinsic evidence is
 v. tendered as of oral statements or of conduct. It will be noticed that part TATA IRON & STEEL CO., LTD. of the evidence tendered in Dattoo v. Ramchandra was of conduct, viz. that, notwithstanding the execution of the deed, the plaintiff's father remained in — possession until his death, and that after his death his widow remained in possession for three years, and that there was no transfer of the land into the Engineer J. khata of the transferee. The conflict of decisions in India was ultimately — set at rest by another decision of the Privy Council in Maung Kym v. Ma Shwe La.<sup>3</sup> At p. 242, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline says as follows :—

“Founding upon this section, the respondents maintain that the whole of the evidence led must be rejected. On the contrary, the appellants maintain that, notwithstanding the terms of the section, they are entitled to set up and prove the acts and conduct of the parties as inconsistent with the transfer of property and only consistent with the true nature of the transaction having been one of mortgage or transfer of mortgage. They found upon a considerable body of authority to that effect, the cases cited being Baksu Lakshman v. Govinda Kanji,<sup>4</sup> Hem Chunder Soor v. Kally Churn Das,<sup>5</sup> Rakken v. Alagappudayan,<sup>6</sup> Preonath Shaha v. Madhu Sudan Bhuiya,<sup>7</sup> Khankar Abdur Rahman v. Ali Hafez<sup>8</sup> and Mahomed Ali Hossein v. Nazar Ali.<sup>9</sup> The judgment of Melville J. in the first of these cases is repeatedly founded upon in the course of the series, in which that learned Judge expressly followed the English equity doctrine as expressed in Lincoln v. Wright<sup>10</sup> by Turner L. J. thus :— ‘The principle of the Court is that the Statute of Frauds was not made to cover fraud. If the real agreement in this case was that as between the plaintiff and Wright the transaction should be a mortgage transaction, it is in the eye of this Court a fraud to insist on the conveyance as being absolute, and parol evidence must be admissible to prove the fraud.’

“In the opinion of their Lordships, this series of cases definitely ceased to be of binding authority after the judgment of this Board pronounced by Lord Davey in the case of Balkishen Das v. Legge.<sup>11</sup> It was there held that oral evidence was not admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of parties to written documents. Lord Davey cites s. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act and adds : “The cases in the English Court of Chancery which were referred to by the learned judges in the High Court have not, in the opinion of their Lordships, any application to the law of India as laid down in the Acts of the Indian Legislature. The case must therefore be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves, with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as may be required to shew in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts.”

“Notwithstanding the decision of this Board, however, a certain conflict of authority on the subject still remains in India. But the respondents rightly refer to Achutaramaraju v. Subbaraju,<sup>12</sup> Maung Bin v. Ma Hlaing,<sup>13</sup> and Dattoo v. Ramchandra,<sup>14</sup> and in particular to the judgment of Jenkins C. J. in the last case. In these the judgment of the Board, as pronounced by Lord Davey, has been rightly followed and applied."

It is conceded that the admissibility of the evidence cannot be supported by any section in chapter VI of the Indian Evidence Act. All that is contended is that the conduct of the parties is relevant under s. 8 of the Indian Evidence Act. The relevant words of that section on which reliance is placed are as follows :—

"The conduct of any party, to any suit or proceeding in reference to any fact in issue therein is relevant if such conduct influences or is influenced by any fact in issue or relevant fact and whether it was previous or subsequent thereto."

In my opinion, s. 8 is not applicable to this case at all.

As a matter of fact, if we examine English decisions we find that in many cases the evidence admitted in England would also be admissible under the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, as for instance, the evidence admitted in Watcham v. East Africa Protectorate<sup>1</sup> would equally be admissible under s. 97 of the Indian Evidence Act.

For the defendants, reliance was also placed on the Privy Council decision in Ma Thaung v. Ma Than,<sup>2</sup> where we find the following observation in the judgment of the Privy Council delivered by Mr. Ameer Ali (p. 8) :—

"The conduct of the parties to a contract reduced into writing may not vary or alter it, but their conduct may help to explain or elucidate a contract open to different meanings. The mode, therefore, in which the sons and daughters of U. Nyein dealt with their shares is material : it helps to strengthen the conclusion that exhibit L was more a record of a division of rights and interest rather than a deed of partnership."

But that case does not, in my opinion, help the defendants. In the first place, the evidence tendered in the present case can hardly be said to be tendered to explain or elucidate the contract. On the contrary, in my opinion, the evidence is meant to contradict, and add to, the written terms of the contract. Secondly, the case of Ma Thaung v. Ma Than is clearly distinguishable. There the matter was not as between the parties to the instrument. The wife of the deceased who said that the instrument was a partition deed was not a party to the instrument. Section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act clearly applied only as between the parties to any such instrument or their representatives in interest, and s. 99 provides that persons who are not parties to a document, or their representatives in interest may give evidence of any facts tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the document. Moreover, the conduct referred to in Ma Thaung v. Ma Than was an admission of the father and sons that it was a partition and not a partnership deed.

In Vassanji Khimji v. Shapurji Burjorji,<sup>3</sup> a case decided by the Privy Council, we find in the judgment of Lord Macnaghten the following observation (p. 395) :—

"Everybody is now agreed that what took place after the execution of that document can have no bearing on the construction of it."

In the same report at p. 639, there is another case of Raghoji Rao Saheb v.

But that case does not say that the evidence was admitted irrespective of the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, or on the strength of principles of English law. The question there was whether the land comprised in a sanad granted by Government and described as "lands attached to Deur" meant the lands limited to the village of Deur itself, or whether the lands extended to the possessions in the Satara District, or whether they covered the possessions as a whole which lay within the Presidency of Bombay. Neither party to the case maintained that the grant should be confined to the lands in the village of Deur alone; and it was conceded by the respondent that other lands in the Satara District must be held to be included. I do not think that the decision in Raghoji Rao Saheb v. Lakshmanrao Saheb helps the defendants in any way.

There will be a declaration in terms of the answer to issue No. 3.

As regards the costs of the suit, if the contest had been confined merely to the construction of the contract, I might have made no order as to costs. But a considerable part of the hearing before me was taken up by issues 1 and 2, viz. whether the plaint discloses a cause of action, and whether the suit is maintainable. On the whole I see no reason why I should not direct the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the costs of the suit and I order accordingly.

On appeal, the Appeal Court (Beaumont C. J. and Blackwell J.) dismissed the appeal on September 20, 1937, but by consent of the parties varied the decree by providing that the price of the coal should be calculated, not on the footing of the latest purchaser's contract, but at eight annas per ton over that rate.

The following judgments were delivered by their Lordships :—

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice-Engineer. In the Court below four issues were raised, but in this Court the findings of the learned Judge on issues 1 and 2, and his decision that evidence of user under the agreement was not admissible, have not been challenged, and the only question argued in appeal has been as to the construction of the agreement in suit.

That agreement is dated January 16, 1919, and is made between the Ranee-gunje Coal Association, Ltd., of the one part, and the Tata Iron and Steel Co., Ltd., of the other part, and it provides for the supply of coal by the Coal Company to the Tata Company. Clause 4 deals with the method of fixing the price of the coal. The agreement has already been before the Privy Council in connection with the construction of other clauses, and their Lordships pointed out that the agreement is drafted in terms which are by no means precise, and that therefore greater liberty of interpretation is permissible.

in the construction of the agreement than would be the case if the Court were construing a statute. Clause 4, so far as relevant, provides as follows :—

P.C.

“In the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year” (and a year is defined for the purposes of the agreement as meaning a period of twelve months commencing on April 1 and ending on March 31) “the price payable by the buyers of the coal to be delivered during such year shall be settled and adjusted at eight annas per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal by the Railway Board or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board for nine months prior to the commencement of such year, then by purchasers in the Calcutta market.”

ASSOCIATION, LTD.
v.
TATA IRON
LTD.

It is agreed that in respect of the year in suit, which is the year commencing April 1, 1932, there were no contracts by the Railway Board for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal between July 1, 1931, and January 31, 1932, but there were such contracts entered into in February or March, 1932. The question to be determined is how, on those facts, the price of coal for the year commencing April 1, 1932, is to be fixed under cl. (4) ?

Four alternative constructions of cl. (4) have been suggested. The first is that there is a hiatus and in the events which have happened, the parties have not fixed the price at all, for the year in question, since there being no contract by the Railway Board for the period, July 1 to January 31, the price could not be fixed on any such contract in January, and there having been a purchase by the Board in the nine months prior to April 1, 1932, the condition on which recourse was to be had to purchase in the Calcutta market did not arise. Therefore, it is suggested, the parties have not agreed on the method of fixing the price, and the price must be a reasonable price, which, I suppose, in practice would mean that, unless the parties came to an agreement, the matter would have to be referred to arbitration. I agree with the learned Judge in the Court below in thinking that cl. (4) was intended to be comprehensive, and that we ought not to hold that in the events which have happened the method of fixing the price is not specified, if there is any other reasonable construction of the clause open.

The construction for which Mr. Coltman on behalf of the appellants contends is this. He says that the object of cl. (4) was to fix the method of ascertaining the price, rather than the date at which the price was to be ascertained, that the governing consideration was to be the purchase by the Railway Board of Jharriah coal, that that price was to be fixed in the month of January but only if and so far as practicable. He admits that the terminus a quo for contracts to be taken into consideration in fixing the price was to be nine months before the expiration of the year, i.e. July 1, extracting that provision from the condition on which recourse was to be had to purchase in the Calcutta market. He says that contracts having been entered into in February and March by the Board, such contracts should be taken into account, because they come within the period of nine months before the expiration of the year, and he says that as this price obviously cannot be taken into account in January, the provision fixing the price in January must give way to the paramount intention of basing the price on contracts made by the Railway Board. The drawback to that construction is that it undoubtedly involves a considerable amount of alteration in the language of the clause, as was shown by the alternative clauses written out by the plaintiffs' counsel in the Court below designed to carry out his construction, and further such construction does undoubtedly give the go-bye to the provisions of cl. (4) as to fixing the price in January. The construction contended for by the respondents which found favour in the Court below is that the price is to be fixed in January, and that the reference to no purchases having been made by the Board for nine months prior to the commencement of the year was intended really to fix the terminus a quo for the start of the period in which the contracts to be taken into account must have been entered into, and in this appeal it has been common ground between the parties that cl. (4) does fix the terminus a quo as at July 1, 1931. The learned Judge pointed out that in adopting the construction which he favoured he was making a very small verbal alteration in the terms of cl. (4) of the contract. For the words, "for nine months prior to the commencement of such year" he reads the words, "for a period commencing from nine months prior to the commencement of such year." No doubt that is a small verbal alteration, and Courts of construction are always justified in altering the language which the parties have used if the Court is satisfied that it is necessary to do so in order to give effect to the intention of the parties to be ascertained from the contract as a whole. But I cannot help observing that the alteration, though small in form, very materially affects the meaning of cl. (4). It converts what is in terms a condition precedent for having recourse to purchases in the Calcutta market into a provision fixing the period in which contracts either by the Railway Board or in the Calcutta market, to be taken into account in fixing prices must have come into existence, and it involves having recourse to the Calcutta market otherwise than on the condition specified. On the other hand it seems tolerably clear that cl. (4) was based on the hypothesis that the Railway Board would enter into contracts by January, and I think there is certainly force in the learned Judge's view that the reference to nine months before the commencement of the year was intended to introduce a period behind which the parties could not go in relation to contracts relied on for fixing the price, and both parties agreed that this is so.

It appears to me that there is a fourth construction open which is based on a literal reading of cl. (4) and that is this. The parties meet in January to fix the price. They first of all fix a price on the then latest contract entered into by the Railway Board, whatever the date of that contract may be, and even if it was entered into before the commencement of the year in question. I will call that price, Price A. Then, if there has been no such contract since July 1, and as the condition for having recourse to purchasers in the Calcutta market, may or may not come into operation, they fix an alternative price based on the then latest contract entered into in the Calcutta market. I will call that Price B. They then have to wait until the expiration of the year, that is, March 31, in order to find out which of these two prices is to operate. If there has in fact been no contract for purchase by the Railway Board during the nine months previous to the expiration of the year, that is, since July 1, then Price B operates. If, on the other hand, there has been a purchase, as there was in this case, in February or March, then Price A operates, that price being based on the latest contract in January, and not on the February or March contracts. That construction, which has not been put forward by either of the parties, seems to me to have the advantage of doing no violence to the language of cl. (4), but, on the other hand, it has, I think, the disadvantage of reaching a conclusion which probably neither of the parties intended or contemplated. It is very unlikely that they intended to base the price for the current year on a contract which might have been entered into before the current year commenced. It seems moreover capricious to make recourse to purchasers in the Calcutta market dependent on the non-existence of February or March contracts by the Board, when such contracts were in any event irrelevant for fixing the price for the current year. I confess to feeling very considerable doubt as to what the true construction of this clause is. My learned brother Blackwell is of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is correct, and I realise that there is a great deal to be said in favour of that view. I myself doubt whether the Court is justified on normal canons of construction in turning a condition precedent into something quite different when it is possible to give literal effect to the clause as drafted. However, I am reluctant to deliver a differing judgment, particularly as the case is one which will probably go to the Privy Council, and a hearing before a third Judge would therefore involve the parties in unnecessary expense. Though I feel a certain amount of doubt as to the correctness of the judgment appealed from, my doubt is not so strong as to induce me to differ from my learned brother. I agree, therefore, though with hesitation, that the appeal should be dismissed.

BLACKWELL J. Mr. Coltman has argued that it is impossible, reading cl. (4) as a whole, that the parties should have intended that the price payable by the buyers for the coal to be delivered during the year, which is defined in the clause, should be fixed in the month of January, having regard to the fact that, as he contends, a period of nine months must elapse from July 1, 1931, before it can be ascertained whether resort can be had to purchases made in the Calcutta market. His argument is that the words "then latest contract" do not refer to the month of January, but refer to what turns out to be the then latest contract at the time of settlement and adjustment, which, he says, can in no circumstances take place until after March 31, 1932, that being the expiration of nine months from the preceding July 1. In my opinion that construction does great violence to the natural meaning of the words used in the earlier part of the clause. Those words, in my view, clearly contemplate that the price payable by the purchasers is to be settled and adjusted at eight annas per ton above the price payable in respect of the then latest contract for the purchase of the coal in question, and it seems to me that the then latest contract can only mean the latest contract by January 31, which is the date upon which the price, in the words of the clause itself, shall be settled and adjusted. I think that such violence would be done to the words of the clause by adopting Mr. Coltman's suggested construction, involving as it does the alterations to which the learned trial Judge refers in his judgment, that that construction is one which the Court should not adopt, if there is any other possible or reasonable construction.

The learned Chief Justice in the course of his judgment has suggested a construction which has not been put forward by either of the parties to this appeal. It is at first sight, no doubt, an attractive construction, because it does not involve reading into the clause any words which are not there. But speaking for myself, I feel it is impossible to suppose that commercial people would sit down in January to fix in the manner which he suggests hypothetical prices, which they might thereafter be compelled to alter, having regard to subsequent events. I do not think that commercial people would be likely to adopt such a course, and I feel that that cannot have been what they had in mind when this very unsatisfactory clause was drafted.

I have come to the conclusion that the construction placed by the learned trial Judge on this clause, and his finding on issue 3, which is the only issue before us, was right. Reading the clause as a whole, it seems to me that it makes it incumbent upon the parties to the agreement not later than January 31 to fix the price payable in accordance with the then latest contract entered into by the Railway Board or the then latest contract entered into by purchasers in the Calcutta market, if by January 31 there was no such latest contract entered into by the Railway Board from the preceding July 1. It is quite true that the words which give rise to difficulty are, "or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year then by purchasers in the Calcutta market." But the words "by purchasers in the Calcutta market" are, in my opinion, plainly governed by the words "in the month of January the price payable shall be settled at eight annas per ton above the price payable in respect of the then latest contract". It seems to me that the parties meeting in January had to look back to a commencing period which would begin at nine months prior to the commencement of the year with which they had to deal, namely the next April 1. That would take them back to July 1, 1931. It is quite true that they would not be able in January to look at contracts entered into for the full period of nine months from the preceding July 1, and that, no doubt, is a difficulty in giving full effect to the words used. But, in my opinion, less violence is done to the contract as a whole by adopting this construction than by adopting the alternative construction contended for by Mr. Coltman. I, therefore, agree that the learned Judge was right, and that this appeal fails.

PER CURIAM. By consent decree will be varied by providing that the price will be calculated, not as the decree said, on the footing of the latest purchaser's contract, but at eight annas per ton over that rate. Subject to that variation the appeal is dismissed with costs.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. The point for decision on this appeal is the true construction of one clause in an agreement dated January 16, 1919, and made between the appellants and the respondents. By the agreement the appellants (called therein "the sellers") sell to the respondents (called therein "the buyers") the output of coal from certain seams in their collieries, for a period which commenced on April 1, 1921, and which has still a few years to run.

The clause in question is the 4th clause, which runs as follows :—

"In the month of January immediately preceding the commencement of a year (which term shall for the purpose of this agreement be deemed to mean a period of twelve calendar months commencing on the first day of April and ending on the thirty-first day of March) the price payable by the buyers for the coal to be delivered during such year shall be settled and adjusted at eight annas per ton above the price payable under or in respect of the then latest contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal loaded into wagons at colliery siding entered into by the Railway Board or if that Board shall have been abolished then by such authority as shall be constituted or established in its place or if no such authority shall be established or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year then purchasers in the Calcutta Market provided nevertheless that the price so to be settled and adjusted as aforesaid shall in no case be less than Rupees three and annas twelve per ton."

A consideration of the clause reveals the fact that it contains two features or provisions, which, if construed according to their literal and grammatical meaning, are inconsistent with each other—viz. (1) The first part, ending with the words "Railway Board", is a provision that the price for each contract year shall be settled and adjusted in the preceding month of January on the basis of the then latest contract of the Railway Board; whereas (2) the substituted provision for that settlement and adjustment in the month of January being made on the basis of Calcutta market contracts, is brought into operation in an event, the happening or non-happening of which cannot be ascertained until two months later than the end of January.

The difficulty which may arise is obvious; and it did in fact arise in connection with the contract year commencing on April 1, 1932. The Railway Board made no contracts of the kind specified in the clause (which may conveniently be called relevant contracts) at any time between July 1, 1931, and January 31, 1932; but the Railway Board did enter into relevant contracts after January 31, 1932, and before April 1, 1932.

A difference thereupon arose between the parties, and it became necessary to have the clause authoritatively construed; and for that purpose the respondents instituted the present suit in which, as ultimately settled by the Court, the relief sought took the following form :—

"(a) Whether on the true construction of Clause 4 of the agreement of January 16, 1919, and on the basis of there being no contract for the purchase of first class Jharriah coal made by the Railway Board or any similar authority between July 1 and January 31 following the plaintiffs are entitled to have the price of the coal supplied by the defendant under the agreement in the year commencing from the following April 1 calculated on the footing of the latest purchaser's contract in the Calcutta market entered into during the said period i.e. between July 1 and January 31 following; or on what other basis such price should be calculated."

It will be observed that what is sought is to have the clause construed without reference to the events of any particular year, but upon a specified basis.

The plaintiffs contended that by the clause the price for the subsequent contract year has to be settled and adjusted by the end of January by reference to the then latest Railway Board relevant contract, but that if no such contract had been entered into between the preceding July 1 and January 31, the price must be settled and adjusted by reference to the then latest contract entered into by purchasers in the Calcutta market during the same period.

On the other hand the defendants contended that the price for each contractual year must be settled and adjusted primarily by reference to the price of the latest relevant contract of the Railway Board made in the period from the preceding July 1 to March 31, and that recourse could only be had to market contracts if no such contract had been made by the Railway Board during that period.

Engineer J. decided in favour of the plaintiffs' view, and made a declaration in terms of the relief prayed. An appeal from that decree was dismissed, but a declaration (amended in a small detail) was substituted for that contained in the original decree. Beaumont C. J. while not, it would seem, favouring the contention of the defendants, felt some doubt about the correctness of the plaintiffs' construction. His doubt, however, was not strong enough to induce him to dissent. He seems to have preferred a construction suggested by himself, for which neither party contended, and which seems to their Lordships open to the objection that it provides for the settlement and adjustment of two alternatives and contingent prices in January, a proceeding which none of the language used would appear to justify. Blackwell J. agreed with Engineer J. thinking that less violence was done to the language used by adopting the declared construction than by adopting the construction contended for by the defendants.

After consideration of close and careful arguments before the Board, their Lordships find themselves in agreement with the Courts in Bombay.

That there exists an apparent inconsistency according to the literal construction of the words used is clear; and in such a case if by any other reasonably possible construction the apparent inconsistencies can be reconciled, that construction should be adopted.

Turning to the clause in question it is to be observed that the whole clause, from beginning to end, hinges on and is governed by the mandatory provision that the price for each contract year shall be settled and adjusted in the preceding January. In each of the three cases of "then latest" contracts which are specified (viz. Railway Board contracts, substituted-authority contracts, and market contracts) they must, according to the clause, be under consideration at the settlement and adjustment in the month of January; and in every case the word "then" must, and can only, refer to the only point of time mentioned in the clause, viz., the month of January. No other meaning is capable of being assigned to the language used. The same, however, is not true of the words which create the apparent inconsistency, viz.

"or if no purchase shall have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year, etc."

The point of time when the necessary enquiry or investigation as to the existence of contracts of the Board or authority has to be made, is unchanged.

It is still the time of the settlement and adjustment in January. The words accordingly may well mean "if no purchase shall, at the time of the settlement and adjustment in January, have been made by such Board or authority for nine months prior to the commencement of such year." In such a context it does but little violence to the last ten words to construe them as referring to a period which commences nine months before April 1 and ends at the time of the settlement and adjustment. The position accordingly is this : that of the two portions of the clause which disclose the inconsistency, one is susceptible of a possible construction different from its literal meaning, while the other is not : and if the possible construction is applied all inconsistency disappears. That construction must therefore be adopted.

Lord Russell

This alternative construction of the clause is not, their Lordships think, open to the objection which seems to have pressed upon the Chief Justice. It does not convert a condition precedent into anything other than a condition precedent ; nor does it involve having recourse to the Calcutta market otherwise than on the condition specified, except of course according to the literal meaning of the words used. What the Courts in Bombay have done is, in order to reconcile two apparent inconsistencies, to attribute to the words used a meaning which the words used are capable of bearing, though different from their literal meaning. The condition precedent so construed remains as a condition precedent, and the condition specified by the agreement is the condition as so construed.

It was suggested that the reason why the month of January was mentioned in the clause was, or might be, because at the date of the agreement the Railway Board was wont to make its coal contracts during the period between July and January. It is not for a Court to speculate as to the reasons which may have dictated the employment of the language used in a contract ; indeed if any such speculation were allowable, it could equally be suggested, as a commercial reason, that the month of January was selected in order to afford the buyers sufficient time in which to make their other commercial arrangements, with a knowledge of the price which they would then be paying for their coal.

For the reasons indicated their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

v.

NAWAB.

Custom—Mahomedans—Succession—Customary law applicable to Tulla clan in the Punjab—Non-ancestral estate—Married daughters whether take precedence over collaterals of tenth degree—Antiquity of custom—Proof of.

Under the customary law applicable to the Mahomedan Tulla clan resident in the Shahpur district in the Punjab, collaterals of the tenth degree of a deceased landowner do not take precedence over his married daughters in succession to his non-ancestral estate.

The English rule that "a custom, in order that it may be legal and binding, must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" does not apply to conditions in India. A custom observed in a particular district derives its force from the fact that it has, from long usage, obtained in that district the force of law. It must be ancient, but it is not of the essence of this rule that its antiquity must in every case be carried back to a period beyond the memory of man. It will depend upon the circumstances of each case what antiquity must be established before the custom can be accepted. What is necessary to be proved is that the usage has been acted upon in practice for such a long period and with such invariability as to show that it has, by common consent, been submitted to as the established governing rule of the particular district.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Lahore.

The facts appear fully in the judgment.

Sir Hari Singh Gour and S. P. Khambatta, for the appellants.

Respondents did not appear.

MR. M. R. JAYAKAR. The question in this appeal is whether, under the customary law applicable to the members of the Tulla clan resident at mauza Mahamad Tulla in the tahsil and district of Shahpur in the Punjab, collaterals of the tenth degree of a deceased landowner can take precedence over his married daughters in succession to his non-ancestral estate. The question arose as follows :—

One Sahlion, a Mahomedan landowner of the Tulla clan, resident as stated above, died, leaving him surviving a widow and two married daughters (appellants before the Board) and some immoveable property. The widow subsequently gave the property to the daughters by a registered deed of gift dated September 8, 1934. The respondents, claiming to be his collaterals, instituted a suit against the widow (defendant No. 1) and the daughters (defendants Nos. 2 and 3) asserting that Sahlion's property was ancestral as regards the plaintiffs and that the widow had no right to make the gift, which should be declared void and ineffectual as against the plaintiff's rights and invalid after the death or re-marriage of the widow. The widow and daughters denied the claim on the ground that the property was not ancestral and that the plaintiffs had no locus standi to sue, because daughters succeeded to the non-ancestral property as against collaterals, "especially when the plaintiffs are collaterals of the tenth degree."

The Subordinate Judge who tried the suit dismissed it, holding that the plaintiffs were Sahlion's collaterals of the tenth degree, that the lands in the suit were not ancestral and that, according to the general rule of custom prevailing among the Mahomedan tribes of the district of Shahpur which applied to the parties, the daughters were not ousted by the plaintiffs with regard to succession to the non-ancestral property of their father. In arriving at his decision, the learned Judge relied on the oral and documentary evidence adduced by the parties and upon certain rulings of the Punjab Courts.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court at Lahore and that Court, in a judgment remarkable for its brevity, allowed the appeal. The material part of the High Court judgment begins with the statement "that it is common ground that under the customary law which governs all the Musalman tribes of the Shahpur district, married daughters do not inherit their father's estate in any circumstances." Their Lordships have a difficulty in understanding this statement, because the question stated by the High Court as the "common ground" was precisely the issue in controversy in the case. The judgment bears, in several places, indications that the High Court, instead of examining the disputed question on the facts and the evidence in the case carefully considered in the Subordinate Judge's judgment, proceeded entirely on the authority of the questions and answers contained in a Manual compiled by Mr. (afterwards Sir) James Wilson, called a "General Code of the Tribal Customs in the Shahpur District of the Punjab," published in 1896. (It may be convenient to refer hereafter to this publication as Wilson's Manual.) Basing their views on certain questions and answers in Wilson's Manual the learned Judges of the High Court held that there was a presumption against inheritance by the daughters and that this presumption had not been rebutted. They therefore allowed the appeal. The judgment contains no detailed criticism of the oral and documentary evidence of custom adduced by the parties, all of which was ignored with the brief observation that in a full bench decision of the Lahore High Court (Bahadur v. Mst. Nihal Kaur<sup>a</sup>) it had been stated that: "recent judicial decisions are not sufficient to abrogate the custom so clearly laid down in Wilson's Manual of Customary Law." Their Lordships have consequently derived less assistance than they would have expected from the High Court judgment in elucidating the important question in controversy in this appeal.

Before examining the value to be attached to the statements in Wilson's Manual, and the effect of the full bench decision, it will be useful to state what the true legal position of the parties was as it emerged from the pleadings. The basis of the plaintiff's claim was that the property in suit was ancestral so far as their rights were concerned. This was denied by the defendants. The onus was therefore on the plaintiffs to prove that the property was ancestral. The Subordinate Judge held that the onus had not been discharged. The learned Judges of the High Court did not consider this question, as the statements in Wilson's Manual on which they relied made no distinction between ancestral and non-ancestral property, and stated generally that married daughters "in no case" inherited their father's estate or "any share in it." Before this Board, the respondents did not appear in support of the High Court judgment. Their Lordships have therefore to decide the question on the evidence which is available in this case, and, on reviewing it, they agree with the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the land was not proved to be ancestral. In more than one decision of the Lahore High Court (see, for instance, Chanda Singh v. Mst. Banto<sup>1</sup> and Rahmat Ali Khan v. Mst. Sadiq-ul-Nisa<sup>2</sup>) it has been laid down that to establish the ancestral character of land it is not sufficient to show that the name of the common ancestor from whom the parties are descended was mentioned in the revenue pedigree. It should also be proved that the descendants of that common ancestor held the land in ancestral shares and that the land occupied, at the time of the dispute, by the proprietors thereof had devolved upon them by inheritance. It is now settled law in the Punjab that the mere mention of the name of a person in the pedigree table as the common ancestor is no proof of the fact that every piece of land held by his descendants (howsoever low) was originally held by and descended from him in succession from generation to generation. As is explained by Tek Chand J. in Chanda Singh v. Mst. Banto,<sup>3</sup> "a genealogical tree of this kind is prepared merely to indicate the relationship of the proprietors in a particular village and is in no sense intended to be a record of the acquisition of every bit of land held by all persons whose names appear in it. It is no doubt presumptive proof of their kinship, but not of the nature of the property owned by them. For that purpose one has to look to the history of the acquisition of the village." The extracts from the settlement records relating to the land in dispute, which are a part of the evidence in this case, justify the finding of the Subordinate Judge.

Before examining the questions and answers in Wilson's Manual, it will be useful to ascertain the customary rights of daughters against collaterals with reference to ancestral and non-ancestral land as they are stated in Sir W. H. Rattigan's Digest (of Civil law for the Punjab, chiefly based on customary law, 1935 edition), a book of unquestioned authority in the Punjab. In paragraph 23 (p. 79) it is stated that (1) a daughter only succeeds to the ancestral landed property of her father, if an agriculturist, in default (a) of heirs mentioned in the preceding paragraph (viz., male lineal descendants, a widow or mother), or (b) of near male collaterals, provided that a married daughter sometimes excludes near male relatives, especially amongst Mahomedan tribes, under circumstances specified in the paragraph (not material to the present issue); (2) but in regard to the acquired property of her father the daughter is preferred to collaterals. It is further stated (p. 92) "that the general custom of the province (the Punjab) is that a daughter excludes collaterals in succession to self-acquired property of her father," and "the initial onus therefore is on the collaterals to show that the general custom in favour of the daughter's succession to the self-acquired property of her father has been varied by a special custom excluding the daughters." This being the legal position of the parties, the question arises whether, the property being non-ancestral, the plaintiffs have discharged the onus by proving the existence of a special custom excluding daughters. They endeavoured to do this in two ways, (1) by relying on the authority of Wilson's Manual, and (2) by producing oral evidence at the trial.

Mr. Jayakar

As the questions and answers in Wilson's Manual formed the main basis of the High Court judgment, it is necessary to examine in detail their value and effect. [After examining the questions and answers the judgment proceeded:]

On a careful examination of the relevant questions and answers in Wilson's Manual, a few considerations arise in limine which cannot be ignored:—

(1) That some of the answers are in conflict with the customs recorded in Rattigan's Digest, notably what is stated in that Digest as the general custom of the province that daughters exclude collaterals with respect to self-acquired property of their father.

(2) It cannot be disputed that, in his lifetime, a Mahomedan proprietor (as, for instance, an Awan in the Shahpur district) possesses unlimited power to give away his property to his daughters and their issue. This is clear from Wilson's Manual, p. 71, where it is recorded: "a father having no son or son's son, has full power to give the whole of his immovable property to his daughter, daughter's son, sister, sister's son, or son-in-law, or to one of his agnate heirs, without the consent of the other agnates. No distinction is made between ancestral and acquired property." Again, at p. 73, it is stated as regards Awans and miscellaneous Musalmans (Tullas are included in this category): "a proprietor having no son or son's son, can, without the consent of the agnate heirs, make a gift of immovable property, ancestral or acquired, divided or not, to a person not related to him," and an explanatory note is added that "among the Awans there is a general feeling that a sonless man is absolute owner of all his property, including his land, and can do with it as he likes, as his agnate heirs are generally his enemies!" If this is the rule, it is difficult to understand why, on the death of such an absolute owner, his married daughters, whom he could have made the objects of his bounty at his will during his lifetime, should be superseded, even with regard to his self-acquired property, by collaterals, irrespective of the degree of remoteness in which they stood. Though Punjab Act II of 1920 ("an Act to restrict the power of descendants and collaterals to contest an alienation of immovable property... on the ground that such alienation... is contrary to custom") does not apply to alienations made by a female (as in the present case), s. 7 thereof throws light on the absolute right of the proprietor to give away his non-ancestral property. The section applies to the whole of the Punjab, and provides that "no person shall contest any alienation of non-ancestral immovable property...on the ground that such alienation...is contrary to custom."

(3) In answer 17 in Wilson's Manual no distinction is made between ancestral and non-ancestral or between movable and immovable property, and the rule is stated as a wide generalisation (in answer 16) with reference to "all Musalmans" that a married daughter "in no case" inherits her father's estate or "any share in it." This answer is in conflict with numerous decisions of the Punjab Courts (some of them are noticed in a subsequent part of this judgment) which have laid down in clear terms that, in the earlier records of customs throughout the Punjab, rules stated in such wide and general terms must be taken to govern ancestral property only.

(4) In the province as a whole, numerous decisions of the Punjab Courts show that daughters generally succeed to the self-acquired property of their father, even to the exclusion of the nearest agnatic relations (as, e.g., uncles or nephews), and, even as regards ancestral property, it is now well settled that, more usually, the fifth degree is found to be the remotest customary limit. (See Rattigan's Digest, paragraph 23, clause (II), sub-clause (2), and authorities quoted at p. 84 and following). This general rule, prevalent in the entire province, appears to have found expression in s. 6 of the Punjab Act II of 1920, which lays down the fifth degree as the limit of collateral relationship able to contest an alienation of ancestral immovable property, on the ground that it is contrary to custom.

(5) It is remarkable that in answer 16 as recorded in the English version of the riwaj-i-am, no limit is mentioned within which the kindred must stand towards the deceased in order to exclude his daughters, though the question clearly contemplated enquiry into this point. It is not possible to say whether the omission to answer this part of the question was due to the fact that the point was lost sight of in the investigation or whether the answer was really intended to lay down that custom permitted collaterals, however remote (even of the tenth, fifteenth, or remoter degrees), to exclude daughters. Tek Chand J., in the course of an examination of answer 16 in Khan Beg v. Mst. Fateh Khatun,<sup>1</sup> had occasion to consult the vernacular version of the riwaz-i-am. He came to the conclusion that, though the last part of the question was not specifically answered, it was clear from certain expressions—Chacha (father's younger brother) and Taya (father's elder brother) used in the corresponding vernacular answer, that it was not intended to lay down that collaterals of remote degrees should be preferred to daughters.

This case of Khan Beg v. Mst. Fateh Khatun (their Lordships have derived considerable assistance from Tek Chand J.'s judgment) deserves to be examined carefully as it related to the Shahpur district and the dispute was also very similar to the one in the present case. [After discussing this and other cases the judgment proceeded:]

Their Lordships have thought it desirable to refer, in some detail, to these observations of the Judges of the Punjab Court, because they held eminent positions and some of them had experience of the preparation of official codes of tribal custom. But none of these considerations appear to have been kept in view by the learned Judges of the High Court in this case, who, in arriving at their decision, have not only ignored (as will be shown below) the entire body of evidence adduced in the suit, but also a long course of judicial decisions of their own province, extending over nearly thirty years, in which similar questions arose with reference to the tribes in the Shahpur and neighbouring districts and which were uniformly decided against the collaterals of much nearer degree than in the present suit, except in two cases of exceptional character where there was no rebutting evidence at all. (See Jawaya Shah v. Mst. Fatima, and Gulab v. Umar Bibi.)<sup>1</sup> As the question at issue affects large classes of the Muslim community, it is, in their Lordships' opinion, of sufficient importance to justify their briefly reviewing a few of these important decisions. [After reviewing the decisions the judgment proceeded :].

It now remains to consider the full bench case of Bahadur v. Mst. Nihat Kaur<sup>2</sup> (differing judgments of Coldstream and Bhide JJ. and full bench decision of Young C. J., Monroe and Din Mohammad JJ.). As the High Court in the present case has treated this ruling as an authority for ignoring the previous judicial decisions, it is necessary to examine closely the facts and effect of this ruling. The case related to the Jats of Daska tahsil in Sialkot district. The contest was between a married daughter (plaintiff) and collaterals of the fourth degree (defendants). The land was non-ancestral. The trial Court decreed the suit, holding that the land being non-ancestral the custom favoured the daughter's preferential right. This decision was upheld on appeal by the District Judge. The collaterals appealed to the High Court, and that Court dismissed the suit. It is to be noted that neither party had proved any specific instances in the case, so there was no rebutting evidence against the presumption raised in favour of the collaterals by the answers in the riwaj-i-am relating to the district. The only material question was whether previous decisions of the Lahore High Court of a character contrary to the custom recorded in the riwaj-i-am would be sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. None of the earlier decisions, for instance those cited above, nor even those relating to the Jats in the Sialkot district, were noticed in the full bench judgment, which referred only to two previous decisions : one of 1922, which Young C. J. (who delivered the judgment of the full bench) thought was based on a wrong view of the law ; and the other of 1928, which was held to be too recent to prove a custom. The riwaj-i-am relevant to the suit, which was noticed and commented on in some of the earlier decisions cited above, was clear so far as it went, but its qualifications were not given effect to as was done in some of the earlier decisions. There was a difference of opinion between Coldstream J. and Bhide J., and on reference to the full bench, the reasoning adopted by the former Judge was virtually approved, but several vital considerations urged by Bhide J. in his differing judgment do not appear to have received adequate consideration in the full bench judgment.

If the full bench decision is intended to lay down the rule that a riwaj-i-am, being presumptive evidence, cannot be over-riden by recent instances, either in the form of specific cases proved at the trial or the decisions of the law Courts, their Lordships have little comment to make on it. The case cannot, however, be treated as an authority for the view that judicial decisions, even if they are not of recent date, cannot be treated as evidence against the statements in the riwaj-i-am. A judicial decision, though of comparatively recent date, may contain, on its records, evidence of specific instances, which are of sufficient antiquity to be of value in rebutting the presumption. In such a case, the value of the decision arises from the fact not that it is relevant under ss. 13 and 42 of the Indian Evidence Act as forming in itself a "transaction by which the custom in question was recognised, etc., etc.," but that it contains, on its records, a number of specific instances relating to the relevant custom. To ignore such judicial decisions merely on the basis of the riwaj-i-am would add greatly to the perplexities and difficulties of proving a custom.

Their Lordships are not convinced that Young C. J.'s reference to the English rule, stated in Blackstone's Commentaries, that "a custom, in order that it may be legal and binding, must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" was either apposite or useful, when applied to Indian conditions. It is undoubted that a custom observed in a particular district derives its force from the fact that it has, from long usage, obtained in that district the force of law. It must be ancient; but it is not of the essence of this rule that its antiquity must in every case be carried back to a period beyond the memory of man—still less that it is ancient in the English technical sense. It will depend upon the circumstances of each case what antiquity must be established before the custom can be accepted. What is necessary to be proved is that the usage has been acted upon in practice for such a long period and with such invariability as to show that it has, by common consent, been submitted to as the established governing rule of the particular district. Having regard to the circumstances under which local customs have arisen and do arise in India, both with reference to Muslims and Hindus, and the ease and frequency with which people migrate from one district or province to another, it would, in their Lordships' opinion, create great perplexity in the already uncertain character of customary law to require that, in every case, the antiquity of a custom must be carried back to a period which is beyond the memory of man. Insistence upon such proof would also involve a complete ignoring of the caution, which was uttered in a judgment of this Board in the case of Abdul Hussein Khan v. Bibi Sona Dero,<sup>1</sup> where their Lordships adverted to the difficulty of applying "the strict rules that govern the establishment of custom in this country to circumstances which find no analogy here." Likewise, their Lordships do not find themselves in agreement with the view of the full bench that the effect of the statements in the riwaj-i-am was not weakened by the fact that women had no opportunity of being consulted by the officer compiling the customary law or by the fact that the custom recorded was not in conformity with the general customary law. The presumption enjoyed by the riwaj-i-am was, in their

Lordships' opinion, weakened to the extent of both these considerations, though the degree of the weakening would depend upon the facts of each case. Their Lordships prefer, in this behalf, the observations of the Punjab Judges, cited in a previous part of this judgment, which are of a contrary character. -

Whatever value the full bench decision might have with reference to the customs of the Sialkot district, the High Court in the present case was in error in accepting it as an authority for excluding from consideration the several instances, both judicial and otherwise, which were proved in this case with reference to the customs of the Shahpur district. By no straining of language could these decisions be described as recent. They commence from 1905-6 and range over a period of nearly thirty years. In many of these decisions the claimants in the position of the daughters proved specific instances of their superseding collaterals of varying degrees of remoteness, sometimes even nephews, with reference to non-ancestral property. The case of Gulab v. Umar Bibi,<sup>1</sup> on which the full bench judgment relied, was, as shown above, of an exceptional character and could hardly be regarded as indicating any rule of custom of general application as against numerous instances of a contrary character. Besides, both parties had led, in the present case, evidence of specific instances which had received careful consideration in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. The High Court virtually ignored all this evidence on the basis of the full bench judgment. Their Lordships have examined this evidence and they agree with the view of the Subordinate Judge that the evidence produced by the daughters was of a more convincing character.

For the reasons indicated in this judgment, their Lordships are of opinion that the true legal position was that, the property being non-ancestral, the initial onus lay on the plaintiffs to prove that the general custom in favour of the daughters' succession had been varied by a special custom enabling the plaintiffs to exclude the daughters and that the plaintiffs have not discharged this onus. Their Lordships would add that even if it be held that the answers in Wilson's Manual raised an initial presumption against the daughters, having regard to the considerations mentioned in this judgment it was a weak presumption, which has been sufficiently discharged by the evidence adduced in the case.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be allowed, that the decree of the High Court be reversed and that of the Subordinate Judge restored. The respondents will pay the appellants' costs in the High Court and before this Board.

Where relief is sought against defendant on the ground of fraud, misconduct, or mistake, the right to sue is deemed to accrue from the time when the fraud, misconduct or mistake becomes known to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, his brother, father and uncle (defendant No. 2) were members of a joint Hindu family having a family business. The share of the plaintiff's branch in the business was ten annas and that of defendant No. 2 six annas. After the death of the plaintiff's father a partition of the assets of the business was effected and the business was taken over by defendant No. 2. The plaintiff's father was interested in two religious charities and it was decided at the time of the partition that the two branches of the family should provide Rs. 10,000 for each of the charities according to their shares in the business. Rupees. 2,000 having been already provided for one of the charities before the partition, the plaintiff's branch had to find Rs. 5,000 for that charity and Rs. 6,250 for the other charity. The plaintiff, thereupon, drew two hundis, dated December 1, 1916, for Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 6,250 respectively, on defendant No. 1 bank payable to bearer. Each of the hundis was headed with the name of the charity concerned under the word 'credit,' thereby showing the charity as the party or account in whose favour it was intended. The hundis were taken to defendant No. 1 by defendant No. 2, and defendant No. 1 credited the two sums in the names of the respective charities. On February 10, 1920, the two sums amounted to Rs. 15,732-15-9 with interest, and on that date at the instance of defendant No. 2 Rs. 15,700 were credited to defendant No. 2's overdraft account with defendant No. 1, and the balance of Rs. 32-15-9 was paid to defendant No. 2, and the account in the names of the charities was closed. Defendant No. 2 opened two new accounts in the names of the two charities in his money-lending business. He was adjudicated insolvent on January 4, 1926. The plaintiff came to know in 1929 of defendant No. 1 setting off the charity monies against the overdraft account of defendant No. 2, and he thereupon sued defendant No. 1 to refund to the charities the money received by it in reduction of defendant No. 2's overdraft on the footing that this application of the money was a breach of trust on the part of defendant No. 2 of which defendant No. 1 had notice and by which it had profited :—

Held, (1) that defendant No. 1 in appropriating the charity money to itself took a transfer of property which in equity it was bound to restore to the charities, as it failed to prove that the transfer was within the authority of defendant No. 2 and not a breach of trust by him ;

(2) that, even if any authority was given by the plaintiff to invest the trust funds in defendant No. 2's business, the discharge of the overdraft account of defendant No. 2 did not come within the scope or intention of that authority ;

(3) that art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and not art. 36, governed the plaintiff's suit as the claim against defendant No. 1 was not that a breach of trust was committed by it but that it took the trust property by a transaction with defendant No. 2 which was a breach of trust on his part and with notice that it was a breach of trust ;

(4) that the period of limitation ran from the date in 1929 when the plaintiff came to know that the money of the charities was set off against defendant No. 2's debt to defendant No. 1 upon his overdraft.

Decisions in India have established a rule of limitation under art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, by which the plaintiff, in the cases to which the rule applies, cannot be debarred of his remedy, unless with knowledge of his rights he has been guilty of delay.

Consent of the Advocate General under s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is not necessary where a trustee sues to recover trust property in the hands of a stranger to the trust.

SP. (FIRM)
v.
NAGAPPA
CHETTIAR

APPEAL from a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Madras, dated May 9, 1938, in its appellate jurisdiction (Leach C. J. and Krishnaswami Ayyangar J.) reversing a decree dated March 27, 1936, of that Court in its original civil jurisdiction (Lakshmana Rao J.).

The plaintiff, Nagappa, and his minor brother were, with their uncle, Subrahmanyam, members of a joint Hindu family. After the death of Nagappa's father in 1914 a partition of the assets of the family business was effected, the main term of the partition agreement being that the uncle should take over the whole of the business.

The plaintiff's father had been interested in two religious charities, and before the partition a certain sum had been credited to one of the charities in the books of the business. The partition agreement provided that the two branches of the family should furnish a capital of Rs. 10,000 for each of the charities. The plaintiff accordingly drew and gave to his uncle two hundis dated December 1, 1916, for the sums which he had agreed to find. The hundis were drawn on the plaintiff's account with the defendants, a firm of bankers. They were made payable to bearer, but each was headed with the name of the charity concerned under the word "credit". The defendants, when the uncle presented the hundis, credited them in each case to an account in the name of the charity concerned. The sums remained to the credit of the accounts of the charities until February 10, 1920, on which date they were transferred to the uncle's account with the defendants and the two accounts of the charities were closed, the result of the transaction being that the uncle's

 1940 brought this action to compel the defendants to refund to the charities the
 O. RM. O. M. sums so received by them in reduction of the uncle's overdraft, contending SP. (FIRM) that that application of the money constituted a breach of trust by the uncle
 v. of which the defendants had notice and by which they profited. The trial NAGAPPA Judge dismissed the action. That decision was reversed on appeal, and the CHETTIAR defendants appealed to His Majesty in Council.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe K. C. and W. Wallach, for the appellants. To deal with the case first on its merits : It is submitted that the handing over by the plaintiff to Subrahmanyam of the two hundis constituted an investment of the sums which they represented in the latter's business. The heading "Credit Charity so & so" was no more than an indication of which of the several accounts which Subrahmanyam kept with the defendants was to receive the money. Subrahmanyam, having authority to invest the moneys in his own business, in fact followed the course for some time of leaving them with the defendant bank to earn interest. The ultimate transfer of the moneys to his own account by Subrahmanyam was no breach of trust. In any case the plaintiff only proceeded against the present defendants after his failure to recover against Subrahmanyam in the latter's insolvency. The former proceedings were on the same facts as the present, and while they do not operate as res judicata against these proceedings, it is not without relevance to call attention to them here.

[Counsel referred to ss. 40 and 42 of the Indian Evidence Act.]

The bank's exact position in relation to the transfer of February, 1920, needs consideration : First, it is submitted, it is not material that the bank had notice of the trust i.e., knew that the moneys were trust funds. Next, it is to be observed that the bank does not act on its own initiative in a matter like this. It acted under the orders of Subrahmanyam, orders which it was not entitled to refuse to obey.

If, as appears to have been admitted in the Court below, Subrahmanyam was given control over the moneys, with power to invest them in his own business, the paying in of the moneys by Subrahmanyam to the account with the defendants bank was such an investment. The transaction of 1920 was no more than a re-investment of the moneys, and the bank consequently in our submission could have committed no breach of trust in effecting the transfer as it did. More than that, the bank had actually no power to refuse to obey Subrahmanyam's instructions : see Gray v. Johnston.<sup>1</sup> (Counsel also referred to Coleman v. Bucks and Oxon Union Bank.<sup>2</sup>)

In any case, what was there in this very common or garden transaction to lead the bank to suspect that any breach of trust might be constituted by it. The plaintiff has in any case been admitted a creditor in Subrahmanyam's insolvency, and the bank are entitled to set off in respect of whatever he recovers in that insolvency. Moreover, there should be a deduction in respect of moneys spent by Subrahmanyam on the charities during the many years for which he carried them on without complaint.

Wallach, following. Let it be assumed, first, that art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act applies to this case : Time must have begun to run against the plaintiff either on February 10, 1920, when the money was withdrawn and used to cancel Subrahmanyam's overdraft, or in 1924 when the plaintiff received notice of the withdrawal. At one or other of those times his cause of action arose. The general remarks made in Bolo v. Koklan<sup>1</sup> are not applicable, because the facts in that case are so very different.

[LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. But how can the plaintiff be said to have had the necessary knowledge before 1929?]

He knew in 1924 that the account in which the trust moneys stood had been closed. All that he did not know was the nature of the transaction—namely, that no money had passed. But it was open to him in 1924 to take proceedings.

But, it is submitted, it is not art. 120, but art. 36 "for compensation of any malfeasance, misfeasance or nonfeasance independent of contract ..." which applies to this case. For that article the period of limitation is only two years, so that the suit is clearly barred.

Finally, it is submitted, this suit is incompetent because instituted without the consent of the Advocate-General under s. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There was no appearance by or for the plaintiff-respondent.

SIR GEORGE RANKIN. This appeal arises out of a suit filed on the Original Side of the High Court at Madras on April 29, 1933, and is brought from the decree of an Appellate Bench dated May 9, 1938, reversing a decision of Lakshmana Rao J., dated March 27, 1936, whereby the suit had been dismissed. All the parties to the suit are Nattukottai Chettiars. The appellant is a firm which is known by the letters O. R. M. O. M. SP., and which carries on business at Madras as bankers and money-lenders. It was defendant No. 1 to the suit and it will be conveniently referred to as the appellant bank. The plaintiff Nagappa and his younger brother Lakshmanan were the sons of one Minakshisundaram, whose brother Subrahmanyam, though not an original defendant, was added as defendant No. 2 to the suit by an order dated January 24, 1934. They were members of a joint Hindu family and had a family business in "piece-goods" (cloth) at Madras and other places—the plaintiff's father's share being ten annas and Subrahmanyam's six annas. After the death of the plaintiff's father in 1914 a partition of the assets of business was effected with the aid of certain business friends and the terms of this arrangement were embodied in a yadast or note dated January 17, 1916, which the plaintiff signed on behalf of himself and his brother, who was then a minor. The main term was that the business should be taken over in its entirety by Subrahmanyam. It appears that the plaintiff's father had been interested in two religious charities, one for the supply of water to worshippers at a certain place in the hills, and one for the supply of cloth for the purposes of a temple. Before the partition a sum of Rs. 2,000 had been credited in the books of the business to the temple and it was arranged at the time of the partition that the two branches of the family should provide in all a capital of Rs. 10,000 for each of these two charities. The shares in which they were to provide the money were five-eighths and three-eighths—i.e., ten annas and six annas, according to their shares in the business. As Rs. 2,000 had already been provided for the temple, the plaintiff's branch had to find Rs. 5,000 for that and Rs. 6,250 for the water charity. The yadast by cl. 13 thereof provided that both branches of the family should manage and conduct the charities. Acting upon this arrangement the plaintiff drew and handed to his uncle, Subrahmanyam, two hundis, each dated December 1, 1916, for the money which his branch had agreed to find—that is for Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 6,250 respectively with interest at the Madras madappu rate from January 17, 1916, the date of the yadast. The plaintiff had a banking account with the appellant firm and the hundis were drawn on that firm. Though made payable to bearer they were headed with the name of the charity concerned under the word "credit"—that is, showing the charity as the party or account in whose favour they were intended. It is not necessary that the terms of the hundis should be here set out. They were taken by Subrahmanyam to the appellant bank and on September 11, 1917, the bank endorsed each with a statement that the amount with interest to date had been received. It is admitted that the bank credited these sums in each case to an account in the name of the charity concerned, though Subrahmanyam had had an account with the appellant bank since January 6, 1917. The monies remained at the credit of the charities with the appellant firm until February 10, 1920, by which time they amounted in all to Rs. 15,732-15-9. On that date they were transferred to the credit of Subrahmanyam's account and the accounts in the name of the charities were closed. The transaction is clearly and simply described in the case of the appellant bank as follows :—A book entry of Rs. 15,700 was made in favour of the appellant bank thereby cancelling an overdraft of Subrahmanyam in the books of the appellant bank and the balance of Rs. 32-15-9 was paid to Subrahmanyam in cash. At the same time Subrahmanyam in his own books in his money-lending business opened new accounts in the names of the two charities—that is Rs. 8,740-8-9 in favour of one and Rs. 6,992-7-0 in favour of the other charity.

To challenge this transaction is the purpose of the present suit. The plaintiff seeks to make the appellant bank liable to refund to the charities the money received by it in reduction of Subrahmanyam's overdraft on the footing that this application of the money was a breach of trust on the part of Subrahmanyam of which the appellant bank had notice and by which the appellant bank has profited.

Some evidence has been given by a witness on behalf of the appellant bank to the effect that when Subrahmanyam first handed over the hundis and opened the two accounts in the name of the charities he had intimated, "I shall take it whenever I want". Their Lordships regard this evidence as unreliable. The witness also deposed that at the time of the transfer of the monies on February 10, 1920, cash was actually borrowed from Marwaris, was paid to one Chidambaram on behalf of Subrahmanyam, repaid to the bank by him and repaid to the Marwaris by the bank on the same day. Their Lordships regard these statements as untrue and they are here mentioned only to be put aside.

Admittedly, the substantial effect of the transaction of February 10, 1920, was to empty the charity accounts and to cancel Subrahmanyam's overdraft. Though a Hindu religious endowment is not technically for all purposes in the same position as an English trust and its property is not vested in its manager as trust property is vested in a trustee, such differences are of small importance for the purposes of the present case. Gray v. Johnston<sup>1</sup> and Coleman v. Bucks and Oxon Union Bank<sup>2</sup> were cited at the bar, but their Lordships do not consider that an examination of the case-law is required to show that the appellant bank in appropriating the charity moneys to itself was taking a transfer of property which in equity it would be bound to restore to the charities unless it could show that Subrahmanyam had authority to use these funds to pay off his overdraft. In that event no doubt the transfer which seemed on its face to be highly improper would turn out to be justified. Their Lordships will assume that if the transfer was within Subrahmanyam's authority, the appellant bank would not be liable to restore the money by reason merely that Subrahmanyam in exercising his authority had failed to pay due regard to the interests of the charities. But the appellant bank on the facts of this case is without defence upon the merits unless it first establishes that the transfer was within the authority of Subrahmanyam and not a breach of trust by him. It avails nothing to dispute whether the transfer was due more to Subrahmanyam's desire to put his account in credit or to the bank's desire to be repaid.

It is said that Subrahmanyam had received from the plaintiff authority to do what he did. Upon this question and upon the question of limitation—in their Lordships' opinion the only substantial questions in this case—it is necessary to notice some events which took place after the transfer had been made. Subrahmanyam's account with the appellant bank is in evidence and while it shows a credit balance of Rs. 4,500 in May, 1920, it continues

Sir George
 Rankin

In 1924 the plaintiff came to know that the funds were no longer in deposit with the appellant bank and on March 1 of that year a letter written on the plaintiff's behalf by an advocate claimed from Subrahmanyam the amount of the hundis with the interest as having been deposited by the plaintiff and his younger brother in Subrahmanyam's firm for the purposes of the charities at the nadappu rate of interest. This allegation was repeated incidentally in a plaint dated April 25, 1924 (C. S. No. 328 of 1924) filed in the Madras High Court with reference to Subrahmanyam's collections from the branches of the joint family business which had been partitioned by the yadast of January 17, 1916. Again in 1929 the plaintiff took steps in the insolvency to have it declared that the monies now in question did not pass to the Official Assignee as part of the estate of Subrahmanyam but were trust monies. He brought a motion to obtain a declaration to that effect on the footing that Subrahmanyam had withdrawn the monies from the appellant bank, and it is clear enough that this proceeding was taken and maintained upon the basis that Subrahmanyam had been authorised to withdraw them. The motion failed on the ground (inter alia) that there were no assets left at the time of the insolvency which could be traced to the monies which had been withdrawn from the appellant bank. It is stated in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice in the present case that the plaintiff came to know in 1929 of the fact that the monies were not really withdrawn from the appellant bank in 1920 but were taken by the appellant bank in cancellation of Subrahmanyam's overdraft so that the funds had disappeared altogether. The case made by the plaintiff in his pleading and by his own evidence in the present suit was different from his previous statements. It was to the effect that at the time the charitable funds were constituted in 1916 it was agreed that they should be invested with a third-party and not with Subrahmanyam; and that Subrahmanyam should not vary the investment without the plaintiff's consent. The learned trial Judge in view of the letter of March 1, 1924, which the plaintiff endeavoured to repudiate as a misinterpretation of his instructions to his advocate, disbelieved this part of the plaintiff's evidence and came to the following conclusion:—

"Under the circumstances it cannot reasonably be doubted that (Subrahmanyam) was authorised to invest the trust funds in his own business in consideration of his paying nadappu interest and the amount in question was on the same day—i.e., February 10, 1920, credited by him in the accounts of the dharma in his books. The result of the transaction on either supposition would be to transfer the trust money to the business (of Subrahmanyam) and he was acting within his rights in doing so."

The finding of fact as to the authority given to Subrahmanyam, contrary though it was to the plaintiff's evidence, was not contested before the learned

Chief Justice and Krishnaswami Ayyangar J. on appeal. The Chief Justice states :—

P. C.
1940

"The trust funds were created and it is admitted that the second respondent (Subrahmanyam) being the uncle of the appellant (plaintiff) and much older was given the management of them. It is also admitted that the second respondent (Subrahmanyam) was given the right of investing the trust funds in his own business if he so decided."

O. R. M. O. M.
SP. (FIRM)
v.
NAGAPPA
CHETTIAR

But the appellate bench did not consider that Subrahmanyam had acted within his authority :—

Sir George
Rankin

"There could be no investment of the trust monies in (Subrahmanyam's) business unless they were replaced. They were not replaced and therefore there was no investment. The first respondent (that is the appellant bank) was not entitled to do what he did without being satisfied that the entries in (Subrahmanyam's) books were going to be supported by cash. He took no steps to satisfy himself that this would be done. On the other hand he applied the trust monies for his own benefit knowing full well that (Subrahmanyam) was merely intending to constitute himself a debtor to the trusts."

"To invest the trust funds in his own business" is a phrase which stands in need of some interpretation, and it is possible that the trial Judge may have taken it too broadly and that the appellate bench may have taken it too narrowly. The burden of proving the nature and extent of the authority is on the appellant bank, and the fact that the plaintiff's evidence was not believed does not necessarily imply that the statements previously made by him in the letter of March 1, 1924, the suit of 1924 and the insolvency proceedings of 1929 can be accepted. Subrahmanyam was not called nor was his absence from the witness-box explained. The result is that there is no direct and reliable evidence as to what was said by the plaintiff or his uncle on the subject of investment. It is to be inferred that the authority relied upon is an authority given by the plaintiff at the time of handing over the hundis in 1916 or 1917—while he still bore the character of settlor and the endowment was not yet perfected. The trust having arisen in connection with the family piece-goods business, it is not very difficult to support that Subrahmanyam who was to carry it on after the partition might be authorised to use the money in that business. It is a common practice among Chettiers to carry sums in their books to the credit of a charity without intending that the money should be set apart or taken out of the business. The present was a case in which the money was the money of the plaintiff and his brother and the business was to be their uncle's, but this may not have been regarded as calling for a stricter system. Any wider authority to deal with the monies, even if alleged to have been given to the uncle, must, however, be established by the strictest proof. To arrive at a correct interpretation of the arrangement made, and to ascertain whether it covered what was done by Subrahmanyam in February, 1920, it is important to know what business he was engaged in at the time of the arrangement and to ascertain the character of the account into which the money went. In addition to continuing the piece-goods business and collecting the assets of certain shops which are mentioned in the yadast, Subrahmanyam seems in 1917 to have done business of some sort at Penang. Whether his speculations in immovable property had then begun it is not possible on the evidence to ascertain, though it appears in evidence that one large transaction of this character took place in May, 1920. An account which the appellant bank called the "go-down" account was opened by Subrahmanyam in January, 1917, and would appear to have had reference to the piece-goods business. At some date before March, 1918, he began a money-lending business in Coral Merchant Street and in that month an account was opened with the appellant bank called the amount of the "street-shop" in connection with this business. The "go-down" account was closed in April, 1919, by a transfer to the "street-shop" account of Rs. 4,401. From that date the latter account can only be described as Subrahmanyam's "private account" to use the words of the Chief Justice, or as the appellant bank's written statement calls it "his personal ledger in the defendant firm". It is this account which was overdrawn in February, 1920, and into which the charity money was paid, and it was in the books of the money lending business or "street-shop" that Subrahmanyam made credit entries in favour of the charities and debited the bank's account. What other books of account were kept by him does not appear. It is not possible on the evidence to ascertain that the overdraft outstanding on February 10, 1920, had been incurred on account of the piece-goods business or the money-lending business or any other business in particular: still less can it be said that any particular business got the benefit of the charity money. Unless it can be held that the plaintiff at the time of handing over the hundis authorised his uncle to borrow the money and use it as he chose—whether for buying property, lending money, dealing in piece-goods or any other business purpose, the appellant bank has not shown the authority of Subrahmanyam to make the transfer of February 10, 1920. The learned Chief Justice may have gone too far if his language was intended to exclude all possibility of investing money in a business by paying off a liability of the business. It would not be impossible to put a case in which a business in need of new stock or having occasion to acquire new premises paid for its requirements in the first instance by means of an overdraft. In such a case, a stranger finding money to discharge the overdraft might without difficulty be said to be investing money in the business. Their Lordships are not construing a document or even arriving at the terms of an oral bargain spoken to by reliable witnesses but are in the position of arriving at the facts of the case in the light of an admission made in the appellate Court; and they find it impossible to be satisfied that the discharge of an overdraft on this particular account comes within the scope or intention of any authority given by the plaintiff "to invest the trust funds in his own business". The disappearance of the money into this account would not among ordinary business men be deemed an "investment" of the money, and the appellant bank has not succeeded in showing that Subrahmanyam in February, 1920, acted within any authority given to him when the hundis were handed over.

The question of limitation has next to be considered. The claim against the appellant bank is not that a breach of trust was committed by it but that it took the trust property by a transaction with Subrahmanyam which was a breach of trust on his part and with notice that it was a breach of trust. Their Lordships are of opinion that art. 36 of the Indian Limitation Act does not apply to the case and that it comes under art. 120 which prescribes a period of six years from the time "when the right to sue accrues". The question is whether time began to run from February 10, 1920, or from the date in 1929 when the plaintiff came to know that the money of the charities was set off against Subrahmanyam's debt to the appellant bank upon his overdraft. The suit having been brought in 1933, it is necessary for the plaintiff to be able to calculate the time from the later date. The language of art. 120 makes no reference to the knowledge of the plaintiff and is in this respect in contrast to that of other articles, e.g., 90, 91, 92, 95, 96, 114. On the other hand it was recognised by the Board in Bolo v. Koklan<sup>1</sup> that an infringement of the plaintiff's right or at least a clear and unequivocal threat to infringe it is necessary before time begins to run against the plaintiff under the article. The appellate bench acted upon a principle which has been accepted as applicable to this article in a number of cases in several of the High Courts : Venkateswara Iyer v. Mayandi Chettiar,<sup>2</sup> Viswanadhan v. Narayana Doss,<sup>3</sup> Lal Singh v. Jai Chand,<sup>4</sup> Mathura Singh v. Rama Rudra Prasad Sinha,<sup>5</sup> Basavayya v. Bapanna Row Sowcar.<sup>6</sup> In the last mentioned case it was said that in cases in which the relief is sought on the ground of fraud, misconduct, mistake, etc., it would appear that limitation is made to commence from the time when the fraud, misconduct or mistake becomes known to the plaintiff. Such articles as 90, 91, 92, 95 and 96 were mentioned by way of illustration of this principle, and it was considered that art. 120 being an omnibus one the general expression employed in col. 3 is necessitated by the variety of suits coming within its purview, in some only of which would fraud, misconduct or mistake be part of the cause of action. It was accordingly held that it would be in consonance with the scheme of the Act if the right to sue should be deemed to accrue under art. 120 from the time of the plaintiff's knowledge of the fraud, misconduct or mistake where such a ground was the basis of the suit. Their Lordships can see some difficulties in this reasoning as a matter of interpretation of the language of the statute, and had the matter been res integra, they are not certain that this interpretation would have prevailed with them. But the decisions in India have established a rule of limitation under art. 120, by which the plaintiff in the cases to which the rule applies cannot be debarred of his remedy unless with knowledge of his rights he has been guilty of delay. The decisions which have been referred to were given in cases where the plaintiff sought to set aside a decree passed against him when a minor owing to the negligence of his guardian, or a mortgage of property which belonged not to the mortgagor but to a temple, or a transfer by a debtor to defeat his creditors. The subject-matter of the present suit is somewhat different, but their Lordships are prepared to follow the principle of the Indian decisions in the present case and to hold that the suit is within time.

It was suggested in the course of argument that the suit should only have been brought with the consent of the Advocate General under s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, but their Lordships think it clear that no such

Tort—Negligence—Shipowner—Responsibility of shipowner for health of crew—Illness of crew—Duty of master and Chief Steward—Reasonable and proper care—Doctrine of common employment—Whether this doctrine applies in India.

The responsibility of a ship-owner in regard to the securing of the health and safety of the crew is in general limited to the exercise of reasonable care, though a higher degree of responsibility may be imposed on him by statute, in which case the duty is generally imposed in mandatory terms.

The plaintiff was serving as a lascar on board the defendants' steamship on a voyage from Calcutta to ports on the east coast of North America and the United Kingdom in September and October, 1933. The plaintiff fell ill near Gibraltar with a bad cold on September 18, 1933. He was given cough mixture by the Chief Steward with the approval of the Master and was put off duty. Subsequently at every port of call the plaintiff was examined by doctors, but as they declared that it was not a hospital case, he could not be removed to a hospital on shore. When the ship arrived at Avonmouth on the return voyage, the doctor diagnosed the plaintiff's illness to be advanced phthisis, and advised his removal to hospital. This was done on November 3, 1933. He was eventually after treatment sent back as a distressed seaman to India, where he was finally discharged. He sued the defendants for the negligence of the Master or the Chief Steward or both for not taking proper care in regard to the illness from which he suffered during the voyage. No breach of any statutory obligation under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, was alleged or proved. The High Court held that the Master and the Chief Steward had failed to take proper care of the plaintiff when they knew that he had a bad cold and that the defendants were therefore responsible for the negligence of their two officers, and awarded Rs. 5,000 as damages to the plaintiff. On appeal by the defendants to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council :—

Held, setting aside the decree of the High Court, that the shipowners were not personally guilty of any neglect or default ; that no defects were found in the equipment of the vessel or in regard to the competence of the officers or to the system of working the ship ;

that, on the evidence in the case, the Master and Chief Steward did all that was possible for them to do under the circumstances ; and that it had not been established that the Master and Chief Steward failed in their duty to the plaintiff and were careless or negligent in the matter of taking reasonable and proper care of him.

Under the law of England shipowners can raise a defence based on the doctrine of common employment to a claim by a seaman against them based on negligence of a fellow servant including in that category the Master of the vessel.

Hedley v. Pinkney and Son's Steamship Company,<sup>1</sup> referred to.

The basis of the doctrine of common employment is the implied contract by the servant to accept the risk of his fellow servants' negligence ; and if that contract is to be implied, the servants must be engaged in common work, that is work which necessarily and naturally or in the normal course involves juxtaposition, local or casual, of the fellow employees, and exposure to the risk of the negligence of the one affecting the other. Difference in grade and responsibility does not exclude the doctrine so long as the nexus exists.

Quere. Whether the doctrine of common employment is part of the law of India.

Questions have been raised whether a doctrine so unsatisfactory both as to its policy and as to its practical results ought to be followed at all or at any rate without qualifications by the Indian Courts as a part of the law of India, particularly when in England it has been qualified and largely abrogated by legislation which has no counterpart in India.

Radcliffe v. Ribble Motor Service Ltd.<sup>2</sup>, Wilson and Clyde Coal Co. v. English,<sup>4</sup> and Secretary of State v. Rukhminibai,<sup>5</sup> referred to.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta.

The facts appear fully in the judgment.

The question for determination in the appeal was whether the plaintiff-respondent was entitled to damages from the defendants-appellants for an illness from which he suffered while serving as a lascar on board the defendants' steamship Markhor on a voyage from Calcutta to ports on the east coast of North America and the United Kingdom in September and October, 1933.

Basing his calculations on his possible earnings up to the age of sixty-five, the plaintiff-respondent claimed damages in the sum of Rs. 19,000 together with Rs. 1,000 for worry, and Rs. 500 as special damage, making a total of Rs. 20,500.

The trial Court allowed Rs. 1,500 for pain and suffering and special damage but disallowed the whole claim of Rs. 19,000 as adventitious and absurd.

The High Court (Guha and Mitter JJ.) on appeal reversed the judgment of the trial Court on the question of negligence of doctors, but they agreed in the finding of negligence against the Master and the Chief Steward. The High Court increased the sum of damages awarded to the plaintiff-respondent to Rs. 5,000.

The defendants appealed to His Majesty in Council.

Justin Lynskey and Cyril Miller, for the appellants.

Nalini Ranjan Bhattacharya, for the respondent.

LORD WRIGHT. This is an appeal from the amended decree of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal (exercising its appellate civil jurisdiction), dated January 25, 1938, allowing an appeal and cross-appeal from a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of the Fourth Court, 24 Parganas at Alipore, in Money Suit No. 96 of 1934 dated July 31, 1935.

The question for determination is whether or no the respondent is entitled to recover damages from the appellants in respect of an illness from which he suffered while, and since, serving as a lascar on board the appellants' steamship Markhor on a voyage from Calcutta to ports on the east coast of North America and the United Kingdom in and about the months of September and October, 1933.

The claim was for damages for the negligence of the Master or the Chief Steward of the Markhor or both of them for not taking proper steps to deal with the illness of the respondent. The action was originally brought not only against the appellants, but against the ship's agents at Calcutta, and also the Master and the Chief Steward. The action was brought in the Fourth Court of the Subordinate Judge at 24 Parganas at Alipore. In that Court the ship's agents were dismissed from the action, and so also were the Master and Chief Steward. But judgment was given against the appellants for Rs. 1,500 for pain and suffering and special damage. The total claim had been for not only Rs. 1,500 for pain and suffering and special damage, but a further Rs. 19,000 for general damages. The Subordinate Judge dismissed that latter claim as adventitious and absurd. Before the High Court there were appeals and cross-appeals. The appeals against the Master and Chief Steward were not proceeded with and these parties went out of the proceedings. The High Court upheld the judgment of the Subordinate Judge in so far as the Court held the appellants liable in damages, but did so on quite different grounds from those on which the Subordinate Judge gave his judgment. On the respondent's cross-appeal on damages the High Court held that the sum awarded by the Subordinate Judge was inadequate and increased the award to Rs. 5,000.

The grounds of claim were originally twofold. But one of these grounds was negatived by both Courts below. It depended on an issue of fact, and in their Lordships' opinion the concurrent finding of fact should stand. That ground of claim was based on the terms of the statutory articles of agreement under which the appellant agreed to serve on the Markhor. One of the provisions of the articles was that the lascar crew (which included the respondent) should not serve between October 1 in any one year and March 31 in the next year on voyages to any port on the east coast of North America north of 38°N. latitude. The respondent claimed that that provision had been broken. The appellants' witnesses denied that any lascars (including the respondent) had worked in contravention of that provision. The Judges in both Courts accepted the evidence called on behalf of the appellants, which was supported by entries in the official log book. This ground of claim accordingly failed, and need not be further considered

The other ground of complaint was that there had been a failure on the part of the Master and Chief Steward to exercise proper care in regard to the illness from which the respondent suffered during the voyage. The voyage on which the respondent was engaged was from Calcutta to Atlantic ports in North America. The respondent fell ill near Gibraltar, on or about September 18, 1933, with a bad cold. He did not do any further work on the vessel till he was discharged on November 3, 1933, at Avonmouth, where the doctor diagnosed the illness from which he was suffering to be phthisis, and advised his removal to hospital. This was done. He was eventually after treatment sent back to India as a distressed seaman, where he was finally discharged. The medical officer at Avonmouth gave a certificate that the respondent was suffering from advanced phthisis. It is not disputed that the respondent's health has since been very bad.

After the respondent fell ill, the ship reached ports in America and England as follow :-

|              |    |    |               |
|--------------|----|----|---------------|
| November 3   | .. | .. | Avonmouth.    |
| October 30   | .. | .. | Southampton.  |
| October 29   | .. | .. | London.       |
| October 16   | .. | .. | Boston.       |
| October 14   | .. | .. | New York.     |
| October 11   | .. | .. | Newport News. |
| October 10   | .. | .. | Norfolk, Va.  |
| October 7    | .. | .. | Baltimore.    |
| October 5    | .. | .. | Philadelphia. |
| October 2    | .. | .. | New York.     |
| September 28 | .. | .. | Boston.       |

There was a serious variance between the respondent's account of what happened on the voyage and that given by the appellants' witnesses. But in substance the Judges in both Courts accepted the evidence of the witnesses called by the appellants, which may be thus summarised.

When the respondent fell ill, he was, with the approval of the Master, given cough mixture by the Chief Steward, whose duty it was to administer medical attention to sick members of the crew. About the same time warm clothing was issued to all the deck lascars, including the respondent. When the ship reached Boston on September 28, 1933, there was a special muster of the crew for the United States quarantine authorities, and the respondent was examined by the Port Medical Officer, on whose advice he was put on a diet of eggs and milk, and was given medicine and codliver oil. At every subsequent port of call the respondent was examined by doctors habitually employed by the appellants. At Philadelphia and Norfolk the Master (according to his evidence) requested the doctors to have the respondent removed to hospital, but they each said that it was not a hospital case. Without the authority of a doctor the respondent could not be removed to a hospital on shore. On the second call at Boston the doctor gave the respondent enough codliver oil for the voyage to London, and at London the doctor who examined the respondent gave him turpentine liniment for massaging his throat and chest. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether there was a medical examination of the respondent at London. The Chief Steward deposed that there was, but the Master denied this. This last question cannot be regarded as very material, as it was only a very few days between the time when the ship was at London and her arrival at Avonmouth, where, as already stated, on the advice of the doctor who, in accordance with the practice of the appellants, examined the respondent, and who diagnosed phthisis, he was removed to hospital.

The Subordinate Judge held the appellants responsible to the respondent in damages on the ground that the cause of the respondent's damage was the negligence of the doctors engaged by the appellants at the various ports of call in not diagnosing the respondent's condition as tubercular or indeed as anything worse than a common cold. But negligence on the part of these doctors was not pleaded as a cause of action, and no evidence was given on the point. Neither they nor the appellants had any opportunity of answering such a case. No evidence was given as to the relationship between the doctors at the various ports and the appellants. There is nothing in the evidence to justify the conclusion that the doctors were negligent or that even if they were negligent, the appellants were responsible for that negligence. The High Court rightly reversed the finding of the Subordinate Judge on that point.

But the High Court held that the appellants were responsible for the negligence of the Master and Chief Steward which the Court found. The Court held that the Master and Chief Steward had failed to take proper care of the respondent when they knew he had a bad cold. The High Court expressed their opinion in these words :—

"... We have no hesitation in expressing our concurrence with the view indicated in the judgment of the Court below, that the defendant No. 3 should have in view of the prolonged illness of the plaintiff, suspected something serious with the plaintiff, and to that has to be added that the negligence in this behalf was fully shared by the Chief Steward, whose duty was to look after the ailing crew on board the ship. In our judgment, the Chief Steward, charged with the duty of attending to complaints in cases of sickness, and the Master of the vessel, who, by the very nature of things, exercised the functions of the owners of the ship when on high seas, for the purpose of looking after the health and safety of the crew employed on the ship, were careless and negligent in the matter of taking reasonable and proper care of the plaintiff in his illness, which within the period of time from September 18, to November 3, 1933, had developed into an advanced case of phthisis. The plaintiff, on account of the omission on the part of the servants of defendant No. 1 had been placed in a position of risk of life. If the life of the plaintiff has been saved, he has, according to medical evidence, been incapacitated from doing work for the rest of his life."

Their Lordships, after carefully considering the evidence, have found themselves unable to concur in this view.

There is a want of authority as to the precise extent of the duty of a shipowner in regard to the securing of the health and safety of the crew. But the responsibility of the owner in these respects is in general limited to the exercise of reasonable care, though a higher degree of responsibility may be imposed on him by statute, in which case the duty is generally imposed in mandatory terms. In Couch v. Steel<sup>1</sup> the allegation was that the seaman had suffered in health and become ill because of the unseaworthy and leaking condition of the ship, by reason of which he was continually wet and was compelled to undergo excessive and unreasonable labour. The seaman's claim was rejected. It could only, it was held, be maintained in the absence of proof of an express warranty or of knowledge or want of due care, if there was an implied warranty by the shipowner to the seaman that the ship was seaworthy. But the warranty of seaworthiness which is implied, where not excluded in marine insurance policies of bills of lading, is not, it was held in Couch v. Steel (supra), to be implied in agreements between shipowners and seamen, though it may be in some cases imposed by statute. But there was in that case a second count alleging that the plaintiff could not be cured of his illness because the shipowner, the defendant, had neglected to provide a proper supply of medicines suitable to diseases arising on sea voyages. That claim was based on a statutory obligation laid upon the defendant by s. 18, 7 & 8 Vic. c. 112. This, it was held, was not an obligation which could be fulfilled by the exercise of care but was positive in its terms. The plaintiff was accordingly held entitled to recover on that count on proof that a proper supply had not in fact been provided. A similar provision is now contained in s. 200 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. There are also various other provisions in the Act dealing with medical attendance. Thus s. 209 provides that a foreign-going ship is to carry a fully qualified medical practitioner if she has on board one hundred persons or upwards. Again, s. 458 puts on a shipowner an obligation which is to be deemed to be part of the agreement with the seamen that he should use all reasonable means to ensure that the ship is seaworthy when the voyage commences and to keep her seaworthy during the voyage. In the present case there is no claim that any of these statutory obligations have been infringed. The Markhor carried less than one hundred persons. It is not suggested that she was unseaworthy in any respect, or that she was not equipped with medical stores or did not in any other respects satisfy the requirements of the Act. Section 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, requires that all expenses of medical attendance and all expenses of medicines on the voyage are to be defrayed by the shipowner. There is no complaint on this head.

The ground on which the High Court held the appellants liable was for breach of their common law obligations which were for purposes of this case taken to be to require the exercise of due care in attending to and looking after the health of the seaman by themselves and their servants. The shipowners were not held to have been personally guilty of any neglect or default. No defects were found in the equipment of the vessel or in regard to the competence of the officers or to the system of working the ship. The negligence which was found was purely that of the Master and the Chief Steward, as stated in the passage just quoted from the judgment of the High Court. Their Lordships, after carefully considering the whole of the evidence, find themselves unable to concur in the judgment of the High Court. There was, in their opinion, no evidence which would justify a finding that the Master and Chief Steward or either of them were careless or negligent in the matter of taking reasonable and proper care of the respondent. On the contrary, their Lordships are of opinion that on the evidence the two officers did all that was possible for them to do under the circumstances. The only other thing that might have been done was to land the respondent and put him in hospital at one of the United States ports. But that could not have been done unless the terms of s. 36 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, were satisfied, that is that a certificate of the proper authority, who was, under s. 49, in this case, the British Consular Officer, had been obtained, stating the cause of the seaman being left behind, as, for instance, unfitness or inability to proceed to sea. Furthermore, the Immigration Authorities in the United States would not allow a seaman to be landed at their ports unless for sufficient grounds. The evidence is that the Master, both at Philadelphia and Norfolk, requested the doctors who examined the respondent to have him removed to hospital, but they said that it was not a hospital case. All that the Master could do was to follow the directions of the different medical men who examined the respondent at the different ports, and to supply him with the special diet, eggs and milk, and the special remedies, codliver oil and liniment, which were prescribed. The respondent was off duty all the time after September 18, 1933. There is no reason to hold that the Master did not suspect that something serious was the matter with the respondent. He did all that could be done on the ship. The difficulty was that the medical officers at the various ports would not certify that it was a hospital case. The Master and Chief Steward could not be held blameworthy for that.

There was no satisfactory medical evidence as to the general nature and symptoms of phthisis or as to the development of the disease in this case.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the claim fails and that the judgment of the High Court should be set aside because it has not been established that the Master and Chief Steward or either of them failed in their duty to the respondent.

This conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the case against the appellants, but in the High Court the appellants raised a further defence based on the doctrine of common employment. It was said that even if the Master and Chief Steward were negligent, they were fellow servants of the respondent and hence the appellants were entitled to plead common employment as a defence. This question was first raised in the High Court. It was not raised either in the written statement filed in the suit, or at the hearing before the Subordinate Judge. As their Lordships understand the judgment of the High Court on this point, they were of opinion that as the decision of the question depended on evidence in the particular case, it could not be allowed to be argued in face of objections to that course made by the respondent. Their Lordships are not willing to overrule the discretion of the High Court on this point. There is also now the further and conclusive objection that as their Lordships have decided that the Master and Chief Steward were not guilty of negligence, the point would not in any event have been material.

Their Lordships might leave the matter there. But the High Court, though, it seems, without departing from their decision that the point was not open to the appellants, did go on to make some observations on the doctrine of common employment. Their Lordships do not think it proper in this case to examine in any detail this doctrine or its applicability in the law of India. But they will remark that if the law of England had applied, the shipowners could have raised a defence based on the doctrine of common employment to a claim by a seaman against them based on negligence of a fellow servant, including in that category the Master of the vessel. Such a claim was rejected on that ground by the House of Lords in Hedley v. Pinkney and Son's Steamship Company.<sup>1</sup> Lord Herschell, at p. 226, said :—

"My Lords, it cannot be doubted that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the master of the vessel, but it is equally free from doubt that if he is to be regarded as the servant of the owner engaged in a common employment with the seaman who lost his life, liability does not, in the existing state of the law, attach to the respondents. It was argued that the master of a vessel, although in some respects the servant of the shipowner, possesses in relation to the crew powers and duties independent of him, and that the law which exempts a master from liability to his servant for the negligence of another servant engaged in a common employment with him did not apply in such a case.

"The only authority cited for this proposition was a case of Ramsay v. Quinn,<sup>2</sup> in the Court of Common Pleas (Ireland). But in view of the judgment of this House in Wilson v. Merry,<sup>3</sup> which was recently considered in the case of Johnson v. Lindsay,<sup>4</sup> I do not think it is possible to give effect to the contention of the appellant."

The House then went on to consider an alternative claim based not on negligence but on a breach of the statutory obligation of the shipowner to provide a seaworthy ship. That claim did not depend on negligence in the ordinary sense and the doctrine of common employment did not apply. But it failed because the House held that the ship was not in fact unseaworthy. There has recently been in the House of Lords a discussion of the doctrine in Radcliffe v. Ribble Motor Services, Ltd.,<sup>5</sup> where it was held that the basis of the doctrine was the implied contract by the servant to accept the risk of his fellow servants' negligence (see Lord Atkin at p. 227), and that if the contract was to be implied, the servants must be engaged in common work, that is, work which necessarily and naturally or in the normal course involves juxtaposition, local or causal, of the fellow employees, and exposure to the risk of the negligence of the one affecting the other. It was held in Radcliffe's case (supra) that this condition was not fulfilled. But Hedley's case (supra) shows that difference in grade and responsibility does not exclude the doctrine, so long as the nexus exists. Similarly in Wilson v. Merry,<sup>6</sup> it was held that there was common employment between a miner and a works manager of the mine.

But there is a serious question whether the doctrine of common employment is part of the law of India. It has been severely criticised in England by many high judicial authorities, as, for instance, in Radcliffe's case, Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. v. English<sup>1</sup> and in many other judgments. It has indeed in England only been made enduring by reason of legislative measures. Thus the Employers Liability Act, 1880, established exceptions to its application, though with restrictions as to mode of procedure and amount of damages recoverable which made the Act unsatisfactory. Later there came the series of Workmen's Compensation Acts commencing with that of 1897 which have given the workman rights against his employer in the nature of insurance against the risk of injury arising out of and in the course of his employment apart from negligence. These measures have made the doctrine of common employment less objectionable in England. In addition the doctrine does not apply to claims by workmen for injuries caused by breaches of statutory duties imposed for their protection or for breach of duties personal to the employer. Questions have been raised whether a doctrine so unsatisfactory both as to its policy and as to its practical results ought to be followed at all or at any rate without qualifications by the Indian Courts as a part of the law of India, particularly when in England it has been qualified and largely abrogated by legislation which has no counterpart in India. Thus in Secretary of State v. Rukhminibai,<sup>2</sup> Stone C. J., in the Nagpur High Court, refused to apply it. It may further be observed that the fiction of an implied contract has always been regarded as difficult, but it becomes even more difficult to accept in the case of a workman like a lascar. But their Lordships do not desire to discuss or express any opinion upon this important question since it does not arise in this case. It must be left for full discussion in some case in which it is material and has been fully argued.

In the result they are of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, the judgments below should be set aside and judgment should be entered for the appellants.

They will humbly so advise His Majesty.

In the circumstances there will be no order respecting costs either in the Courts below or of this appeal.

July 8.

Provincial Insolvency Act (V of 1920), Sec. 53—Fraudulent transfer—Good faith—Power of attorney, scope of.

Where the agent of a creditor, taking advantage of the dominating position he holds, seizes the title-deeds of the debtor, with the view of taking hold of as much property as he can get, regardless of the solvency of the debtor or the claims of other creditors, whom he puts off by a false assurance that their money is safe, the transaction is entirely devoid of the element of good faith, which is a necessary ingredient of the provisions of s. 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920, and is liable to be avoided under the section.

A person holding a power-of-attorney, which authorises him to appoint a substitute, is not at liberty to authorise a stranger orally to mortgage the property of the principal.

THE facts appear sufficiently from the judgment.

J. P. Eddy and W. Wallach, for the appellants.

H. J. Wallington and R. W. Leach, for the respondent.

MR. M. R. JAYAKAR. The question raised by this appeal is whether a mortgage by deposit of deeds made in favour of the appellants within two years of an adjudication in insolvency under circumstances mentioned below was voidable against the respondent (the receiver of the insolvent's estate) under s. 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920. The District Court held that it was not voidable, and the appellate Court that it was.

The material portion of s. 53 is as follows :—

"Any transfer of property not being a transfer made . . . in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration shall, if the transferor is adjudged insolvent on a petition presented within two years after the date of the transfer, be voidable as against the receiver and may be annulled by the Court."

The insolvent, L. M. R. S. M. Somasundaram Chettyar, carried on business as Chettyar at Kyaikto in the district of Thaton in Burma. In 1931, he left Burma for India. The business was then carried on by his son-in-law Swaminathan, under a power of attorney dated June 29, 1928 (exhibit 3a). In May, 1932, Swaminathan also went to India, leaving the business in charge of the insolvent's son Valliappa, who was then a minor under the age of eighteen years.

The appellants' firm carried on the business of money lending at Rangoon. Between 1928 and 1931, the insolvent was their agent, and for a period before 1928, and again for a period after 1931 (which includes the times material to this appeal) their agent was one Arunachalam.

P. C. On April 13, 1933, the insolvent owed to the appellants' firm the sum of 1940 Rs. 25,942-13-6. On that date, one Nagalingam, an employee of the insolvent's firm, handed over to Arunachalam documents of title to about 560 acres of land owned by the insolvent and valued at Rs. 67,000, and also registered mortgage deeds valued at Rs. 12,000, making a total value of Rs. 79,000.
 CHETTYAR FIRM v. U ON MAUNG This is the transaction in issue in the appeal.

Mr. Jayakar On September 26, 1933, a petition for the adjudication of the insolvent was presented by a creditor in the District Court of Thaton, and on August 14, 1934, an order of adjudication was made against the insolvent. In an inventory filed in the Court thereafter, the insolvent's properties were shown as of the total acreage of 739, and of the value of Rs. 1,06,078-3-0. The list of debts owed to him were of the total amount of Rs. 66,907-7-9. Thus his total assets were of the estimated value of Rs. 1,72,985. His total liabilities, on the other hand, were shown as of the value of Rs. 1,78,655. In the list of creditors the appellants' firm was shown as a creditor, claiming as security for the debt owing to it (Rs. 25,942-13-6) an equitable mortgage of the lands and mortgage bonds mentioned above.

On May 10, 1935, the respondent was appointed receiver of the insolvent's property under s. 59 of the Act, and on August 26, 1935, the respondent instituted the present suit in the District Court of Thaton by a petition praying that the appellants' mortgage might be held null and void. He alleged that at the date of the mortgage the insolvent was not in Burma and was not duly represented by an agent; that the mortgage was a fraudulent and a sham transaction entered into by collusion between Arunachalam and Nagalingam with a view to defeat and delay other creditors; that the mortgage was not validly created and was void, and if it was created in Rangoon, it was equally void, as the mortgagor did not create it and his agent Nagalingam was not duly authorised by a proper power of attorney. The respondent's petition did not expressly raise the issue that any authority to create the mortgage which the insolvent might have given to Nagalingam was terminated by the insolvent's subsequent insanity, which existed at the material date. It appears, however, that both parties led evidence about the insolvent's state of mind.

By their written statement the appellants denied the allegations of law and fact made in the petition, except that they admitted that the title deeds in issue were in deposit with them and that the insolvent was not in Burma at the time. Evidence was led on both sides, some of which was on commission.

On December 5, 1936, the District Judge decided in favour of the appellants, holding that the evidence did not show that the transfer was either fraudulent or without consideration. He disallowed the allegation of insanity on the ground that it was not taken in the receiver's petition, and held that the evidence was not sufficiently strong in its favour. He further held that Nagalingam was the agent of the insolvent and deposited the deeds under a power of attorney obtained from Swaminathan, authorising him to do so. Their Lordships have derived very little help from the judgment of the District Judge, which is a mere abstract of the depositions, and contains no discussion of the evidence or of the reasons which led him to his conclusions. This may be due to the fact that, as the High Court observes, the judge was ill at the time, suffering from a nervous breakdown, and had soon to be relieved of his duties. Some of the important witnesses were examined on commission and he had not the benefit of hearing their evidence given, nor of an argument addressed in open Court by the respondent's counsel, who submitted only a written note, which, the judge said, it was difficult for him to understand.

v.

U ON MAUNG

Mr. Jayakar

The respondent filed an appeal to the High Court at Rangoon, and Goodman Roberts C. J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, set aside the order of the District Court. He held that though the burden of proof lay on the receiver, he had discharged it by showing that Nagalingam had no power to make the transfer; that the alleged power of attorney in his favour was not proved, and that even if Nagalingam had authority to make the transfer, it was terminated by the insanity of the insolvent. He further held that the evidence clearly showed that Arunachalam had stepped in to manage the insolvent's business when there was no effective manager, taking good care that creditors in whom he was interested should be given security and the rest excluded, and that Nagalingam, who was a mere debt-collecting clerk, was "seized upon to go through the farce of pretending to execute" the mortgage, and that there was an entire absence of good faith. The High Court accordingly passed a decree setting aside the order of the District Court and declaring that the mortgage was null and void against the respondent. From this decree an appeal has been preferred to His Majesty in Council.

The questions which arise for decision are, first, whether it is proved that Nagalingam had authority to make the transfer. The appellants urge that the onus of disproving this lay on the respondent, who, on the other hand, contends that the properties transferred admittedly belonged to the insolvent, and were found to be in the possession of the appellants. The latter, therefore, had to prove how they had come by them, as against the respondent, who was trying to secure them as belonging to the insolvent's estate. The appellants' possession of the said properties did not necessarily indicate that they held them under a valid title, which had to be made out by affirmative evidence. The onus, therefore, it was urged, lay in the first instance, on the appellants to prove their title to the said properties.

Their Lordships think that there is great force in this contention. There was nothing in the shape of a memorandum of deposit or any document indicating how and when the deeds had come into the possession of the appellants. Their possession was obtained at a time and under circumstances showing that the insolvent himself could not have delivered them, and, as this was clearly established by the evidence, the appellants could retain the deeds only by showing that they had obtained them from someone acting on behalf of the insolvent and under his authority. The only person alleged to have had this authority was Nagalingam and, though he was available as a witness and was present in Court, he was not called by the appellants to give evidence. An alleged power of attorney given to him by Swaminathan on June 30, 1928, was relied upon, but there is no satisfactory evidence that such a power of attorney existed or was operative at the material date. The evidence shows that the document, if it existed, would be with Nagalingam. It was alleged

P. C. on the appellants' behalf that the document was with the insolvent in India, 1940 but of this there is no satisfactory proof. A notice to produce the document — was served upon the son of the insolvent, but it was not produced. Second-CHETTYAR ary evidence was therefore given of the contents of the alleged power by call-FIRM ing one Mr. Daniel, a lawyer, who had occasion, in connection with the case
 v. of another client, to examine the contents of the alleged power. He clearly U ON MAUNG stated that the power which was shown to him did not give to Nagalingam — any right to mortgage the property. The witness Karuppan also produced Mr. Jayakar a document (exhibit K), which he stated was a copy of the alleged power — given to Nagalingam. Exhibit K is dated June 30, 1928, a day later than the date of exhibit 3a, and the number 28 which it bears identifies it with the document mentioned in exhibit 6 (certified copy of the extract from the register of powers) on which the appellants rely. On an examination of the contents of exhibit K, however, it is clear that it gives no authority to make a mortgage of the insolvent's property. To meet this difficulty, Arunachalam, called for the appellants, relied in his evidence on another document, exhibit 3b, which he said was an exact copy of Swaminathan's power (exhibit 3a) made on the same date, namely June 29, 1928. This is obviously incorrect, because it is clearly stated at the bottom of exhibit 3b that the copy was made on April 27, 1933.

It is thus clear that the power of attorney by which Swaminathan is alleged to have given authority to Nagalingam to make the mortgage on April 13, 1933, has not been proved. Besides, the existence of such a power in 1928 would be totally inconsistent with exhibit 2a (read along with exhibit 1a) which is a letter written by Swaminathan on May 12, 1932, stating that as he was leaving for the country by the next day the letter was given as an authority to Nagalingam to carry on debit and credit transactions as per instructions.

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that, in the absence of such a power, the mortgage in question must fail. The appellants argued that the absence of this power made no difference, because the evidence clearly showed that Nagalingam was managing the insolvent's business and that Swaminathan, who had authority under exhibit 3a to appoint a substitute, exercised the authority by giving oral instructions to Nagalingam to make the mortgage. It is hardly necessary to observe that this view cannot be sustained on the wording of exhibit 3a. By that document the insolvent gave power to Swaminathan to appoint a substitute and not to authorise a stranger orally to mortgage the insolvent's property.

There is a further difficulty in the appellants' way, caused by the alleged insanity of the insolvent at the material date. If it existed, then, under s. 201 of the Indian Contract Act (1872) it would terminate any authority previously given. Their Lordships have examined the evidence and they think that there is satisfactory proof to support the finding of the High Court that the insanity existed at the material time. The witness Kadiresan, examined on the respondent's behalf, states, and their Lordships see no reason to doubt his testimony, that the insolvent was insane in February, March and April, 1933. This is corroborated by other evidence, including that of a medical witness (No. 17) who attended the insolvent between March 7 and 11, 1933, and found him insane and violent. There is also an affidavit sworn by the insolvent on October 3, 1933, in which he states that he suddenly became insane and remained so for about six months, and even at the date of the affidavit he was not completely free from the effects of insanity. Lastly, there are exhibits C.1 and C.2, the Commissioner's report and memo. dated March 14, 1933, made in the course of the insolvency proceedings, initiated against the insolvent by another creditor at Devacottai, in which it is clearly stated that the insolvent's vakil informed the Commissioner on March 11, that the insolvent, who was to be examined as a witness, was suffering from mental derangement and could not, therefore, be examined.

The insanity is denied by Arunachalam, who was called as a witness on behalf of the appellants. Before commenting on his evidence, it is material to observe that this witness occupied a very dubious position in these proceedings. Though he was an agent of the appellants' firm from and after 1931, it appears from the evidence that, at or about the material time, he was also in effective control and management of the insolvent's firm and practically in a position to dominate its affairs. In support of this view, there is enough evidence on the record, some of which may be briefly noticed. Witnesses Nos. 13, 15 and 16 examined before the Court on behalf of the receiver, and witnesses Nos. 18, 19 and 20 examined on commission, clearly testify to the dominating position which Arunachalam held in connection with the conduct of the insolvent's business at or about the material times. Their testimony is corroborated by a letter (exhibit E) written by Arunachalam to Nagalingam on September 17, 1933, directing him, with reference to another creditor of the insolvent's firm, to show the creditor the accounts and bring and deliver at Rangoon, by way of security, a good document acceptable to him. The petitioning creditor in his evidence states that this letter was given to him and this also accords with the probabilities. Arunachalam denied that he gave such a letter. On such denial, the respondent asked the Court for an order calling upon the appellants to produce the press copy book of correspondence from April, 1932, to December, 1933. The judge made the order but the press copy book was not produced on the ground that the book was in India. There is another letter which confirms the above view, namely exhibit 1 (English translation 1a) which has already been referred to in another connection. It is the letter written by Swaminathan giving directions to Nagalingam to carry on debit and credit transactions as per his instructions. Arunachalam admits that the draft of this letter is in his handwriting, and Swaminathan states that he wrote this letter under the instructions of Arunachalam. If, as this evidence shows, Arunachalam was in effective control and management of the insolvent's business at the material date, it is futile to contend that he was ignorant of the debtor's insanity or insolvency.

The third question relates to the good faith of the transaction. Here also their Lordships agree with the finding of the High Court. On this question it is not easy to disregard the fact that the disputed transaction was not an isolated one but formed one of a series, and further, as the judgment of the High Court states, a relationship existed between Arunachalam and the appellants and also between him and the creditors preferred in some of the other transactions. Apart from this, there is enough evidence to prove that the transaction was a collusive one between Arunachalam and Nagalingam. Even if the fact is ignored that for a debt of Rs. 25,942 the appellants obtained title deeds to property worth Rs. 79,000, the method in which the transaction was brought about is amply suggestive of bad faith and also of the fact that Arunachalam, though aware of the insolvent condition of the debtor, took care to conceal it from the other creditors. The denials of Arunachalam in this behalf are palpably false and on one or two points on which he could have easily admitted the truth he has prevaricated. Their Lordships, therefore, prefer to accept the testimony of Subramaniam and Kadiresan that when they asked for securities from the insolvent's firm as regards their dues, Arunachalam assured them, apparently on behalf of the insolvent, that there was no need to fear and that the matter would be settled. Arunachalam appears to have been examined virtually to deny all matters which were adverse to the appellants' claim, and has proved himself unworthy of credit. His version about having exhibits 3a and 3b before him at the same time and his copying the one from the other, to which reference has already been made, has to be rejected having regard to the dates. Further, his own version of the manner in which the title deeds in question were obtained exposes the true nature of the transaction. Briefly stated, his evidence is that on one and the same day, from morning till evening, all the documents were handed over to him in three lots. He had not looked into the accounts and other matters relating to the documents, although the ledgers were produced by Nagalingam. Nagalingam came alone, without the insolvent's son. Arunachalam never saw the properties at the time of taking the deposit. He took whatever deeds he thought to be good, and returned the rest. This was done in the kitchen room. He never enquired what the debts were which the insolvent owed to other creditors. He only asked for his firm's (appellants') dues, without ascertaining what the assets and the liabilities of the insolvent were. He had not ascertained them even at the date of his cross-examination (July 4, 1936).

It is clear from this evidence that by the use of his dominating position he seized the title deeds, with the view of taking hold of as much property as he could get, regardless of the solvency of the debtor or the claims of the other creditors, whom he put off by a false assurance that their money was safe. Such a transaction must be held to be entirely devoid of the element of good faith, which is a necessary ingredient of the provisions of s. 53 of the Act.

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that, on each of these grounds, the transaction in dispute must fail. The decree of the High Court will, therefore, be confirmed, and the appeal dismissed. The appellants will pay the respondent's costs of this appeal.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

July 18:

Mortgage—Personal covenant to pay—Limitation—Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 116—Mortgage deed executed in course of execution proceedings—Permission of Collector not obtained as required by sch. III, para. 11, Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908)—Deed whether null and void—Applicability of s. 65 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872)—Personal liability in respect of such transaction—Transaction of mortgage between legal adviser and client—Scrutiny by Court—Circumstances under which such transaction is valid—Joint Hindu family—Presumption, whether such family has joint property.

A personal covenant to pay contained in a registered mortgage deed is governed by art. 116 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

A deed of mortgage effected in the course of execution proceedings before a Collector without his permission, as required by sch. III, para. 11, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is null and void. Such a deed falls within the words "discovered to be void" in s. 65 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The mortgage, however, stands in respect of the personal liability for the money actually paid, with proper interest thereon. If the loan is bona fide and is actually received and the terms are not unreasonable, the mortgagee is entitled to receive payment of whatever may be due on the mortgage, with interest thereon at reasonable rate.

Transactions of mortgage between a legal adviser and client to secure the repayment of money advanced at the time are not ordinarily subjected by Courts to the same jealous scrutiny as, for instance, a gift from a client to a legal adviser, or purchases or sales at undervalue between a legal adviser and client. If the money is sorely needed and is paid, the mortgagor has its benefit, the rate of interest is reasonable, and the terms neither excessive nor onerous, the transaction stands as a valid mortgage between the parties.

In the case of a joint Hindu family there is no presumption that it possesses joint property or any property at all. There must be affirmative evidence to show that the family has property.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment and decree of the Chief Court of Oudh, Lucknow.

The facts appear fully in their Lordships' judgment.

MR. M. R. JAYAKAR. These proceedings arise out of two mortgage deeds exhibits 3 and 5 executed on January 18, 1919, and August 14, 1919, respectively. The respondents' father Motilal was the mortgagee and the appellant's father Yar Mohammad Khan the mortgagor.

The events which led to the present litigation are as follows—

By a mortgage deed dated July 8, 1908, Mohammad Ewaz Ali Khan, the appellant's grandfather, who was the taluqdar of Mahona, District Sultanpur, in Oudh, mortgaged his estate, consisting of twenty-six villages, to the Allahabad Bank, Limited, for securing payment of a sum of Rs. 1,50,000 with compound interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum with half-yearly rests. In 1914, the bank instituted a suit against the mortgagor and certain transferees from him, including his wife Saifuran Bibi, and on April 12, 1915, a preliminary decree was passed for Rs. 1,77,001-13-9 with interest and costs, to be paid by October 12, 1915, and, in default, the mortgaged property was to be sold. On July 24, 1915, the mortgagor died and his son Yar Mohammad Khan succeeded to the taluqa. On June 17, 1916, a final decree was passed for the amount of Rs. 2,05,382-12-6 against Yar Mohammad Khan and others. The bank instituted proceedings for executing the decree in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Sultanpur, who, on February 5, 1917, transferred the case to the Court of the Deputy Commissioner at Sultanpur for execution under the provisions of s. 68 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. It may be noted that the Deputy Commissioner had the powers of a Collector under that section.

On March 6, 1918, Yar Mohammad Khan applied to the Deputy Commissioner for leave to pay the decretal amount by instalments or under some other arrangement intended to save the estate. Thereupon, a revenue officer, called the sale officer, reported to the Deputy Commissioner on June 11, 1918, that the debt could be discharged either by taking the property into direct management or by mortgaging or letting it in perpetuity. Inquiries about the last two alternatives were then instituted by the Deputy Commissioner. Consequent on this, applications were made before the Deputy Commissioner by various persons, offering to lease the property or suggesting arrangements under which the debt could be paid off.

On September 11, 1918, Yar Mohammad Khan, by a power-of-attorney signed by his general agent Sahib Rai, appointed Manoharlal, a well-known pleader of Fyzabad, his vakil in the execution proceedings. On the same day, when the matter came before the Deputy Commissioner, Yar Mohammad Khan was represented by three pleaders, including Manoharlal, and also by his general agent, Sahib Rai; and the various persons who desired to lease the property were represented by vakils. A statement of Sahib Rai was recorded, and by an order of this date the application of Yar Mohammad Khan for permission to mortgage the property was granted.

Thereupon, Motilal, the son of Manoharlal, paid Rs. 1,50,000 into Court and twenty villages out of the twenty-six were mortgaged to him by Yar Mohammad Khan by a document of January 18, 1919, exhibit 3, to secure payment of the sum with compound interest at eight per cent. per annum with six-monthly rests.

Out of the remaining six villages, one was sold for Rs. 45,000 and another (Gadaryadih) for Rs. 60,000. The latter village was in the possession of Saifuran Bibi, who raised a claim to it, and for satisfying it Yar Mohammad Khan desired to cancel its sale by repaying to the purchaser the price he had paid. For that purpose Yar Mohammad Khan borrowed another sum of Rs. 70,000 from Motilal on the security of a further charge on the twenty villages. The document relating to this mortgage is exhibit 5 and is dated August 14, 1919. The written permission of the Deputy Commissioner was not obtained for this mortgage. With the moneys borrowed from Motilal under exhibits 3 and 5, the bank's decree was paid off. Gadaryadih and the other four villages were then exempted from sale and, the bank's decree having been satisfied, the execution proceedings were returned to the Court and came to an end on May 31, 1920.

Yar Mohammad Khan died on January 31, 1924, and his son, the appellant, succeeded to the taluq. Interest was duly paid for a time by Yar Mohammad Khan and the appellant on the principal sums owing in respect of the mortgages, exhibits 3 and 5, but default having occurred in the subsequent payments of the principal amount and of the interest, on April 30, 1932, Motilal instituted the present suit against the appellant in the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur. He claimed payment of the sum of Rs. 2,26,170-5-0 due in respect of the mortgages, exhibits 3 and 5, and in default of payment asked for a sale of the mortgaged property (the twenty villages).

The claim was contested on various grounds, and the Subordinate Judge framed certain issues, of which only the following are now material :—

“(4) (a) Was Manoharlal the legal adviser of Yar Mahommad Khan at the time of exhibits 3 and 5? (b) If so, were these transactions entered into in good faith?

(6) (a) Were exhibits 3 and 5 executed with the permission of the Collector of Sultanpur? (b) If so; what is its effect? (c) If not, what is its effect?

(10) Is the interest stipulated in the mortgage deeds unfair and extortionate?”

It may be noticed that an issue (No. 5) was raised, whether the mortgaged deeds were procured by the exercise of undue influence on the part of Manoharlal, but it was not pressed at the hearing.

Motilal died pending the suit, and the names of his sons the present respondents were substituted in his place.

On October 30, 1933, the Subordinate Judge gave judgment. He held (a) that at the time when the two mortgage deeds were executed Manoharlal was the pleader and legal adviser of Yar Mohammad Khan and that a fiduciary relationship consequently existed between them; (b) that in view of such relationship, the onus rested upon the plaintiffs to prove that the transactions in question were entered into in good faith, and that they had totally failed to discharge the onus; (c) that, since Manoharlal had committed a breach of duty by which he had obtained an undue or unconscionable advantage, he had been guilty of fraud; (d) that the Deputy Commissioner's permission had been duly obtained for the execution of exhibit 3, as required by paragraph 11, schedule III, of the Civil Procedure Code, but that no such permission had been obtained for the execution of exhibit 5 and that deed was therefore void ab initio; (e); that exhibit 3 was voidable but plaintiffs were entitled to recover Rs. 1,50,000 with simple interest at six per cent. per annum under the provisions of s. 65 of the Indian Contract Act; (f) that since exhibit 5 was void, ab initio, the defendant was not liable to make any payment thereunder; (g) that the rate of interest was not unfair or extortionate.

On the above findings, the Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit for sale, but gave a decree to the respondents for Rs. 1,50,000 (the amount of the mortgage exhibit 3) with simple interest at six per cent. per annum from January 18, 1919, the date of exhibit 3, until the date of the suit, subject to the condition that the payments made by the appellant and his father under both the mortgage deeds should be set off. On calculation it was found that the amounts paid by the appellant exceeded those due to the respondents. The latter were therefore ordered to pay the appellant's full costs.

The respondents appealed to the Chief Court, and on August 18, 1936, the learned Judges of that Court delivered judgment in which they upheld the findings of the Subordinate Judge on issues (4) (a), (4) (b) and (6). As regards repayment of the amounts lent under exhibit 5, they differed from the Subordinate Judge's view and ordered payment of the amount due under it. Their reasons, inter alia, were (a) that in the circumstances of the case exhibit 5 fell within the words "discovered to be void" occurring in s. 65; (b) that though the deed failed as a mortgage, as the defendant sought equity he must do equity; (c) that the deed contained a personal covenant to pay, the enforcement of which was not barred by limitation. Accordingly, they confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge with respect to the refund of the amounts due under exhibit 3, but modified it by ordering the appellant to repay the amount due under exhibit 5, at the same rate of interest, from and up to the same dates and subject to the same conditions as in the case of exhibit 3. Interest pendente lite and future interest was allowed at three per cent. per annum on any sums which might be found due after calculations had been made in accordance with the direction contained in the decree. In the end, they passed a decree for the respondent for the amount of Rs. 1,62,370-9-9.

Both parties have appealed to His Majesty in Council. The two appeals were consolidated and heard together.

The first question argued on behalf of the appellant was that as the suit was for sale and was dismissed, the Courts below had no power to pass a decree for the repayment of the money due under the mortgages. Apart from the reasons mentioned in the Chief Court's judgment, this argument loses sight of the fact that the plaintiffs in their prayer (a) asked for a repayment of the amounts due on the mortgages, and a sale in default of it. There was also a prayer (d) asking for such further and other relief as the Court might think fit. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the Courts in Oudh (hereinafter referred to as the two Courts) were justified in making the order of repayment.

It was also urged that the enforcement of the personal covenant to pay contained in the deeds was barred by limitation at the date of the suit. This view is unsustainable, for the covenant being in writing registered, the relevant article is 116 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, which provides for a period of six years, and the suit was well within that period.

It was next contended that exhibit 5, being void ab initio, s. 65 of the Indian Contract Act had no application. Their Lordships are, however, satisfied that the grounds on which the appellate Court rested its opinion are sound, and there is enough justification for the view that the deed exhibit 5 is one which fell within the words "discovered to be void" in that section.

Their Lordships, therefore, think that there is no substance in the contentions raised on behalf of the appellant and his appeal must fail.

In the respondents' appeal, the main attack was directed against the findings on issues (4) (a), and (b) and the effect on exhibit 5 of the finding on issue (6). It was argued that in arriving at the findings on issue (4) the two Courts had misconceived the true nature of exhibits 3 and 5 and of the circumstances relating to them, that the transactions in reality were between Motilal and Yar Mohammad Khan and did not therefore fall within the principle governing transactions between parties one of whom stands to the other in a position of active confidence.

Their Lordships had the benefit of a careful and elaborate argument from the respondents' counsel, and, on a review of the circumstances, they are of opinion that the respondents are entitled to succeed in their contentions. There is no doubt that if the transactions were really between Motilal as the mortgagee and Yar Mohammad Khan as the mortgagor, there was no occasion for the application of the principle embodied in s. 111 of the Indian Evidence Act. As the two Courts have relied on this section, it is necessary to set out its terms, which are as follows :—

"Where there is a question as to the good faith of a transaction between parties, one of whom stands to the other in a position of active confidence, the burden of proving the good faith of the transaction is on the party who is in a position of active confidence."

Illustration (a) concerns the case of a sale by a client to his attorney. The principle of the rule embodied in this section, which was called "the great rule of the Court," was explained by Eldon L. C., in the case of Gibson v. Jeyes,<sup>1</sup> as follows (p. 278) :—

"...he, who bargains in a matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to shew, that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence; a rule applying to trustees, attorneys, or any one else."

It is therefore necessary to enquire who were the parties to the mortgages, exhibits 3 and 5, and whether one of them (the mortgagee) stood in the position of active confidence to the other (the mortgagor). The two Courts have proceeded on the assumption that Manoharlal was the mortgagee and as he was the mortgagor's vakil in the execution proceedings, he stood in a position of active confidence to the mortgagor and the transactions fell within the provisions of the section. If, on the other hand, Motilal was the mortgagee as the deeds state and the proceedings before the Deputy Commissioner make clear, the case would not fall within the rule embodied in the section, for it is not urged, nor is there any evidence, that Motilal ever stood in a

- P. C. position of active confidence to Yar Mohammad Khan. The two Courts 1940 appear to be in great confusion on this question. In many passages in their — judgment, to which their Lordships' attention was invited, they take the NISAR view that the money belonged to the joint family of which Manoharlal was AHMAD the karta. Some other passages, on the other hand, clearly indicate their view KHAN that the money was Manoharlal's own, advanced through his son as his
v. benamidar.
MOHAN
- MANUCHA These two are clearly distinct positions, and the two Courts appear to hover — between them. This is probably the result of a confusion caused by what MOHAN was supposed to be an admission in the pleadings that Manoharlal and his MANUCHA sons, including Motilal, formed a joint Hindu family. This may lead to a
v. presumption that the money advanced on the mortgage was joint family NISAR property, but, as Mayne points out in his Hindu Law (9th edition, pp. 374-AHMAD 376) this presumption is very slender and has to be taken along with the KHAN other facts proved or admitted. Besides, even in the case of a joint Hindu — family there is no presumption that it possesses joint property, or any property at all. This has to be shown by affirmative evidence. Such evidence Mr. Jayakar in this case proves that the money advanced on the two mortgages really — belonged to Motilal as his own property. In the documents (exhibit 3 and exhibit 5) Motilal was mentioned as the mortgagee, and in the proceedings before the Deputy Commissioner, whenever any reference was made to the mortgagee, Motilal's name was mentioned as the person advancing the money.
Manoharlal had long been dead before the suit, but Motilal was alive and was examined. His deposition is clear on the question. He carries on business on an extensive scale, pays an income-tax of Rs. 10,000 a year, and owns, as his property, rice and oil mills and an ice factory. In the very beginning of his cross-examination he referred to his account books (exhibits 26-30) which include the accounts of the mortgage transactions in issue, and stated that the accounts related to his personal transactions and not to those of anyone else, that the entries in the account books were correct and were in the hand of his mukhtiar, that his father (Manoharlal) had a general power-of-attorney from him, that his business was separate. He supported this by a reference to his account books (exhibits 26-30) in which the transactions in issue are mentioned and the interest paid from time to time is credited through the hands of the mortgagor's agents. The payments were made on dates when Yar Mohammad Khan was alive, and include those made by him during his lifetime and by the appellant after his death. It is to be noted that though Motilal stated his case with precision and emphasis, there was no cross-examination on the point.
- The whole of this evidence appears to have escaped the attention of the two Courts. It may be so because his evidence was taken in the trial Court before a different Subordinate Judge from the one who ultimately delivered the judgment. Their Lordships asked the appellant's counsel whether he could point out any passage in either of the judgments tending to show that the Judges had this evidence in mind and brushed it aside as untruthful.
Counsel could point to no such reference. Their Lordships have examined Motilal's evidence, and, in their opinion, it bears the impress of truth. If this is so, the whole of the superstructure which the two Courts have raised upon the supposition that the money belonged to Manoharlal or his joint family crumbles to the ground.

This would be enough to entitle the respondents to obtain a reversal of the findings of the two Courts on issues (4) (a) and (b). The respondents' counsel, however, rested his case on an alternative footing and urged that even on the assumption that Manoharlal, or his joint family, was the mortgagee, the evidence disclosed no ground justifying the condemnation by the two Courts of the transactions in exhibits 3 and 5 and of Manoharlal's connection with them. Their Lordships were accordingly invited to consider the detailed evidence connected with the transactions in exhibits 3 and 5. After carefully considering it, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that there is nothing either in the circumstances antecedent to these transactions or in those relating to their execution and thereafter, which shows that the mortgages were obtained by Manoharlal in bad faith, or that he took any unfair advantage of the mortgagor to secure onerous or unconscionable terms. Apart from the fact that this argument was presented as an alternative one, their Lordships felt it necessary to examine the whole evidence because at the date of the suit Manoharlal, an experienced and well-known pleader of Sultanpur, whose integrity was impugned, had long been dead, and therefore had no opportunity to defend himself.

On examining the circumstances relating to the inception of the two mortgages, it is clear that the mortgagor entered into them under circumstances of extreme stringency. The bank's decree was for a very large amount, the date finally fixed for its payment had long expired, and there was great danger of the property being sold in execution. Yar Mohammad Khan was anxious to retain control and management of his estate, because it was an ancestral holding and he desired to avoid the odium of having it either sold outright or leased out for long periods. In the applications made by his agent Sahib Rai and by himself before the Deputy Commissioner from time to time, there is enough indication of his desire to retain control and possession of his paternal estate. It is further to be noted that the idea of effectuating a mortgage of the property originated not with Manoharlal but with a revenue officer called the sale officer, who, in his report at an early date (June 11, 1918) and long before Manoharlal came on the scene, suggested a mortgage as a means of saving the property for Yar Mahommed Khan.

Another fact which has not received adequate consideration from the two Courts is that Manoharlal was appointed Yar Mohammad Khan's vakil on September 11, 1918, and that, on the same day, Yar Mohammad Khan's application to mortgage the property was granted. It is to be noted that on the latter occasion, Yar Mohammad Khan was represented by three vakils, of whom Manoharlal, engaged on that day, was only one, and Yar Mohammad Khan had besides the advice of his trusted agent Sahib Rai, who represented him on all material occasions. The application for permission to make a mortgage of the property was granted after a statement was made by Sahib Rai before the Deputy Commissioner, indicating the advantages of having a mortgage to the exclusion of other means of raising the money. The application was granted by the Deputy Commissioner after reviewing all the circumstances. It is suggested that this was the occasion when Manoharlal should have disclosed to the Deputy Commissioner his intention to take the mortgage in the name of his son, but there is no evidence to suggest that Manoharlal had formed any such intention at that date.

Subsequently, Yar Mohammad Khan and Sahib Rai, in a document which they both signed, applied to the Deputy Commissioner, stating that they had prepared a draft of the mortgage which was attached to the document and prayed that the draft might be passed and written permission granted for the mortgage of the property. The Deputy Commissioner thereupon reviewed the matter and accorded his sanction. He observed that the interest was undoubtedly severe but as the judgment debtor's pleader had told him that money was difficult to obtain, he gave his consent. There is no clear evidence that the pleader referred to was Manoharlal. As stated above, Yar Mohammad Khan had two other pleaders. Nor does it appear that the statement that money was difficult to obtain was a misrepresentation.

As regards the circumstances relating to the execution of exhibit 3, its recitals are material as showing the circumstances under which the mortgage was made. These recitals were substantially correct. The document was presented for registration at the office of the Sub-Registrar by Yar Mohammad Khan personally, who made, in the presence of the Sub-Registrar, his autograph signature and also put his thumb mark. He admitted the completion of the deed after hearing and understanding the contents thereof in the presence of the Sub-Registrar, who personally knew him. A week later when the matter came before the Deputy Commissioner, Manoharlal appeared on behalf of his son Motilal. On this occasion Sahib Rai, Nanhe Mian the son of Yar Mohammad, the agent of Saifuran Bibi, and the bank's vakil, were also present. The mortgage deed was admitted. The amount of the mortgage money was stated to be in deposit in the Treasury, and the mortgage deed was returned to Manoharlal as the agent of his son. Permission was given to the bank's vakil to apply for a withdrawal of the amount. The matter came again a few days later before the Deputy Commissioner. Manoharlal again appeared on behalf of his son, Sahib Rai on behalf of Yar Mohammad Khan, and the bank was represented by its vakil. On all subsequent occasions, Manoharlal continued to appear for his son. It was suggested that in so appearing Manoharlal was guilty of misbehaviour. It is difficult to see the basis of this criticism or how far it affects the merits of the case. These appearances were all open and do not appear to have been disapproved by the Deputy Commissioner, or by Yar Mohammad Khan or his agent Sahib Rai, to all of whom the true facts must have been well known. Different theories might be suggested with regard to these appearances. It may be that as there were already two other vakils representing Yar Mohammad Khan and also a trusted agent Sahib Rai, the parties might have thought it desirable that Manoharlal should no longer represent the mortgagor. Manoharlal is dead and his explanation is not known. Their Lordships have not enough evidence before them to suggest that in acting as he did Manoharlal was guilty of any misbehaviour throwing light upon the merits of the transaction. It may be that, as the respondents' counsel has urged, Manoharlal's open appearance exclusively for Motilal after a certain stage of the proceedings indicates his honesty.

The subsequent story of the sale of the two villages has already been mentioned, and how the four villages were saved to the mortgagor by Motilal's advance of the Rs. 70,000 on exhibit 5. This mortgage also was made and registered under circumstances indicating that it had Yar Mohammad Khan's and Sahib Rai's consent. The subsequent conduct of the parties also points to the same conclusion. Interest was paid by Yar Mohammad Khan from time to time during his lifetime, and also a part of the principal amount. After his death, the appellant did the same, until default was made and the suit brought on April 30, 1930.

It is suggested that there are at least two circumstances showing that unfair advantage was taken by Manoharlal of the mortgagor's position. The first of these, it is said, is clause 3 in exhibit 3 (which is repeated in exhibit 5) by which Yar Mohammad Khan agreed that, in addition to the interest, he should pay annually Rs. 10,000 in the month of June and a like sum in the month of December, with a view to the liquidation of the debt, and that he should have no power to pay anything more and Motilal also should have no power to realise anything in excess of the amount. It is said that this clause was a fetter on the equity of redemption. Their Lordships do not take this view. It is a provision which often occurs in mortgage deeds, and in the light of the fact that Yar Mohammad Khan was an old defaulter, and also that the obligation mentioned in the clause was reciprocal, their Lordships cannot regard it as in any way onerous. The clause, besides, is immaterial for the purposes of the present dispute. The mortgagee is not seeking to enforce it, and would lose nothing if it were expunged. There is no reference to this question in the judgments of the two Courts except in one place where the trial Court suggests that this clause could not have been the result of the mortgagor's free will. There is no evidence in support of this suggestion. On the contrary, the clause was approved by the Court and by Yar Mohammad Khan and his trusted agent, and the loan was accepted on that basis.

The other onerous clause suggested is the rate of compound interest of eight per cent. with half-yearly rests. On this issue there is a clear finding of both the Courts that even eleven per cent., charged on another mortgage executed shortly after exhibit 5, was not unreasonable. The eight per cent. was only one per cent. more than what the bank had charged, and exhibits 3 and 5 were besides subsequent mortgages to the bank's, made by an old defaulter.

There is likewise no evidence in support of the suggestion which found favour with the two Courts that a lease would have been more beneficial than a mortgage. A lease would certainly have been contrary to the cherished wishes of Yar Mohammad Khan to remain in possession of the property as long as he could. Amongst several proposals for leasing, there were a few for such long periods as fifteen years, and one in perpetuity. These would certainly not have suited Yar Mohammad Khan's intentions, and Manoharlal's objection to one of these proposals may be due to Yar Mohammad Khan's desire to retain possession of the property, and cannot indicate any dishonest motive on Manoharlal's part.

On a review of all these circumstances, their Lordships are of opinion that exhibits 3 and 5 were both straightforward and honest transactions and there was no justification for the aspersions cast upon Manoharlal's conduct.

Before leaving this subject, their Lordships would desire to add that transactions of mortgage between a solicitor and client to secure the repayment of money advanced at the time are not ordinarily subjected by the Courts to the same jealous scrutiny as, for instance, a gift from a client to a solicitor, or purchases or sales at under-value between a solicitor and client. If the money was sorely needed and was paid, the mortgagor had its benefit, the rate of interest was reasonable, and the terms neither excessive nor onerous, their Lordships can see no reason why the transaction should not stand as a valid mortgage between the parties. The rulings relied on in the Chief Court's judgment relate to sales to or by solicitors, which, on the facts, were detrimental to the client's interest.

As to the effect of the finding on issue (6) on the validity of exhibit 5, it is admitted that the permission of the Deputy Commissioner was not obtained to this mortgage. There is no doubt that, as stated above, the transaction was beneficial to the mortgagor, but this will not affect its invalidity, under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. It is urged in support of its validity that this mortgage was an extra-judicial proceeding and no sanction was necessary. Their Lordships cannot accept this view, having regard to the clear terms of paragraph 11. The transaction was a mortgage and therefore covered by the plain terms of the paragraph. It was next urged that the bank's claim had been completely paid off under the circumstances mentioned above and consequently the interest which the mortgagor had was only his equity of redemption, which was not subject to the bank's mortgage and was therefore outside the execution proceedings and the Deputy Commissioner's power under paragraph 11. The only evidence in support of this contention is Motilal's letter to the bank, dated October 1, 1918, in which he offered to pay the bank's debt if the bank would unconditionally release from its lien the twenty villages. It is not clear, however, from the terms of his letter whether the bank was not asked only to release its claim to rank in priority to Motilal's debt. Motilal had made another proposal to purchase the decretal debt of the bank, but there is nothing to show that this proposal was accepted. The execution proceedings continued until May 31, 1920, and up to this date the Deputy Commissioner could exercise his powers under paragraph 11. There is therefore no escape from the conclusion that under the peremptory provisions of this paragraph this mortgage must be held to be null and void.

It will, however, stand in respect of the personal liability for the money actually paid, with proper interest thereon. If the loan was bona fide and was actually received and the terms were not unreasonable, the mortgagee is entitled to receive payment of whatever may be due on the mortgage, with interest thereon at a reasonable rate. In the circumstances found by both the Courts, eight per cent. compound interest with half yearly rests was not unreasonable.

The result is that the respondents are entitled to an order for repayment of the money which may be due under exhibit 3, with compound interest thereon at eight per cent. per annum with six-monthly rests, from the date of the document up to payment, and to an order for the sale of the mortgaged property in default of payment of whatever may be found due on the taking of accounts.

As regards exhibit 5, they are entitled to a decree for repayment of the amount lent under that mortgage, with compound interest thereon at eight per cent. with six-monthly rests, from the date of the document up to payment. All payments made by the appellant and his father under the respective mortgages will be set off on the dates they were made. The matter will accordingly be referred to the Chief Court, Oudh, for drawing up a proper decree under the directions contained in this judgment.

The respondents' appeal here is allowed and the decree of the Chief Court varied as stated above. The appellant's appeal here is dismissed. The appellant will pay the respondents' costs in the two Courts and in both the appeals before this Board.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Where on a preliminary objection taken at the hearing of an appeal, the Court orders payment of additional court-fees on the memorandum of appeal, and the appeal is rejected for non-payment of such fees, the respondent is entitled to payment of his costs of the hearing of the preliminary objection. Such costs should be taxed at Rs. 30 under r. 130 of the Bombay High Court, Appellate Side, Rules.

Where a memorandum of appeal is rejected for non-payment of court-fees, the cross-objections filed in the appeal fail with the appeal.

COURT-FEES.

The plaintiff Kashinath filed a suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Jalgaon against the defendant Ranglal for taking accounts of dealings between the parties under the provisions of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879. The claim in the suit was valued at Rs. 5 for all purposes. The suit resulted in a decree for Rs. 6,464-7-0 against the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court and valued his claim in appeal again at Rs. 5 for purposes of court-fees and pleader's fees.

At the hearing, the respondent's pleader raised a preliminary objection that the claim in appeal should have been valued at Rs. 6,464-7-0 for purposes of court-fees.

M. W. Pradhan, for the appellant.

G. S. Gupte, for the respondent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal against an order made by the First Class Subordinate Judge of Jalgaon, and a preliminary point is taken that the memorandum of appeal has not a proper court-fee.

The plaintiff's suit was a suit for account, and the plaint was stamped with Rs. 5. The suit resulted in a decree against the plaintiff for a sum of Rs. 6,464-7-0. The appeal is against that decree, and the appellant has valued his appeal at Rs. 5.

Mr. Pradhan for the appellant relies on s. 7 (iv) (f) of the Court-fees Act which provides that in a suit for accounts the stamp is to be according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint or memorandum of appeal. No doubt in the plaint the plaintiff was entitled to place his own value on the relief claimed, because he could not know what the result of taking an account was likely to be. If the plaintiff's suit had failed and he had appealed against the refusal to take an account, the appeal would have related solely to a right to an account, and I agree that the appellant might have placed his own value on the memorandum of appeal. But as the suit resulted in a decree for a certain amount against the plaintiff, it seems to me that the appeal is not merely in relation to an account, but is really an appeal against a money decree, and he must at any rate stamp his memorandum of appeal with an ad valorem stamp in respect of the amount of the decree. He may add a nominal amount in respect of any further relief claimed which may accrue by reason of the account being taken on a different basis from that adopted by the lower Court; but the stamp on the memorandum of appeal must, to my mind, cover the amount of the decree which is standing against the appellant, and which he seeks to have set aside. That was the view adopted by Rankin C. J. in Kantichandra Tarafdar v. Radharaman Sarkar,<sup>1</sup> and in a recent decision of a full bench of the Madras High Court in Dhanukodi, In re,<sup>2</sup> and in my opinion that view is clearly right. Mr. Pradhan has relied on a decision of the Privy Council in Faizullah Khan v. Mauladad Khan,<sup>3</sup> but there is nothing in that decision to suggest that an appellant in a suit originally instituted for an account seeking to set aside a final decree for a specific sum found to be due from him, is not bound to value his appeal at the amount of that decree at the least.

2 [1931] A. I. R. Mad. 133.

In my opinion, the preliminary objection must succeed. The appellant will get three weeks' time to pay the amount.

SEN J. I agree.

No doubt under s. 7, sub-s. (iv), cl. (f), of the Court-fees Act, the court-fee payable in a suit for accounts is to be computed according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint or in the memorandum of appeal. But the present appeal is from a final decree in which the plaintiff has been ordered to pay a sum of Rs. 6,464-7-0 to the defendants, and the question arises whether in such a case, when the plaintiff-appellant seeks to set aside the decree against him for a specific sum, it is open to him to value his appeal at a notional amount.

In Kantichandra Tarafdar v. Radharaman Sarkar<sup>4</sup> there was a final decree against the defendants for Rs. 6,000 and odd, and the plaintiff had originally valued his claim for accounts at Rs. 1,000. The defendants appealed against the final decree and paid a court-fee of Rs. 2. It was held that in a suit for accounts a defendant appealing against the final decree must value his appeal according to that decree, though the claim in the suit and the preliminary decree might have been for a lower sum. About the time this decision was given the Privy Council in Faizullah Khan v. Mauladad Khan<sup>5</sup> decided a case which was a suit for partnership accounts and in which the plaintiffs had claimed Rs. 3,000 and valued the suit accordingly. The trial Court found that Rs. 19,000 and odd were due to the defendants by the plaintiffs and no sum was found due to the plaintiffs under their claim for Rs. 3,000. The plaintiffs appealed, valuing the appeal for purposes of court-fees at Rs. 19,000 and odd. A question was raised whether the plaintiffs should not value their appeal at Rs. 19,000 plus Rs. 3,000, i.e. Rs. 22,000, and their Lordships held that the amount of Rs. 19,000 "may be not only in full but largely in excess of the true sum of relief at which a sound valuation could in the present circumstances be said to reach and it covered the appeal as a whole", and therefore they held that the court-fee already paid was the proper court-fee. This decision was construed by the Madras High Court in Venkatanandam, In re,<sup>6</sup> as meaning that even where the appellant had been fixed with a liability for a specific sum, he was entitled under s. 7 (iv) (f) of the

"If the appellate Court after the hearing and consideration of the appeal comes to a conclusion in favour of the appellant in respect of a far larger amount than what he has paid court-fees for, the proper thing would be to post the case for orders and direct the appellant to pay additional court-fee and only then the judgment should be delivered and the decree should be allowed to be drawn up."

This interpretation of the Privy Council's decision was overruled by the same High Court in a full bench decision in Dhanukodi, In re,<sup>1</sup> and their Lordships held that though a defendant appealing from a preliminary decree in a suit for accounts was ordinarily bound to accept the valuation given by the plaintiff in the plaint, when a defendant appealed against a final decree, he should pay the court-fee on the amount of the decree passed against him except in cases where he appealed only against a portion of the decree; and they remarked (p. 607) :—

"Until the decision in Venkatanandam, In re,<sup>2</sup> it was never questioned in the High Courts of India that a defendant appealing against a final decree should pay a court-fee on the amount of the decree passed against him—except in cases where he appealed only against a portion of the decree—and we are unable to concur in the opinion that Faizullah Khan's case [L. R. 56 I. A. 232; 31 Bom. L. R. 841] has put a different construction on the section."

The learned advocate for the appellant has contended that the decision of the Privy Council in Faizullah Khan v. Mauladad Khan enables his client to value the appeal at any figure that he likes. But it seems to me that the decisions in Kantichandra's case and Dhanukodi's case should govern this point and that the Privy Council's decision does not really cover the facts of this case. It is true that both these cases were cases of defendants' appeals, but I do not think that should make any difference in the principle, as in the present case it is the plaintiff who has been fixed with a liability for a specific sum, and in his appeal not only wants to question the accounts as taken by the trial Court but also to get rid of the liability for the sum of Rs. 6,464-7-0, and in such a case it would be inconsistent for him to value his appeal at Rs. 5. The first ground stated in his memorandum of appeal is that the lower Court erred in finding the decreed sum to be due from the plaintiff to the defendant, and under s. 7 (iv) of the Act he is required to put a definite valuation to the relief that he claims. It cannot, therefore, be held that he is entitled to value the relief that he claims at only Rs. 5. I think that the principles enunciated by the Calcutta and Madras High Courts ought to be followed in this case and that the appellant must pay court-fee for the sum of Rs. 6,464-7-0 in this appeal.

THE appellant failed to pay the additional court-fees within three weeks' time which was given to him.

On January 10, 1941, the appeal was placed before Beaumont C. J. and Sen J. for disposal.

W. B. Pradhan, and M. W. Pradhan, for the appellant.

G. S. Gupta, for the respondent.

1 [1938] Mad. 598, F.B.

2 (1932) I. L. R. 56 Mad. 708.

BEAUMONT C. J. In this appeal a preliminary objection was taken that the memorandum of appeal was insufficiently stamped, and the Court upheld that objection, and, acting under the power conferred by s. 149 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, gave the appellant three weeks' time in which to pay the proper amount of court-fee. He has not done so, and the appeal comes before us today for disposal.

The correct court-fee not having been paid, it is quite clear that under s. 4 of the Court-fees Act, and also under O. VII, r. 11 read with s. 107 of the Civil Procedure Code, we are bound to order that the memorandum of appeal be rejected.

The first question which arises is whether we can, in making that order, direct the appellant to pay the costs of the hearing of the preliminary objection. Logically it seems to me rather difficult to reject an appeal, and then proceed to make an order for costs in the appeal; but at the same time orders for costs are frequently made in these cases. The position is that the appellant managed to get his memorandum of appeal accepted by the office, which considered that it was properly stamped. The matter was brought before this Court; the question as to the amount of court-fee was argued by counsel on both sides, and in the result the appellant got a concession, in that he was allowed extended time in which to pay the court-fee. It certainly seems unreasonable that he should not be ordered to pay the costs of the hearing of the preliminary objection on which he failed, and, in my opinion, having brought the appeal before this Court and obtained an order of this Court in the appeal, the appellant can be ordered to pay the costs of the hearing of the preliminary objection, notwithstanding that the memorandum of appeal is ultimately rejected.

The question then arises as to the basis on which the costs should be taxed, the appellant not having stamped his memorandum of appeal with the correct court-fee. Rule 130 of the Appellate Side Rules provides that when the Court awards costs in any matter without specifying the amount or the scale thereof and the amount thereof is not prescribed under any Act or rule, a sum of Rs. 30 shall be allowed as the advocate's fee. We think that that rule should be applied in this case. We, therefore, direct the appellant to pay Rs. 30 the advocate's fee of the respondents in the appeal.

The next question which arises is with regard to cross-objections. In my opinion, it is quite clear that if an appeal is rejected for non-payment of court-fee, cross-objections must fail with the appeal. Cross-objections, under O. XLI, r. 22, are a method by which the respondent may himself complain against the decree appealed from, but the right to lodge cross-objections is only given to a respondent on an appeal, and if the appeal is rejected, there can be no respondent and no cross-objections. Sub-rule (4) of r. 22 provides that when an appeal is withdrawn or dismissed for default, cross-objections may be proceeded with; but where an appeal is rejected, it cannot, in my opinion, be said to be withdrawn or dismissed for default. The cases on the subject were discussed by the Rangoon High Court in U Shin v. Moung Tha Gywe,<sup>1</sup> and the learned Judges there came to the conclusion that where the memo-

We, therefore, reject the appeal but direct the appellant to pay Rs. 30 respondent's costs, and make no order on the cross-objections.

An application under O. XXI, r. 95, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, made by an auction-purchaser to get possession of the property of the judgment-debtor, was rejected by the trial Court on the ground that it was barred by limitation. Held, that the finding of the lower Court on a question of limitation, whether right or wrong, was a finding on a point of law which the Court had jurisdiction to decide and therefore it did not come within the ambit of s. 115.

BROOMFIELD J. This purports to be an application in revision under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, and as in our opinion it does not come within the terms of that section, we propose to reject it as incompetent without going into the merits of the matter.

The applicant made an application under O. XXI, r. 95, that is to say he applied as auction-purchaser to get possession of the property of the judgment-debtor, and his application was rejected by the Court on the ground that it was barred by limitation. The only point which can be urged in this revision application is the point of limitation, and in our view a finding on a question of limitation, whether right or wrong, is generally speaking a finding on a point of law which does not bring the case within the ambit of s. 115, because it cannot be said that the Court has exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it, or to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. The point was one which the Court had jurisdiction to decide, and whether the decision was right or wrong, the decision is final, unless it is subject to appeal, and in this case there is no appeal.

Learned advocate for the applicant drew our attention to The British India Steam Navigation Company v. Sharafally,<sup>1</sup> in which it was held that where a lower Court declines to exercise jurisdiction by refusing to entertain an appeal on account of a wrong decision on a question of limitation as to when the appeal should have been filed, the High Court has power to revise the order under s. 115. But that case has been dissented from by the learned Chief Justice in Veerappa v. Iratappa.<sup>2</sup> He there pointed out that although a Judge who dismisses an application by disregarding the plain words of a provision of the Indian Limitation Act may be said to exercise his jurisdiction illegally and with material irregularity so that the High Court can interfere under s. 115, the position is different where the Court has considered a question of limitation and disposes of the case in accordance with its interpretation of the law. Where a Court dismisses a suit on the ground of limitation, it takes cognizance of the suit and exercises jurisdiction by holding that the suit fails on a point of law. In such a case s. 115 cannot apply.

This view is in accordance with previous decisions of this High Court. The learned Chief Justice referred to Amritrav Krishna Deshpande v. Balakrishna Ganesh Amrapurkar.<sup>3</sup> The Court was actually concerned there with a wrong decision, or a decision which was alleged to be wrong, on a question of res judicata. It was held that the decision, even though wrong, of a question of res judicata was not a failure to exercise jurisdiction, and did not warrant the interference of the High Court under the section of the Code which corresponded to the present s. 115. *Hari Bhikaji v. nath<sup>1</sup> was followed. Mr. Justice West in his judgment in Amritav v. Bakkrishna said that the same considerations would apply in the case of a decision on a point of limitation. The same view has been taken by other High Courts. We are not therefore prepared to follow the ruling of the Madras High Court which Mr. Thakor has cited.

I may mention with reference to Verrappa v. Iratappa that what happened here was this. The point was when the auction-sale became absolute within the meaning of art. 180 of the Indian Limitation Act. The learned Subordinate Judge held on the construction of the article and on a consideration of the authorities cited to him that the sale became absolute on a particular date, and that the applicant was not entitled to exclude the time taken up in a certain suit in the computation of the period of limitation. Obviously then this was not a case of a Judge ignoring the plain words of a provision of the Indian Limitation Act. The case is covered by the ruling of the learned Chief Justice and the earlier authorities to which I have referred, and we hold that s. 115 does not apply.

Mr. Thakor suggested that we might interfere even apart from the provisions of s. 115, and relied on Bombay Steam Navigation Co. v. Vasudev.<sup>2</sup> The view was expressed in that case that the High Court of Bombay has, apart from s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, the power to call for the proceedings of any subordinate civil Court and to issue orders thereon, under Bombay Regulation II of 1827, s. 5, cl. (2), in spite of its repeal by Act XII of 1873, by virtue of ss. 106 and 130 of the Government of India Act, 1915. As the Government of India Act of 1915 is no longer in force, and as under the present Government of India Act the High Court's power of superintendence does not extend to interference with judicial orders, it may be doubted whether the proposition laid down in this case is still sound. But whether it is or not, we can see no reason why we should go out of our way to interfere in revision in the present case, and we discharge the rule with costs.

Rule discharged.

December 12.

Hindu law—Adoption—Power to adopt—Construction of will—Prohibition to adopt.

The testator, who was joint with his brother, made, shortly before his death, a will, addressed to his brother, in which he said : "You are the only heir of the property . . . After their death [i.e. death of the testator's two widows] they [i.e. ornaments] are yours only. Excepting maintenance, they have no other right whatsoever . . . In order that my name should remain after my death, Rs. 100 per annum should be spent on religious acts &c. You should do this, and you and your descendants, heirs and legatees should enjoy the ownership of the entire estate from generation to generation. On the strength of this will, you should get the khata transferred to your name in respect of the above lands. In regard to that my wives and anybody else whatever have no sort of right at all. Consequently, all the rights go to you only and are with you." Shortly after the testator's death, one of his widows adopted a son. After the death of that son, she adopted the plaintiff, who was a son-in-law of the surviving brother. Thereafter the surviving brother gifted away portions of the family property to his two daughters. After the death of the brother, the plaintiff sued to recover possession of the properties, when it was contended by the daughters that the will contained an implied prohibition to the widows to adopt and the plaintiff's adoption was therefore invalid :—

Held, (1) that inasmuch as the testator had said nothing about an adoption one way or the other and the prohibition of adoption was sought to be inferred from statements about other matters or from conduct, it stood to reason that the inference suggested, if it was to be acted upon, should be a necessary inference ;

(2) that the Court should be able to say with confidence that what the testator had said or done showed that he would have prohibited an adoption, either in any circumstances or in the circumstances existing at the material time, if he could have foreseen them ;

(3) that if the Court could say no more than that he might have, or even that he probably would have, prohibited adoption in any circumstances or in those particular circumstances, it could not be said that his statements or his actions were equivalent to a prohibition ;

(4) that in his will the testator was obviously anxious that the family should continue to be regarded as what it was in fact, a joint family, and that the fact that some lands were in his separate name should not give rise to any claim of separate ownership ;

(5) that though he emphasised the rights of his brother as the sole surviving coparcener, it did not follow from that that he was opposed to one of the ordinary incidents of a joint family or that he would have objected to an adoption by his widow if his brother himself did not object ;

(6) that the plaintiff having been at the date of adoption the brother's

SUIT to recover possession of property.

The property in dispute belonged originally to one Viragouda, to whom the parties were related as shown in the following genealogical tree :—

Viragouda had two sons, Balagouda and Basagouda, who were undivided. Basagouda died in 1907. A few days before his death Basagouda made his will, on August 29, 1907, addressed to his undivided brother Balagouda, by which he left his share in the family property to Balagouda, subject to maintenance of his widows Krishnabai and Parvatibai. The material portions of the will are set out in the judgment of Broomfield J. Within four months of her husband's death, Krishnabai adopted Iragouda ; but the boy died unmarried in 1911. Then, on April 29, 1931, Krishnabai adopted another son Ramagouda (plaintiff), who was a grandson of Basagouda's sister Gangubai and a son-in-law of Balagouda.

On July 9, 1934, Balagouda made gifts of portions of the family property to his two daughters, Krishnabai and Sonubai (defendants Nos. 1 and 2). Balagouda died on August 8, 1936.

On September 3, 1936, the plaintiff filed a suit to recover possession of the properties gifted by Balagouda to his two daughters (defendants).

The defendants contended inter alia that the adoption of plaintiff was invalid, because the will of Basagouda contained an implied prohibition forbidding his widows to adopt.

The trial Judge decreed the suit holding that the plaintiff's adoption was valid inasmuch as the will contained no prohibition to adopt, for the following reasons :—

"The terms of the will go to show that Basagouda was very anxious that the family property should all go to Balagouda and that he and his descendants should go on enjoying for ever from generation to generation and that his wives had no other right except to receive maintenance. It is submitted that the recitals by implication go to show that the wives were prohibited from making an adoption. In support of this view, I am referred to the decisions in 14 Bom. L. R. 1121 and 1928, A. I. R. Mad. 118. It must be noted that the testator in this case also was the sole and full owner while it must be borne in mind Basagouda and his elder brother Balagouda were members of a joint Hindu family. The will in the present case is not valid under Hindu law as it has been made by a coparcener... are the recitals such as to warrant and justify a conclusion that there was prohibition of adoption? Answer to this question depends on the consideration of one or two circumstances which are of the utmost importance in construing and interpreting this will. The circumstances that the rule of law as understood then was that a widow in a joint Hindu family could not adopt and that some lands stood in the name of Basagouda alone, even though the family was joint, cannot be overlooked, and they would be helpful in knowing what Basagouda and Balagouda might have been thinking then. One can understand very well the anxiety and concern of Basagouda in seeing that the lands that stood in his name should go to Balagouda as joint family property and that his widows should have no other right except to receive maintenance. It must be remembered that Basagouda was attacked with a deadly disease of plague and that he was apprehending that fast approaching awful thing 'death', being almost at its door as his illness lasted only four or five days. Can it be conceived, in these circumstances, and is it reasonable to suppose that a man suffering from high fever of plague should have such mental frame of mind and peace as to probe into the intricacies of law not in force but to come as yet and make certain arrangement by way of prohibition as contended? How could he have forethought, imagined and dreamt of any trouble on the score of adoption by his wives and that too when he knew his wives could not make any adoption, after his death? The very prevailing ideas regarding the rule of law as understood then (and referred to above) precludes an assumption even that Basagouda had in his mind any intention to direct his wives not to adopt. The idea of adoption was thus far remote and foreign too, and I do not think it should have occurred to Basagouda while he was seriously ill. To hold otherwise is in my judgment to disregard and discard the realities and plunge into an imaginative world of unrealities. The construction of the will must, therefore, be made only in the light of and with reference to the two circumstances pointed out by me. If that is done, the natural inference would be that both Balagouda and Basagouda wanted to avoid trouble by Krishnabai and Parvati regarding the lands that stood in Basagouda's name and that therefore the will came into being. This seems to me to be the natural reading, construction and interpretation of the will. If that is so, it has to be held that there was no prohibition of adoption by the wives under the terms of the will by implication and that the plaintiff's adoption is perfectly valid and good. In this connection the ruling in 34 Bom. L. R. 818 may be referred to with advantage and benefit. The testator's desire in the will, if no son was born to him, was 'I have formed the resolve of giving all my moveable and immoveable property for charity after my death. For this reason, I am not going to adopt a son and I have neither given nor am I going to give authority to make an adoption either to my wife or to anybody else. If anybody should take a son in adoption and say there was my permission for it, it should be regarded as untrue and the disposition of all my property should be made in the way I describe below.' It was held that there was no express prohibition against adoption in the will and that the will only prohibited adoption during the testator's lifetime. When such clear and unambiguous terms have been considered to be not sufficient to justify a prohibition of adoption, by implication, it would indeed be going out of the way to make an inference of prohibition by implication under the terms of the present will. The case quoted therefore fortifies and strengthens the view I have taken."

Defendants appealed to the High Court.

KRISHNAWA
YELAGOUDA
 v. BROOMFIELD J. This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit brought by the respondent to recover possession of certain land.

RAMAGOUDA
KADAGOUDA
 — The land at one time belonged to two undivided brothers, Balagouda and Basagouda, who formed a joint Hindu family. Basagouda died in the year 1907 and soon after his death Krishnabai, one of his two widows, adopted a boy named Iragouda who died in or about the year 1911. The plaintiff claims to have been adopted by Krishnabai on April 29, 1931, and he claims also that by that adoption he became a coparcener with Balagouda and on the death of Balagouda, which took place in August, 1936, he became the sole surviving coparcener. In this suit he seeks to set aside two gifts which were made by Balagouda in July, 1934. These gifts were in favour of two daughters of Balagouda, who are the defendants in the suit. He also made gifts to his other two daughters, one of whom is the wife of the plaintiff, but we are not concerned in this suit with those transactions. It is common ground that if the adoption of plaintiff is proved and valid, the gifts are invalid and plaintiff is entitled to recover the property gifted.

The defendants denied the adoption. They also alleged that it was invalid on the ground that Krishnabai was the junior widow of Basagouda and could not adopt without the consent of the senior widow Parvatibai. It was further contended that Basagouda had prohibited his widows from adopting anybody in a will which he made shortly before his death.

The trial Court found that the adoption of plaintiff is proved and valid as Krishnabai was Basagouda's senior widow and as there was no prohibition of the adoption. The suit was therefore decreed.

In this appeal the factum of the adoption has not been challenged. The points urged on behalf of the appellants are (1) that Krishnabai was the junior widow and Parvatibai the senior widow did not consent to the adoption, (2) that the adoption was impliedly prohibited by Basagouda's will, (3) that the plaintiff is bound by an award decree in certain litigation between Balagouda and Krishnabai in 1908 by which Balagouda was declared to be the owner of the estate after the death of Krishnabai.

On the first question whether Krishnabai was Basagouda's senior widow the evidence is conflicting and not very satisfactory, but we see no reason to differ from the decision of the trial Court. The most important piece of evidence on which the learned trial Judge has, quite rightly, strongly relied is a statement made by Giriappa, the father of Parvati, in the year 1908. In that year Krishnabai made an application to obtain a succession certificate on behalf of her adopted son Iragouda and Giriappa was examined in those proceedings. He said :

"My daughter's name is Parvati. She is the second wife of Basagouda. She is about twenty or twenty-two years old. The name of the first wife of Basagouda is Krishna. She is four or five years younger than my daughter. She has taken in adoption the son of Sardar Ramgouda."

It has been argued on behalf of the appellants, as it was in the trial Court, that there may have been ill-feeling between Giriappa and Balagouda, and the reason suggested is that in the year 1904 a man named Yelagouda brought a suit against Giriappa for partition and in that suit Balagouda gave evidence in favour of the plaintiff. It seems to us, however, to be unreasonable and far-fetched to suppose that for this reason Giriappa made a false statement in 1908 when he said that his daughter Parvati was the junior wife of Basagouda. The statement was or might have been detrimental to his daughter and cannot be explained; we think, by the suggestion of spite against Balagouda.

Broomfield J.

In this same year 1908 there were disputes between Balagouda and the two widows of Basagouda about the amount of their maintenance. Basagouda in his will had fixed the amount of their maintenance at Rs. 50 a year and they were not unnaturally dissatisfied with this. The dispute was referred to arbitration and there were two award decrees, one between Balagouda and Krishnabai and the other between Balagouda and Parvatibai. It was provided that Krishnabai's maintenance was to be Rs. 300 a year and Parvati's Rs. 200 and some land was handed over to Krishnabai out of the income of which she was to pay both her own maintenance and that of Parvati. The award decree also provided that on the death of Krishnabai the land was to go back to Balagouda who was declared to be the owner of the whole estate. The fact that Krishnabai's maintenance was fixed at Rs. 300 and that she was given the land out of which maintenance of both widows was to be paid rather points to the conclusion that she was the senior widow, although no great stress perhaps can be laid upon it.

In the year 1916 Balagouda applied to the Mamlatdar in connection with some change which he wanted made in the khata in the revenue books. He made a statement, exhibit 126, in which he said referring to his deceased brother Basagouda: "He has only two wives. They are Krishnabai his wife by marriage and Parvatibai his wife by pat. Parvati is the senior and Krishnabai is the junior wife." The question of the seniority of Basagouda's two widows would hardly seem to have been material for the purposes of Balagouda's application. Nevertheless no doubt this statement made in 1916 is important, but we agree with the learned trial Judge that it is not entitled to as much weight as the statement of Parvati's father in 1908.

In the year 1925 there was litigation between Parvatibai and Krishnabai and in that suit the question which was the senior widow fell to be decided. The decision was that Krishnabai was the senior. This again cannot be described as a very cogent piece of evidence as against the defendant, although it is a relevant fact.

The oral evidence given in this suit is conflicting. There are several witnesses on both sides who say that they were present at both marriages. Plaintiff's witnesses say that Krishnabai's marriage took place first and was followed not long after by Parvati's. Defendants' witnesses say that Parvati's marriage was the first and Krishnabai's took place two or three years later. The best of the defendants' witnesses and in some respects the best of all the witnesses on this question of the marriages is Ramagouda, who is the watandar patil of the village where the parties reside. But his evidence can hardly be regarded as disinterested because his own son is married to Balagouda's daughter and he might be inclined therefore to take Balagouda's side in this dispute. His daughter-in-law is one of the persons to whom Balagouda has made a gift of property. We rely particularly on the statement of Giriappa and we think that the balance of evidence is in favour of the view taken by the trial Court viz., that Krishnabai was the senior widow. Even if Krishnabai was the junior widow, the adoption of the plaintiff would be valid if Parvati consented. An issue was raised on that point in the trial Court, but the trial Judge did not think it necessary to decide it in view of his finding that Krishnabai was the senior. If necessary we should be prepared to hold on the evidence that Parvati did consent. Both the plaintiff and Krishnabai have deposed that she did and their statements derive strong support from the fact, which is admitted even by the defendants' witness Ramagouda, that Parvati was present at the adoption ceremony. It is quite true, as pointed out in Bhimappa v. Basawa,<sup>1</sup> that a person's presence at an adoption ceremony is not necessarily equivalent to consent to it. But we have on record a group photograph of the ceremony which shows that Parvati took a prominent part. She is shown right in the front and the plaintiff, the adopted son, is between Krishnabai on one side and Parvati on the other. We think it would be unreasonable to hold under the circumstances that Parvati merely acquiesced.

The most important and difficult point in the case is whether the adoption of the plaintiff has been impliedly prohibited by Basagouda. That depends on the construction of Basagouda's will. The plaintiff has not admitted that the will is genuine. But the trial Court found that it was, and we feel no doubt upon that point. At one time the will was admitted by Krishnabai and it is proved by the evidence of Ramagouda, who is one of the two attesting witnesses, the other being dead. The will is as follows :—

"To, Tirtharupa Rajamanya Rajeshri Balagouda Viragouda Herewade of Sulkud, Petha Alte, Kolhapur State.

Deed of arrangement to operate after death and will passed by me, Basagouda Viragouda Herewade of same village is as under :—

I have no male issue. You are my elder brother and we are undivided. I am now attacked by plague and I fear that I may not survive the illness. Therefore, there are lands, etc. standing against my khata. The arrangement about that to operate after my death is as follows :—Rayatawa lands, houses, wadas, etc. standing in my name at Sulkud, Kolhapur State.

The lands, houses and two wadas are there. The boundaries of the entire property are set out in two decrees of Shirol Court. Accordingly all the estate, pots, clothes, cattle also the entire property are joint. You are the only heir of the property and the said property is in your possession. I have two wives and they live with you in one family. If they do not live with you, Rs. 50 should be given to them each for their maintenance. Ornaments worth Rs. 1,000 are on the person of each of them. Let them remain on their persons during their lifetime. After their death, they are yours only. Excepting maintenance, they have no other right whatsoever. I have a daughter's daughter. She should be brought up, and when grown up, she should be married into a family of good income. About Rs. 500 should be given as dowry for the marriage. In order that my name should remain after my death, Rs. 100 per annum should be spent on religious acts, Jangams, Naivedya, etc. You should do this, and you and your descendants, heirs and legatees should enjoy the ownership of the entire estate from generation to generation. On the strength of this will, you should get the khata transferred to your name in respect of the above lands. In regard to that my wives and anybody else whatever have no sort of right at all. I have passed this to you of my own free will and accord. Consequently, all the rights go to you only and are with you. You and I were living with one mind and I lived in accordance with your wishes and intended to live like that in future also. But there is no remedy for the wrath of God. Thus the will is passed, dated August 29, 1907."

KRISHNAWA

v.

RAMAGOUDA

Broomfield J.

It is argued by learned counsel on behalf of the appellants that the disposition of his property which Basagouda made in this will indicates that he desired no adoption by either of his widows. It is pointed out that the widows' rights are restricted to mere maintenance. Even their ornaments are to go to Balagouda after their death and the testator provides for his annual ceremonies, "in order that my name should remain after my death", and Balagouda is directed to perform the ceremonies. It is urged that Basagouda must have intended to prohibit any adoption which would defeat the purposes of the will. Mr. Kane for the respondent on the other hand contends that the dominant object of the will was simply to prevent difficulties arising in respect of transference of the khata in the revenue books. There were some of the family lands standing in Basagouda's name and it was anticipated that this might cause difficulty. The defendants' witness Ramagouda has himself said that this was the object of the will. "Basagouda said that some lands stood in his name and that he would pass a will with regard to them to avoid future trouble by his two wives at the instigation of others." So the argument is that the testator was only emphasising the fact that the family was joint. There might be trouble with the revenue authorities if the widows applied to have their names entered as heirs. But there is nothing said about adoption and nothing from which any prohibition of an adoption can be inferred. According to Mr. Kane there was nothing in the testator's mind except to make it clear that it was joint family property and in his will he has merely stated the normal consequences of that position. Therefore it cannot be inferred that the testator's intention was that there should be no adoption to him.

There is a good deal of force in both of these arguments. There are also difficulties in both. If Basagouda's desire was that his widows were not to have the right of adoption, it seems surprising that he did not say so. On the other hand, if his object merely was to avoid difficulties about the khata, he obviously stated a great deal more than was necessary for that purpose.

We have been referred to several authorities. None of the cases cited has any very direct bearing on the facts, but they are useful no doubt in ascertaining the principles to be followed. There are some observations of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Lakshmbai v. Sarasvatibai<sup>1</sup> showing that a disposition of property by the husband inconsistent with the wife's right of adoption may justify an inference that adoption was impliedly prohibited. In that case there was as a matter of fact no such disposition. But in a later case, Malgouda Paragouda v. Babaji Dattu,<sup>2</sup> it was held that an adoption by a widow was impliedly prohibited because the husband by his will had left his property to his daughters. The wife in that case was enjoined by the will not to make over the property to anybody except the daughters. The adoption was held to be invalid as it could not be upheld without giving the go-by to the testator's expressed wishes. It may be noted that the testator mentioned that he had not taken any one in adoption which showed that it was present to his mind that any adoption would run counter to the provisions of the will. We do not think that such cases can be distinguished on the ground that Basagouda's will in the present case was invalid and of no effect, the family being joint. What is material is not the validity of the will but the intention of the testator as to the way in which the property is to devolve. Whether it devolves by his own volition or independently of it is not important if the course of devolution would be altered by an adoption which he could prohibit.

Then we were referred to Yadao v. Namdeo.<sup>1</sup> In that case a Hindu husband had stated before his death that he did not wish to adopt a son, but that if an adoption were made, the son of his brother should be adopted. His widow did adopt the son of his brother but the boy died and she then made another adoption. It was objected that that adoption was impliedly prohibited by the husband. But their Lordships of the Privy Council overruled that contention and held that there was no direction to the widow forbidding her to make an adoption if the boy named was not available or died. In the course of the judgment their Lordships said (p. 522) :—

"...such a direction to operate as a prohibition against his widow adopting any boy to him as a son except the boy named by him must be explicitly made and clearly intended by the husband to limit the discretion of his widow for all time, and on every occasion on which otherwise after his death his widow might validly make an adoption to him."

The principle laid down in this case has been followed in a very recent case of this Court, Damodar Vishnu Juwekar v. Shriram Lakshman Juwekar.<sup>2</sup>

In Vithagouda v. Secretary of State<sup>3</sup> the testator said :

"...I have formed the resolve of giving all my moveable and immoveable property for charity after my death. For this reason I am not going to adopt a son. And I have neither given nor am going to give authority to make an adoption either to my wife or to anybody else. If anybody should take a son in adoption and say that there was my permission for it it should be regarded as untrue and the disposition of all my property should be made in the way I describe below."

It was held that though there was a prohibition against any such adoption as would defeat the provisions of the will, there was no prohibition in respect of property which could not pass under the will, and an adoption by the widow as the result of which the adopted son became the owner of watan property not affected by the will was held to be valid.

Cases where the husband has given directions about the adoption of a boy and where the particular boy for some reason is not available are not very helpful here because, as I pointed out in my judgment in Damodar Vishnu Juwekar v. Shriram Lakshman Juwekar, there is a presumption in such cases that an adoption was desired by the husband. Obviously no such presumption can arise in the present case. But when, as in this case, the husband has said nothing about an adoption one way or the other and the prohibition of adoption is sought to be inferred from statements about other matters or from conduct, it stands to reason that the inference suggested, if it is to be acted upon, must be a necessary inference. The Court must be able to say with confidence that what the husband has said or done shows that he would have prohibited an adoption, either in any circumstances or in the circumstances existing at the material time, if he could have foreseen them. If the Court can say no more than that he might have, or even that he probably would have, prohibited adoption in any circumstances or in those particular circumstances, that we think is not enough. For in that case it cannot be said that his statements or his actions are equivalent to a prohibition, and in the absence of prohibition there is an inherent right to adopt.

The learned trial Judge thought that Basagouda could not have had the possibility of an adoption in his mind at all, because, as he says inaccurately, the law as understood then was that a widow in a joint family could not adopt. But that was never the law and it was never so understood. A widow in a joint family was always known to have the power of adopting with the consent of her husband's relations, that is to say in the absence of any prohibition from her husband. The plaintiff in this case has alleged, but has not been able to prove, that Balagouda consented to his adoption. But suppose that Balagouda had consented, could it have been argued that the adoption was invalid because Basagouda in his will had impliedly prohibited it? We think not. Basagouda was obviously anxious that the family should continue to be regarded as what it was in fact, a joint family, and that the fact that some lands were in his separate name should not give rise to any claim of separate ownership. He therefore emphasised the rights of his brother as the sole surviving coparcener. But it does not necessarily follow from that that he was opposed to one of the ordinary incidents of a joint family or that he would have objected to an adoption by his widow if his brother himself did not object. It might perhaps be argued with some plausibility, in view of his obvious anxiety to safeguard his brother's rights, that he would have objected to any adoption of a son to himself without his brother's consent, supposing that he could have contemplated that as a possibility. But we think that that might very well have depended on the circumstances of the case. The plaintiff is Balagouda's son-in-law. He was so at the time of his adoption, and from the family point of view that is certainly an important circumstance. We do not think we can say with any confidence that Basagouda would have prohibited such an adoption if he had foreseen it. At any rate the matter is far from clear and without wandering into the region of speculation, which we are not entitled to do, we cannot spell out any prohibition from the terms of this will. We therefore agree with the view taken by the trial Court on this aspect of the case.

The point that the plaintiff is bound by the award decree to which Krishnabai was a party in 1908 is a new one, not taken at the trial nor even mentioned in the memorandum of appeal. It cannot be taken therefore without special leave of the Court under O. XLI, r. 2. It is the practice of this Court not to allow such new points to be taken, unless at any rate it is clear that the point is a pure question of law which can be determined on the

A. C. J. materials already on the record. But this cannot be said to be a pure question 1940 of law. It is clear from the case which learned counsel for the appellants — himself cited, Ravji Andu v. Rama,<sup>1</sup> that the question whether a decree KRISHNAWA against a widow is to be regarded as one against her in a representative capa-YELAGOUDA city, and therefore binding on the estate, depends partly on questions of facts,
 . v. such questions for instance as whether the action of the widow was reasonable RAMAGOUDA such questions for instance as whether the action of the widow was reasonable — relating to these proceedings which are on record it would seem that the widows Broomfield J. were primarily concerned at any rate with the amount of their maintenance, — a purely personal matter. Moreover, as Mr. Kane has pointed out, it seems that as the result of these award proceedings Krishnabai abandoned the proceedings which she had instituted in favour of her adopted son Iragouda.

 Exhibit 134 is an application made by a pleader on behalf of Iragouda in which it was stated that Krishnabai, Iragouda's next friend, was colluding with the opponent Balagouda. There is some reason to suppose therefore that Balagouda won over the widows to his point of view by giving them more maintenance than was allowed by Basagouda's will. The question raised is a complicated one which in our opinion could not be satisfactorily determined on the available materials. But so far as the evidence on the record does go, we are certainly not prepared to hold that Krishnabai represented the estate in these proceedings in such a way as to make the award decree binding upon the present plaintiff.

We hold therefore that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

SUIT for possession of property.

Tukaram and Baji were two separated brothers. Tukaram died leaving him surviving his widow Jana, his brother Baji and Baji's wife Ahilya. Jana inherited her husband's immoveable property and in the year 1892 she sold the property to the father of one Dada Bhiwa (defendant). Baji then died leaving him surviving his widow Ahilya. In 1913 Jana endeavoured to recover the property sold by her in 1892 on the ground that the transaction was a mortgage and not a sale. She, however, died soon after the suit was started and the suit abated. On Jana's death the property of Tukaram passed to Ahilya, as the widow of a gotraja sapinda.

In 1938 Ahilya adopted Subrao (plaintiff).

On October 15, 1936, the plaintiff sued to recover from the defendant the property which had been in his possession since 1892, on the ground that the sale by Jana was not for legal necessity. The trial Court held that the plaintiff could not divest the estate of Tukaram vested in Ahilya as an heir to Tukaram and dismissed the suit, observing as follows :—

"For the plaintiff his learned pleader argues that the plaintiff by reason of his valid adoption is in the position of a brother's son to the deceased Tukaram, that as such he is a nearer heir to Tukaram than Ahilya who is only a brother's widow, and that therefore the plaintiff's adoption has the effect of divesting Tukaram's estate from the remoter heir Ahilya, and of vesting it in the nearer heir, the plaintiff. Such argument was addressed to the Court in Umabai v. Nani (30 Bom. L. R. 100), and was accepted by the Court in that case. But the decision in that case has been expressly disapproved and overruled in the aforesaid full bench case of Balu Sakharan v. Lahoo (39 Bom. L. R. 382). As is pointed out in that full bench case at pp. 413 and 414 of the report :—'But there is another well established rule of Hindu law that on the death of a separated house-holder or last surviving member of a coparcenary, the inheritance passes at once to the nearest heir or group of heirs and cannot be held in suspense subject to a possible adoption...Hindu law does not recognise, as does English law, an estate vested but liable to be divested'. So Tukaram's estate which vested in Ahilya on Jana's death in 1913 cannot during her lifetime be divested from her by subsequent adoption made by her of the plaintiff to her own husband Baji. On Ahilya's death the succession to Tukaram's estate will re-open, and it will go to the person who happens to be his nearest heir then surviving. So the plaintiff will have to wait till Ahilya dies, and if he survives her, may then take his chance of succeeding to Tukaram's estate as the next reversioner."

On appeal the Assistant Judge held that the plaintiff could divest Ahilya of the estate vested in her as her husband's brother's heir, but that the plaintiff's suit was barred by limitation under art. 141 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908. In his judgment he observed as follows :—

"The learned Judge has relied upon a. 502 at p. 553 of Mulla's Principles of Hindu Law, 8th edn., for his opinion that an adopted son can divest his mother only of two estates and not more, namely the one vested in her as an heir to her husband and the other vested in her as an heir to her son. He also relied upon the full bench decision of our High Court in Balu Sakharan v. Lahoo Sambhaji (39 Bom. L. R. 382) in which the above section in Mulla's book was referred to with approval and it was held that though the adoption by a widow in whom the property did not vest was valid it had not the effect of divesting the estate of the last male-holder vested in another widow as a gotraja sapinda and of vesting it in the adopted son. But the facts of that case are entirely different from the facts of the present case. In this case Ahilya inherited the estate of Tukaram as his brother's widow and therefore it is urged that she inherited it as a gotraja sapinda. But strictly

A. C. J.

SUBRAO BAJI
v.
DADA BHIWA

A. C. J. speaking widows are not gotraja sapindas of their husbands' collaterals and therefore they were not recognised by Hindu law givers as heirs. It is only by usage that the widows of gotraja sapindas have come to be recognised as heirs in this province on the ground that in the absence of a gotraja sapinda his widow would take his place, vide Lallubhai v. Cassibai, 5 Bom. 110. In other provinces they are not regarded even now as heirs. Under these circumstances when a widow inherits property as gotraja sapinda it has to be deemed that she takes the place of her husband and that the estate vests in her as an heir to her husband. It is for this very reason that where she inherits property as an heir to her husband's collaterals that she takes only a widow's estate in that property. I am therefore of the opinion that if she makes an adoption to her husband, the adopted son will divest her not only of the husband's property vested in her as a widow but will also divest her of the property vested in her as gotraja sapinda's widow. In this particular case Ahilya had two estates vested in her, one of her husband and the other of her husband's brother Tukaram. The learned Judge has held that the adopted son divests her only of the property of her husband which is not included in this suit, but not the property of her husband's brother. I do not think that that view is correct. I am therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff could divest Ahilya of the property vested in her as an heir to Tukaram and could therefore maintain a suit for possession in the lifetime of Ahilya."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Y. V. Dixit, for the appellant.

P. V. Kane, for the respondent.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal against a decision of the Assistant Judge of Satara. The plaintiff sues to recover certain immoveable property, and his title is made out in this way. As long ago as the year 1892 Jana, who was the widow of Tukaram, sold the suit property to the defendant's father. In 1913 she endeavoured to recover the property on the ground that the transaction was a mortgage and not a sale, but she died soon after that suit was started, and the suit abated. On the death of Jana in 1913 the property passed to Ahilya, who was the widow of Tukaram's divided brother Baji, who had died before Jana. Ahilya, as the widow of a gotraja sapinda, according to the law in force in this Presidency, enjoyed only a widow's estate, and in 1928, she adopted the plaintiff. In 1936 the plaintiff filed this suit seeking to recover the property from the defendant, who had been in possession since 1892, on the ground that the sale by Jana was not for legal necessity. The suit failed in both the lower Courts, though for different reasons. In the trial Court the learned Judge held that the adoption of the plaintiff did not divest the estate of Tukaram, which was vested in Ahilya; whilst in the lower appellate Court it was held that the adoption did divest any estate then in Ahilya, but that the plaintiff's suit was barred by limitation under art. 141 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

I think that the ground taken in the lower appellate Court cannot be supported, because the plaintiff's claim undoubtedly arose in 1928, and, although at that date any right which Ahilya had to claim possession was unquestionably barred by limitation, the plaintiff does not claim through Ahilya. But I think that the plaintiff's claim fails on the authority of the full bench decision in Radhabai v. Rajaram.<sup>1</sup> In that case the full bench held that the widow of a gotraja sapinda could not by adoption divest the estate of a reversioner and thereby alter the inheritance. A. C. J.

Mr. Dixit for the appellant relies on a later decision of Mr. Justice Divatia in Shivappa v. Kariyappa.<sup>21</sup> In that case the facts were practically the same as in the present case. The adopted son was seeking to recover possession against a purchaser from a former widow on the ground that the sale was not for necessity, and Mr. Justice Divatia distinguished the full bench case on the ground that in the full bench case the contest was between the adopted son and the reversioner, whilst in the case before him the contest was between the adopted son and the purchaser. But with all respect to the learned Judge, I think that that is a wrong way of looking at it, and that in fact his decision is impossible to reconcile with the full bench decision. In the full bench case, the question was whether the adopted son or the reversioner was entitled to immoveable property. In the present case, as in the case decided by Mr. Justice Divatia, no doubt the actual contest is between the adopted son and the purchaser, but the defence of the purchaser is that the plaintiff cannot sue, because it is the reversioner to Tukaram's estate who has the right to sue. Who that reversioner may be, the evidence does not show, but there must be some reversioner who would have taken but for the adoption, and from the full bench decision it follows that the adoption did not oust the title of that reversioner. The only distinction between this case and the case decided by Mr. Justice Divatia on the one hand, and the full bench case on the other, is that the property to be divested in the latter case was the immoveable property itself, whereas in the former cases the property to be divested was the right to sue for possession of immoveable property. But the principle of the full bench case applies. The widow of a gotraja sapinda cannot by adoption alter the order of inheritance of the property and divest the reversioner. That applies just as much to a chose in action as to immoveable property, and I think that on that ground the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

SAVER MANUEL DANTES.*

Government of India Act (26 Geo. V, c. 2), Sec. 205—Appeal—Federal Court—Certificate to appeal—"Judgment, decree or final order"—"Substantial question of law"—Such question must arise directly—Remote possibility of question arising not enough—Opinion of High Court obiter—Reference to High Court—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 432.

An order made by the High Court, under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, merely answering a question raised by a Presidency Magistrate and expressing an opinion on a question of law, is not a final order within the meaning of s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

Emperor v. Hemendra Prasad Ghosh,<sup>1</sup> followed.

A mere possibility of "a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of" the Government of India Act, 1935, arising in a remote contingency is not enough to justify the granting of a certificate under s. 205 of the Act.

On a reference made by a Presidency Magistrate, under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, two questions arose, first, whether the Bombay Abkari Amendment Act, 1939, was ultra vires the Bombay Legislature, as being beyond its scope by virtue of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935; and, secondly, whether a certain notification issued under the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, was revived by the Amending Act of 1939. The High Court disposed of the reference by answering the second question; but only expressed an opinion obiter on the first question. The Magistrate following the answer returned by the High Court on the second question acquitted the accused. The Government of Bombay appealed and the acquittal was upheld by the High Court. The Government of Bombay then applied for a certificate to appeal to the Federal Court of India under s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, on the ground that the case involved a substantial question of law on the interpretation of that Act:—

Held, (1) that the answer given by the High Court on the second question in the reference was not a "final order" for the purpose of s. 205 of the Act;

(2) that the order passed by the High Court in appeal from the order of acquittal was the only final order, and it did not involve directly any question under the Act;

(3) that the accused having secured acquittal in two Courts, the High Court should have, to justify the grant of certificate to appeal against the acquittal to a third Court, a clear indication in the statute that it was its duty to give the certificate;

(4) that the wording of s. 205(2) indicated that the Legislature did not contemplate an appeal against a decision not based on a point of law arising under the Government of India Act;

(5) that therefore no question of law under the Act was involved in the case and no certificate should be granted under s. 205.

* Criminal Application No. 331 of

No. 359 of 1940.
1 [1939] 2 Cal. 411.

APPLICATION for certificate to appeal to the Federal Court under s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

The accused was prosecuted for an offence punishable under s. 43 (1) (a) of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, before the Presidency Magistrate, Fourth Court, Bombay.

The Magistrate referred to the High Court, under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the following two questions for decision :—

1 (a) Has the Provincial Legislature power, under item 31 of List II of the 7th schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, or otherwise, to pass a law of which the object is to introduce a policy of total prohibition in the Province of Bombay or in certain areas thereof ; and

(b) whether s. 3 and s. 6(b) of Bombay Act VI of 1940 are intra vires in particular with regard to total prohibition of possession of liquor and of intoxicating drugs.

2 In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, whether there is in existence any effective notification under s. 14B(2) of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, absolutely prohibiting the possession of intoxicants by persons generally in the City of Bombay, in other words, whether notification No. 374(c) 39 dated July 17, 1939, which was declared by the High Court to be ultra vires and of no effect, is to be considered as in force by virtue of s. 7 of the Bombay Act VI of 1940.

The High Court answered the second question by saying that the notification under reference was not revived by Bombay Act VI of 1940, and disposed of the reference ; but in view of the request of the Advocate General expressed their opinion obiter on the first question also (see 42 Bom. L. R. 791).

When the answers were received in the lower Court, the Magistrate passed, agreeably with the answer given by the High Court, an order of acquittal on July 4, 1940.

The Government of Bombay appealed against the order of acquittal (Appeal No. 371 of 1940) ; but the High Court summarily rejected it on September 2, 1940.

On September 11, 1940, the Government of Bombay applied to the High Court for a certificate to appeal to the Federal Court under s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, against the orders passed by the High Court on the reference made to it by the Presidency Magistrate, Fourth Court. They also filed another application for a similar certificate against the order passed by the High Court rejecting the appeal against the order of acquittal.

The applications came on before the full bench for rule on September 13, 1940.

M. C. Setalvad, Advocate General, with R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, instructed by N. K. Petigara, Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

M. C. Setalvad. We apply for a certificate to appeal to the Federal Court from the judgment of the full bench in Emperor v. Dantes,<sup>1</sup> and from the final order passed by the Presidency Magistrate in pursuance of that judgment. We say that the two pre-requisites to the grant of the certificate imposed by s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, are satisfied in this case.

First of all, there is a "judgment, decree or final order." In this case, two questions were framed by the Magistrate and referred to the High Court for opinion under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898. Under s. 433 of the Code such a reference results in an order passed by the High Court, and the referring Magistrate is bound to "dispose of the case conformably to the said order." Thus the opinion given by the High Court on a reference under s. 432 is itself a "final order." That order the Magistrate is bound to obey and carry out.

It has been decided by the Calcutta High Court in Emperor v. Hemendra Prasad Ghosh<sup>1</sup> that the expression of opinion by the High Court on a reference under s. 432 is not a "judgment, decree or final order" within the meaning of s. 205(1) of the Government of India Act, 1935. I submit that the decision is erroneous. The view there is not given after consideration of the terms of s. 432 and the effect of an order passed under the section. It is difficult to say that an order which the Magistrate is bound to obey is not a final order. It is the High Court that really decides the matter. Besides, in the Calcutta case, the facts had not been ascertained. The Magistrate made a reference at the inception of the hearing before him on a mere point of law. Here, however, the evidence has been taken, and all the facts of the case are set out. There is no dispute as to facts at all.

The expression "judgment, decree or final order" should be given a wide meaning. The Federal Court itself has done so in Hori Ram Singh v. The Crown.<sup>2</sup> There Gwyer C. J. and Varadachariar J. (Sulaiman J. dissenting) held that the expression does not limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Court to civil cases. The facts were that the accused was convicted by a Magistrate but acquitted by the Sessions Judge. The High Court reversed the acquittal order and remitted the case to the Sessions Judge for disposal on merits. Even such an order was regarded as a final order. The question again came up for decision in Shyamkant Lal v. Rambhajan Singh,<sup>3</sup> and gave rise to the same diversity of opinion. The question there was whether a judgment-debtor under a mortgage decree was entitled to an order under ss. 16 and 17 of the Bihar Money-lenders Act, 1938, for the purpose of restricting the execution sale to such part of the mortgaged property as might be considered by the Court sufficient to satisfy the decree. The refusal by the High Court to make such an order was treated as a final order.

In the present case, we have distinctly an order which finally disposes of the case.

Secondly, the requirement that "the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Act" is also satisfied. On the judgment delivered by the High Court there is no doubt on the point. The case does involve a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act.

The Magistrate referred to this Court two questions of law. The full bench took the view that the first question did "not really arise in connection with the prosecution" (p. 814). It considered the second question from three points of view. First, that the notification "does not fall within the ambit of s. 7 of the Amending Act, and, secondly, that if it does so fall, the notification having been declared by this Court to be of no effect, the accused cannot be convicted under it" (p. 814). The third aspect was whether the notification was invalid by reason of the invalidity of the Amending Act itself (p. 815). The notification was held to be invalid under the first two points. In dealing with the third aspect the full bench said: "it must be understood that our views on this point are not intended to form part of our decision, and must be regarded as 'obiter' only" (p. 815).

It should be remembered that s. 205 does not provide that the "judgment involves", but only that the "case involves." In the present case, the determination of the third aspect, i.e. whether the notification was valid or invalid by reason of the invalidity of the Amending Act, involved an interpretation of the Government of India Act, and as a matter of fact the full bench did interpret the provisions of that Act. The full bench said (p. 816): "We see no difficulty in reconciling the two items now in question by holding that the Provincial Legislature has no power to legislate in respect of possession of intoxicants in such a way as to encroach upon the right to import and export across the customs frontiers." The full bench has dealt with the third aspect. If it did not deal with it, even so the question about the interpretation of the Act would arise. It is true that the notification was held to be bad on the first two points only, and the opinion on the third was expressed obiter. Where an appeal raises several questions of law, and the decision on only one of them renders it unnecessary to decide the other questions, then even if those questions are not decided, the case does involve all the questions that arise. The fact that the opinion of the full bench on the third point is expressed obiter does not mean that the point is not involved in the case.

The parallel expression "the appeal must involve some substantial question of law" used in s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, was interpreted by the Calcutta High Court in Gopinath Birbar v. Goluck Chunder Bose.<sup>1</sup> The section requires that where there are concurrent findings of fact, the appeal must involve some substantial question of law, for the grant of leave to appeal to the Privy Council. In the above case, issues raised points both of law and fact. The trial Court decided all the issues against the plaintiff, but the High Court on appeal agreed with the trial Court on the first issue which was one of fact and was sufficient for the disposal of the case and gave no decision on the other issues. The plaintiff was still given leave to appeal on the ground that the appeal involved questions of law within the meaning of the section, notwithstanding that such question might be immaterial for the decision of the case. Garth C. J. said (p. 295, f. n.): "Now here, if the appeal is allowed, it will allow substantial questions of law; that is to say, questions of law will be raised in the appeal, as well as the question of fact. It is true, that those questions of law may become immaterial, if the question of fact is decided against the plaintiff; but still it seems impossible to say that the appeal does not involve questions of law." Here, if the Federal Court says that the notification is valid on the first two points, then it will assuredly go into the third point.

F. B. If one of the questions arising in a case involves interpretation of a section of the Government of India Act, then the requirement of s. 205 is satisfied in spite of the fact that the other questions are sufficient for the disposal of the case.

1941

DANTES

The above Calcutta case was followed by Ranade J. in In re Vishwambhar Pandit,<sup>1</sup> where the learned Judge said (p. 703) : "that the substantial question of law need not directly arise out of the concurrent findings of fact . . . , but that it is enough if it is involved in those findings, and can, if the appeal is allowed, be raised in the course of the argument."

The "case" means the matter or proceeding or all the issues arising in the case.

The test under s. 205 is whether a question as to the interpretation of the Act arises in the case. I do not suggest that merely because a section is mentioned in the pleadings that it does arise in the case. But where the question of interpretation may arise on one view of the matter, then the question is really involved though it is not decided upon. Here, the High Court has held the notification to be bad on the first two points, and delivered only an opinion on the third point. Although the opinion may not amount to a judgment, still the point is involved in the case. It is in fact involved, and not may be involved. "Involved in the case" is not the same thing as involved in the decision. It would include a case where there are several issues, one of which alone bears on the Government of India Act, though the decision may proceed only on the other issues. Suppose, in a civil suit questions of jurisdiction and limitation arise. The Court dismisses the suit only on the question of jurisdiction. Still the case will all the same involve the question of limitation. It arises directly in the case. Similarly, here, the third point arises directly in the case. It would be open to the Federal Court to say that even if the notification was good on the first two points, it still was bad on the third point.

The Court issued a rule.

The rule came up for final arguments on January 16, 1941.

M. C. Setalvad, Advocate General, with R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, instructed by N. K. Petigara, Public Prosecutor, for the Government of Bombay.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga, with S. G. Velinker and R. J. Kolah, instructed by Gagrat & Co., for the accused.

M. C. Setalvad. The Presidency Magistrate referred two questions to the High Court under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code (see 42 Bom. L. R. at p. 814) : first, whether Bombay Act VI of 1940 was ultra vires the Bombay Legislature ; and, secondly, whether the notification No. 374/39 (c) dated July 17, 1939, was still in force. The High Court answered the second question, and expressed no opinion on the first question. When the reference went back, the Magistrate followed the answers returned by the High Court, as he was bound to do under s. 433 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and acquitted the accused.

On the present application the question that arises is whether the High Court will grant a certificate to appeal to the Federal Court under s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

Section 205 consists of two parts. The first part prescribes the conditions on which the certificate can be given. The second part describes the consequences which ensue when the certificate is given. Two requisites are necessary under the first part. First, there must be a "judgment, decree or final order"; and, secondly, the case must "involve a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Act."

First of all, the question is, is there a "judgment, decree or final order" in the case? I submit that the order passed on a reference under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code is a "judgment, decree or final order." Section 432 enables a Presidency Magistrate to refer a question of law to the High Court for opinion. What the High Court says is treated as the "decision" of the High Court. Section 433 enables the High Court to pass "such order" thereon as it thinks fit; a copy of "such order" has to be sent to the Magistrate; and the Magistrate is left with no option but to "dispose of the case conformably to the said order." It is thus for the High Court to pass an order. The matter does not rest in "opinion" but results in "order." Section 433 clearly contemplates an order, according to which the Magistrate is bound to act. Assuming that the High Court has expressed an opinion, the Magistrate is bound to pass an order based on that opinion. Treating for the moment the decision of the High Court as "opinion", even so it amounts to an "order" under s. 205 of the Government of India Act. The "opinion" is binding on the Magistrate and he is bound to pass an order conformably to the "opinion". His order or disposal of the case has to be in accordance with the expression of opinion by the High Court. It is a final order. Even in the substantive appeal the expression of opinion is a final order: it cannot be challenged in the final appeal. The opinion is an "order" under s. 433 of the Criminal Procedure Code; and it is certainly a "final order" within the meaning of s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

In Hori Ram Singh v. The Crown<sup>1</sup> the Federal Court held that the words "judgment, decree or final order" in s. 205 did not limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Court to civil cases. The actual order under appeal there was an "order of the High Court directing a re-hearing of the criminal appeal by the Sessions Court" (p. 171). Even such an order was held to fall within s. 205. Gwyer C. J. added in that case (p. 162): "the words 'judgment, decree or final order' ought to receive no narrow interpretation." Varadachariar J. said (p. 183): "The juxtaposition of the words 'judgment, decree or final order' is, no doubt, suggestive of civil litigation; but it cannot be said that the word 'judgment' is not comprehensive enough to include a judgment pronounced in a criminal case." This also appears from the rules made by the Bombay High Court under the section. The case, therefore, is an authority for the view that s. 205 applies to criminal matters, and also for the fact that an order remitting a case to the Sessions Court for disposal is a final order under the section. The expression "final order" is employed in s. 109 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, in the sense that it is an order which finally disposes of some matter. The term "final order" is used in the sense that it disposes of the contentions of the parties. The decision of the Federal Court as to the interpretation of the words "final order" is binding on this Court. It stands to reason why the order there should be treated as final. In one view, the proceedings could not go on : on the other view the proceedings could go on. The order there went really to the root of the matter. This is how the order is a final order.

In Shyamkant Lal v. Rambhajan Singh<sup>1</sup> the High Court took the view that s. 16 of the Bihar Money-lenders Act, 1938, was void under s. 107 of the Constitution Act, as ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature. Sulaiman J. held that no appeal at all lay on the ground that the order of the High Court was not a "judgment, decree or final order;" but the majority of Judges were "unable to concur in that opinion" and added (p. 199): "A question of this kind must be determined with reference to the substance of the dispute between the parties and not merely in the light of the fact that the application is one made to the Court before whom an application to execute a decree is pending." The whole question is, is it something which determines some right between the parties or is it something which determines a mere question of procedure? Compare also the expression "final order" as used in cl. 15 of the Letters Patent.

Can it be said in the present case that the order deals with a question of procedure? Here, the question is one of rights. Therefore the order made is of a final nature. Even Sulaiman J. was of opinion (p. 204) "that if the effect of the order from which it is sought to appeal is not finally to dispose of the rights of the parties, then even though it decides an important and even a vital issue in the case, it leaves the suit alive and provides for its trial in the ordinary way."

The two cases decided by the Federal Court lay down the test to be applied. Is the order merely one regulating the procedure or is it an order which disposes of a case on its merits between the parties? The order in the present case says that the notification is dead and cannot be revived. In this sense, it is a final order. I submit that the first order passed by the High Court on reference is a final order. If I am wrong in this submission, then the second order passed by the High Court on appeal is a final order. The High Court in dismissing an appeal does not add to the finality of the first order.

The Calcutta case of Emperor v. Hemendra Prasad Ghosh<sup>2</sup> is not correctly decided. It altogether ignores the wording of s. 433 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The section contemplates an order passed by the High Court : and the Magistrate is bound to dispose of the case in conformity with the order. Such an order is final. The deciding view is the High Court view ; and the Magistrate merely carries out the order. The final decision of the Court is in two parts. The first part is an order under 1 [1939] F. C. R. 193.

2 [1939] 2 Cal. 411.

s. 433. The section contemplates an order and nothing else. Even if not formally drawn up it still is an order. It is a final order, because according to it the Magistrate has no option in the matter, but he is bound to carry it out. It is final because it binds the Magistrate. The Magistrate has not to exercise any judgment or discretion at all. Therefore it has the element of finality in it. The test is, can the Magistrate do anything else? The order is the disposal of the point of law between the parties. If that is so, being an order it is final. The order passed by the Magistrate was: "conformably with the order of the High Court I acquit the accused."

v

Alternatively, I submit that even if the first order passed by the High Court is not a final order, the order passed by the High Court on appeal from the order of acquittal passed by the Magistrate is a final order.

The next point is whether the case "involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of" the Government of India Act. It is now definitely settled that s. 205 of the Act applies to all criminal matters. The title of the appeal is "The King-Emperor v. Saver Manuel Dantes." Under s. 205 there is nothing to prevent an appeal against acquittal. I submit that this Court should have regard to the language used in the section. The "case" should "involve a substantial question of law." Such a question must exist. The dictionary meaning of the word "involve" is "include" or "contain." The term "case" means a proceeding either civil or criminal. The Privy Council say that the object of s. 205 is that when such a question arises it should first go to the Federal Court.

Here, the Court does in effect say that though the case raises the first point yet it prefers to decide the case on the second point, and the reference is disposed of on the second point, and though the Court expresses only an opinion on the first point, still it cannot be denied that the case involves the first point also. The test is not what the Court has proceeded upon. There may be a case, in which three points arise, one only of which relates to the interpretation of a section of the Government of India Act. Even if the Court bases its judgment on the two other points, can it be said that the case does not "involve" the third point? The question is not what the Court has decided, but whether the case "involves" the point.

In the present case, the notification can be attacked in three ways. The Court has held that the attack on the first two points is good, and expresses on the third point merely an opinion. You cannot say that the third point was fanciful.

Suppose, for instance, a case involves questions of (1) jurisdiction, (2) limitation, and (3) merits. All the three points are involved in the case, even if the case is decided on any one point. The test is the scope of the case, and not what is held in the case. If the Court decides the suit on the question of jurisdiction, can you say that the case does not involve the question of limitation? Similarly, if a case raises points of limitation and interpretation of a provision in the Government of India Act, and the Court decides the case only on the point of limitation, can you say that the case does not involve a point of the interpretation of a provision in the Government of India Act? You cannot say that the second point is not involved, merely because you consider that the decision on the first point is a sound

EMPEROR
v.

one. In other words, you cannot make the question whether the interpretation of the Government of India Act is involved or not depend on the soundness or otherwise of the decision on the first point. The test is, does the case, i.e. the matter as presented to the Appeal Court, raise any question as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act? No Court has a right to say that it is not likely that any other view may be taken on the point decided by it, and therefore the other question may be treated as not arising at all.

There are two Privy Council cases as to the interpretation of s. 205. In Errol Mackay v. Oswald Forbes<sup>1</sup> Lord Thankerton said (p. 69): "The section imposes on the High Court the duty of considering and determining in every case, as part of its judgment, decree or final order, the giving or withholding of the certificate. On such determination the jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from such judgment, decree or final order depends, and, manifestly, such determination, whether it involves the granting or withholding of a certificate, should be recorded, not only for the information of the parties, but—a matter of equal importance—also for the certification of this Board and the Federal Court as to their jurisdiction to entertain an appeal." As no such certificate was given, the Privy Council declined to entertain the appeal, for until the certificate was issued the Privy Council had no jurisdiction to interfere. In Punjab Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Income-tax Commissioner, Lahore,<sup>2</sup> Viscount Maugham thus expounded the section (p. 375): "The object of this section is plain. It is to ensure that in every proceeding where a judgment, decree or final order is made by any High Court in British India which involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Act or any Order in Council made thereunder the appeal, if any, that is the direct appeal, shall lie to the Federal Court... The means adopted in the section to carry out the above object are these: (1) The appeal is stated to lie to the Federal Court if the High Court certifies that the specified question of law is involved and is a substantial question. (2) A duty is imposed on the High Court of its own motion to give or to withhold a certificate that the specified question of law being a substantial question is involved. Where such a certificate is given any party in the case may appeal to the Court on defined grounds. Where such a certificate is given no (direct) appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council even with special leave. It is clear that the section does not provide for a case where no such certificate is given, however plain it may be that it ought to have been given. There is no provision, express or implied, taking away from His Majesty in Council the right to entertain a direct appeal in such case, and a fortiori there is nothing taking away the right of direct appeal to His Majesty in Council in a case where no substantial question of law of the specified character could by any reasonable possibility arise." The above case only lays down when the High Court should certify or refuse to certify. It should certify when there is a reasonable probability of the point being involved. If the point is capable of being raised, then it is involved in the case. If it can arise, then certainly

s. c. 42 Bom. L. R. 315.

it is involved. The point being a possible point in the case, the question of the view of the High Court being sound on the other points is not decisive. The sole question is, is there a point regarding the interpretation of the Act in the case if one view is taken? Even if it does not arise if the other view is taken, then all the same the point is involved in the case. The question which you have to decide is whether the case does involve the point. The "case" means the whole bundle of contentions. If some of the contentions are decided, the others do not cease to constitute the case. It is not given to you to speculate what the Federal Court will decide. If the Federal Court disagrees with the view taken by the High Court, then the decision of the Federal Court will be wholly on the Government of India Act. The point arises if one view of the case is taken; it does not arise if the other view is taken: but it is in any event involved in the case.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga. It is repeatedly said by the Privy Council that the word "involve" in s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, must mean that it is necessary to decide.

Now, suppose there were concurrent findings of fact, so that the Privy Council would decline to disturb them in appeal, and that no substantial question of law could arise before the Privy Council unless those findings were set aside by the Privy Council. The question then would arise whether the proposed appeal could be said to involve a question of law so as to entitle a party to appeal to the Privy Council? Mulla in the 10th Edition of his Civil Procedure Code, at p. 368, has answered the question thus: "No, according to the Allahabad High Court. Yes, according to the Calcutta High Court." The latter remark is inaccurate. He relies for the remark on Moran v. Mittu Bibi<sup>1</sup> and Gopinath Birbar v. Goluck Chunder Bose,<sup>2</sup> but both these cases have received a respectful burial and are overruled by the Privy Council. If a question arises only if the findings of fact are upset, then the question is not involved in the case.

On the terms of s. 205 (2) of the Government of India Act, even if the certificate is given under sub-s. (1), the question about the interpretation of the Government of India Act can be agitated in the Federal Court only if that Court grants "leave" to do so "on any other ground." Under s. 206, some day the Federal Court may become a Court of Appeal, but that can be only in civil cases. It is not contemplated that the Federal Court will ever be a Court of Criminal Appeal. The present attempt is to turn the Federal Court into an ordinary Court of Criminal Appeal.

The view taken by the Calcutta High Court in the cases of Moran and Gopinath Birbar is negatived by the Privy Council in Toolsey Persaud Bhuck v. Benayek Misser,<sup>3</sup> and is expressly overruled by the Calcutta High Court in Sukalbutti Mandrani v. Babulal Mandar.<sup>4</sup>

In the present case, can it be said on the actual decision that any point arises as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act? If you give a certificate in a case like the present then you are converting the Federal Court into a Court of Criminal Appeal. The Federal Court itself has no right to give leave to appeal.

The Allahabad High Court held in Banke Lal v. Jagat Narain<sup>1</sup> that the expression "involve some substantial question of law," as used in s. 596 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 (corresponding with s. 110 of the present Code), must be construed with reference to the practice of the Privy Council not to interfere with concurrent findings of fact of the Courts below. It cannot be said that a question which only arises if the concurrent findings of fact of the Courts in India are disregarded, a question which can never arise so long as the Privy Council maintains those concurrent findings of fact, is a "substantial question of law" which the appeal to the Privy Council "involves." In the same case Strachey C. J. said (p. 98): "The word 'involve' implies a considerable degree of necessity. It does not mean that in certain contingencies a question of law might possibly arise... It cannot be said that an appeal involves a question of law which it is in a high degree improbable that the Privy Council will entertain, having regard to its established practice."

The actual order in the present case is the answer to question No. 2. No answer is given on the first question. The order in effect is that there is in existence no notification under the Bombay Abkari Act. Here, unless the Federal Court sets aside the answer to question No. 2, no question regarding the interpretation of the Government of India Act can arise. The appeal does not therefore involve any such question. The case must involve, not may perhaps involve, such a question.

The opinion given by the High Court on the first occasion on reference is a mere opinion. The order passed by the High Court in appeal is a final order. Otherwise, we will be faced with two final orders in one case. So long as the lis is alive, you cannot say that any final order is passed. Here, the litigation was continuing when the High Court decided question No. 2 in the reference.

In Hori Ram Singh v. The Crown<sup>2</sup> the only question raised was whether s. 205 applied to criminal cases. The Chief Justice says nothing about the finality of the order. The case of Shyamkant Lal v. Rambhajan Singh<sup>3</sup> does not help the other side. The order there in question was one passed in execution of a decree of a civil Court. Such an order amounts to a decree (see s. 2 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code.) The judgment there was a decree and was therefore appealable.

The case of Abdul Rahman v. D. K. Cassim & Sons<sup>4</sup> shows what a "final order" is. Sir George Lowndes said (p. 81): "The test of finality is whether the order 'finally disposes of the rights of the parties.' It should be noted that the Appellate Court in India was of opinion that the order it had made 'went to the root of the suit, namely the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain it', and it was for this reason that the order was thought to be final and the certificate granted. But this was not sufficient. The finality must be a finality in relation to the suit. If, after the order, the suit is still a live suit in which the rights of the parties have still to be determined, no appeal lies against it under s. 109 (a) of the Code."

The observations of the Privy Council in Errol Mackay v. Oswald Forbes<sup>1</sup> and Punjab Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Income-tax Commissioner, Lahore<sup>2</sup> are only general observations. They have nothing to do with the present case.

Here the accused has been acquitted by two Courts. Now, you are asked to give a certificate on the supposition that if the Federal Court overrules your view the question of the interpretation of the Government of India Act will arise.

How can an obiter be a judgment?

The case of Emperor v. Hefendra Prasad Ghosh<sup>3</sup> is rightly decided. What the High Court delivers in a case under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code is an opinion, and nothing more. The capacity of the High Court in such a case is advisory only. The "order" in it means the expression of the opinion of the High Court. That order should not be regarded as a final order. The Presidency Magistrate may follow the order. He can still convict the accused on other points. The decision of the Calcutta High Court is by a bench of three Judges. It should be followed.

The Federal Court was not dealing in Shyamkant's case with an opinion delivered by the High Court on a reference made under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code, but only with an order of remand.

In all criminal cases, the Crown is a party. It is only in certain marital offences that the complainant is the person aggrieved. Under s. 417 the Government alone can appeal against an order of acquittal.

M. C. Setalvad, in reply. The first point is whether the case involves an interpretation of the Government of India Act. The decisions cited by the other side on s. 109 of the Civil Procedure Code do not help the Court. Sections 109 and 110 of the Code are, as observed in Banke Lal v. Jagat Narain,<sup>4</sup> framed with reference to the established practice of the Privy Council. As regards s. 205 there is no such practice of the Federal Court. Why should this Court assume that the Federal Court will not grant leave to raise the question? Assuming that this Court grants a certificate, my next step will be to apply to the Federal Court to raise the point covered by question No. 1. I will do so because the point is involved in the case. In every case the application can be made to the Federal Court if the decision proceeds upon an interpretation of the Government of India Act.

Here, the point does really arise, although it is not decided. The point is one of large importance so far as the powers of the Provincial Government are concerned. It will be a ground for the Federal Court to grant leave under s. 205 (2). The section gives jurisdiction to the Federal Court. The jurisdiction is exercised only in the case of a "judgment, decree or final order." The certificate is as regards a substantial question of law. If there is no final order, the Federal Court will not entertain the appeal even if a

The Magistrate is bound to accept the order of the High Court by virtue of s. 433 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The order really puts the proceeding to an end. Even applying the test laid down in the above case the order of the High Court here is a final order.

In any event we have got the decision of the High Court in the appeal filed against the order of acquittal, which indisputably is a final order.

BEAUMONT C. J. These are two applications to the Court to grant a certificate under s. 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, certifying that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Act. When the matter first came before this Court, we directed notice to issue to the accused, because it appeared to us that the question involved was not free from difficulty.

The question arises in this way. In April, 1940, a full bench of this Court<sup>1</sup> held that a Notification issued by the Government of Bombay on July 17, 1939, under the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, was invalid. Subsequently, the Government of Bombay passed an Act amending the Bombay Abkari Act, the effect of which was intended to be to revive the Notification of July 17, 1939. After the passing of the Amendment Act, the accused in the present case, that is to say, the respondent on these applications, was prosecuted for infringing the notification in question, and the learned Magistrate, before whom the case came, referred two questions for the opinion of this Court under s. 432 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The first question did involve a point of law arising under the Government of India Act. The second question dealt with the validity of the notification in question, apart altogether from the provisions of the Government of India Act. On July 1, 1940, this present bench heard the reference, and held that the first question did not arise, and that the only question which did arise was as to the validity of the notification, though we recognized that the validity of the notification might depend upon the validity of the Act under which it was passed. The Court held that the notification had not been effectively revived, and that there was not in existence any effective notification under the Bombay Abkari Act prohibiting the possession of intoxicants by persons generally in the City of Bombay, and answered the second question raised in that sense. With that answer the Court remitted the matter to the learned Magistrate. He, in conformity with the view of the law expressed by this Court, acquitted the accused. Government then appealed against the acquittal, and the appeal was summarily dismissed by a bench of this Court.

It is necessary to notice that, although this Court only decided the second question raised by the learned Magistrate, which did not involve any point of law arising under the Government of India Act, the Court did indicate an opinion as to what the position would have been under the Government of India Act, if the notification had been valid. We adopted that course, not because we had any doubt as to the correctness of our decision under the Bombay Abkari Act, but because we were anxious as far as possible to indicate to Government pitfalls which might be anticipated if they again revived the notification in question, or issued a fresh notification in the same terms. We were anxious, having twice held Government's efforts to enforce their prohibition policy to be invalid, to avoid being called upon to do the same thing on a third occasion. Therefore, we thought it right to indicate our view to Government, and the learned Advocate General invited us to adopt that course. But we made it perfectly clear in the judgment that the views we were expressing on the question arising under the Government of India Act were merely obiter. It is, of course, clear that no appeal lies against a mere expression of opinion by a Court; an appeal lies only against an order of the Court, and not against the reasons on which the order is founded.

Under s. 205 of the Government of India Act an appeal lies to the Federal Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in British India. Those words are not particularly apt to describe an acquittal or a conviction by a criminal Court, but the Federal Court has held that—under the section an appeal lies against a conviction or an acquittal, and by that decision we are bound.

The first question, which arises, is what is the final order against which Government claim the right to appeal? In our opinion, it is perfectly plain that the order made by the full bench of this Court, merely answering a question raised by the learned Magistrate, and expressing an opinion on a question of law, is not a final order. That exact point has been decided by a bench of the Calcutta High Court in Emperor v. Hemendra Prasad Ghosh<sup>1</sup> and we have no hesitation in following that case. The only final order, which has been made, is the order of this Court dismissing the appeal against the order of acquittal passed by the learned Magistrate, and that order of dismissal does not involve directly any question under the Government of India Act. However, the actual wording of s. 205 of the Government of India Act is :

“An appeal shall lie to the Federal Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in British India, if the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Act or any Order in Council made thereunder.”

The crucial words are “case involves”; not, on the one hand, “judgment decides”, nor, on the other hand, “case may involve”. The question to be decided is whether this case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Act, when the actual decision does not determine any such question, but, in certain events, such a question might arise in the Federal Court.

It was held in a recent case in the Privy Council, Punjab Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Income-tax Commissioner, Lahore,<sup>2</sup> that a High Court in British

F. B. India is bound either to give or withhold a certificate under s. 205, if 1941 there is a reasonable possibility of a point of law under the Government — of India Act arising. But the Privy Council did not indicate how great a EMPEROR degree of probability of the point arising must exist to justify the grant
 v. of a certificate. The mere possibility of some such question of law arising DANTES in a remote contingency cannot be enough to justify the granting of a
Beaumont C.J. certificate. It is to be noticed in this case that we are dealing with a — criminal matter in which there is no right of appeal from a High Court, except as given by s. 205, and moreover that Government is seeking to exercise a right of second appeal against acquittal. It is a strong thing, when a man has been acquitted already by two Courts, to give leave to appeal against his acquittal to a third Court, and we must find a clear indication in the statute that it is our duty to give such leave. There are two contingencies, the happening of either of which would prevent any question of law under the Government of India Act from arising. The first contingency is that the Federal Court may agree with the view which this Court took under the Bombay Abkari Act as to the invalidity of the Notification of July, 1939. The second contingency is that the Federal Court may refuse to give leave for that point to be raised. That second contingency arises on the words of sub-s. (2) of s. 205, which provides :

“Where such a certificate is given, any party in the case may appeal to the Federal Court on the ground that any such question as aforesaid has been wrongly decided, and on any ground on which that party could have appealed without special leave to His Majesty in Council if no such certificate had been given.”

That last sentence does not apply to an appeal in a criminal matter, because there is no right of appeal without special leave to His Majesty in Council. Then the sub-section goes on : “and, with the leave of the Federal Court, on any other ground.” So that, if we grant a certificate, Government can only appeal, on the ground that the question under the Bombay Abkari Act was wrongly decided, with the leave of the Federal Court, and until they have obtained such leave and succeeded on such ground of appeal, no question of law under the Government of India Act can arise. The wording of the sub-section seems to indicate that the legislature did not contemplate an appeal against a decision not based on a point of law arising under the Government of India Act. It seems to us impossible to assume that the Federal Court will give such leave and thereby enable the Government of Bombay to prosecute a second appeal against the acquittal of an accused person, merely in order to raise a question under the Government of India Act, which has not up to now been decided. That seems to us too remote a contingency. In our opinion, therefore, it cannot be said that any question of law under the Government of India Act is involved in the present case.

We, therefore, refuse the certificate. Rule in both applications discharged.

City of Bombay Police Act (Bom. IV of 1902), Secs. 27 (2A)† and 128—Commissioner of Police—Removal of certain persons out of city of Bombay—Unauthorized return of externee—Offence—Sentence—Enhancement of sentence.

On a charge being preferred under s. 128 of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902, against a person who has been externed and has disobeyed the order, it is competent for the Court to consider whether the order of externment made by the Commissioner of Police was legal, that is to say, whether the case fell within the terms of s. 27(2A) of the Act.

If there are more than two convictions for separate offences the case falls within s. 27 (2A), irrespective of the fact whether the offences were tried together at one trial under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code or tried separately; though it would normally be harsh to make an order of externment when all the offences have been committed at one and the same time and as part of the same transaction, if the Commissioner has nothing else to go upon.

The Commissioner of Police, in deciding whether to make an externment order in a case falling within s. 27 (2A), is acting in an administrative, and not in a judicial, capacity. It is, therefore, not open to the Court, in dealing with a case of breach of an order of externment made under the sub-section, to consider the reasons which induced the Commissioner to make the order of externment.

Under s. 128 all that the Court can do is to consider whether the order of the Commissioner of Police was legal; and if it was, whether it has been broken; and, if so, what is the proper punishment.

An order of externment under s. 27(2A) is made in the public interest, and it is a serious offence to ignore that order. The mere fact that it has only been ignored once is not a good reason for imposing a light sentence.

The age of the accused is only relevant in passing a sentence where the accused is very young or very old.

Where the accused proves conclusively that he had some reason for coming to Bombay unconnected with any criminal intent, it is a matter which may be taken into account in imposing the sentence.

The period of time during which the accused has remained in custody is a matter to which the Court always pays some regard in imposing a sentence.

The accused was served with an order made by the Commissioner of Police on August 14, 1940, under s. 27 (2A) of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902. He was given a railway ticket for his native place of Dhandhuka and seen out of Bombay on August 16, 1940. He was, however, again found in Bombay on September 23, 1940, where he had returned without permission of the Commissioner of Police. He was arrested and tried for an offence under s. 128 of the Act.

Before the trying Magistrate the accused pleaded guilty. The Magistrate convicted the accused on his plea. It appeared that there were three previous convictions against the accused; two of which were passed at one trial for the offences of house-breaking and theft, and the third one was passed subsequently on June 20, 1938, for the offence of theft. The Magistrate sentenced the accused to rigorous imprisonment for two months, observing as follows :—

“The present is, however, the accused's first conviction under s. 128 of Bom. Act IV of 1902. He has also been in custody for eleven days already.”

The Government of Bombay applied to the High Court in revision for enhancement of the sentence passed as above.

The Magistrate submitted a report to the High Court under s. 441 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, in the course of which he stated as follows :—

“In awarding sentence I usually take into consideration several factors :—

(a) The number of previous convictions, and particularly the importance or the gravity of offence in respect of each such conviction as disclosed by the quantum of punishment which the Court may have awarded in the case.

(b) Whether the case is that of a first offence under s. 128 or is of a second or subsequent offence. (This I regard as the most important consideration).

(c) The age of the accused.

(d) The reason which may have prompted the accused to return to Bombay.

(e) The period of time during which the accused may have remained in custody.

In the case before their Lordships the accused had three previous convictions. The first two convictions for house trespass (or house-breaking) and theft were of the same date, and it is probable that separate convictions and sentences were recorded and passed for house trespass (or house-breaking) and for theft. The sentences given to him were only fifteen days and one day for the first two convictions—suggesting that the offences could not have been serious. There was a third conviction for theft for which the accused got two months only. Further, the case before me was that of the accused's first offence under s. 128. The accused was also in custody for nearly a fortnight. All the three convictions were at Matheran; and the accused having come to Bombay had so far committed no offence in the City. Having regard to those considerations I thought that a sentence of two months was quite adequate.

It may be said that the accused already had three previous convictions and therefore he should have been dealt with severely. But three previous convictions are the minimum required in order to justify an order of externment, and if there had been less than three, no order could have been made. So that the fact of there being three convictions was, in my judgment, by no means a circumstance of aggravation. If, (as I believe may have been the case), the first two convictions were for house-breaking and theft at the same time, and there was only one trial, the two convictions together should have been regarded as a conviction ‘once’; so that, taken with the third conviction of June 20, 1938, the accused should have been regarded as convicted twice only, and there would not even be a basis for the order of externment, there being no conviction 'more than twice', i.e. on at least three separate occasions." A. Cr. J.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an application by Government to enhance the sentence passed upon the accused.

On August 14, 1940, the Commissioner of Police made an order for externment of the accused under s. 27 (2A) of the City of Bombay Police Act. The order was duly served on the accused, and on August 16, he was given a ticket for the place to which he was going and was seen out of Bombay. But on September 23 he was found to have returned to Bombay and was accordingly arrested and put up before the learned Magistrate, Fourth Court, on a charge under s. 128 of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902. That section provides that—

"Whoever, within two years from the date of his removal under the provisions of s. 27 ... enters the City of Bombay, without the permission in writing of the Commissioner of Police, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or with both."

The learned Magistrate convicted the accused, who had pleaded guilty, and sentenced him to two months' rigorous imprisonment. The Government of Bombay have applied to us to enhance the sentence.

The learned Magistrate has submitted a statement to this Court under s. 441 of the Criminal Procedure Code in which he gives the grounds on which he acts in determining the proper sentence in cases of this sort, and we are indebted to him for so doing. He enumerates five factors which he takes into consideration in determining what sentence to impose. The first factor, which is the only one calling for serious comment, is the number of previous convictions (i.e. those justifying the deportation order) and the importance or the gravity of the offence in respect of each such conviction as disclosed by the quantum of punishment which the Court may have awarded in the case. In my opinion, those are not legitimate matters for the Magistrate to take into account. Under s. 27(2A) of the City of Bombay Police Act it is competent to the Commissioner of Police to direct any person who, not having been born in the City of Bombay or the Bombay Suburban District, has been convicted more than twice of offences of the character specified, to remove himself from the City of Bombay and not to re-enter it. On a charge being preferred under s. 128 against a man who has been externed and has disobeyed the order, it is certainly competent for the Court to consider whether the order of externment made by the Commissioner of Police was legal, that is to say, whether the case fell within the terms of s. 27(2A). It is not disputed in this case that the accused had been convicted on one day of criminal house trespass and theft, and separate sentences had been passed under those two sections, though the sentence for theft was only one day's imprisonment; and there was also a later conviction for theft. It has been argued for the accused that the convictions on the first occasion of house trespass and theft were probably convictions arising out of the same transaction, and I will assume that to be so. Of course it may very well happen, and frequently it does happen, that in the course of a single transaction an accused person may commit several offences. For example, he may commit criminal house trespass, by breaking into a house; he may steal some article in the house and thereby be guilty of theft; and when he is interrupted, he may assault the owner of the house, and thereby be guilty of causing hurt. As all those offences arise out of the same transaction, they can be tried together, but there may be a separate conviction and sentence for each of the offences. In practice where more than one offence is committed in the course of the same transaction, the Court directs sentences of imprisonment to run concurrently, but in law that is not necessary. Now it is argued by Mr. Walavalkar for the accused that where there are two or more convictions for offences committed in the course of the same transaction, they cannot be treated as more than one conviction for the purposes of s. 27(2A). But in my opinion that is not right. The actual words of the sub-section are "has been convicted more than twice of offences", not "has been convicted on more than two occasions"; and whether the offences are tried together under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, or tried separately, is mere matter of procedure. If in fact there are more than two convictions for separate offences, it seems to me that the case falls within s. 27(2A), though I think it would normally be harsh to make an order of externment when all the offences have been in fact committed at one and the same time and as part of the same transaction, if the Commissioner has nothing else to go upon. But, in my opinion, it is not open to the Court, in dealing with a case of breach of an order of externment made under s. 27(2A), to consider the reasons which induced the Commissioner of Police to make the order of externment. The Commissioner of Police, in deciding whether to make an externment order in a case falling within the sub-section, is acting in an administrative capacity, and not in a judicial capacity. He may know a great deal more about the person to be externed than the Court which convicted him knew. The Commissioner is not bound only by the evidence given in Court, and may consider himself justified in making an order of externment in the public interest, although the actual offences of which the accused person has been convicted were not of a serious character. In my opinion, all that the Court can do in a case under s. 128 is to consider whether the order of the Commissioner of Police was legal; and if it was, whether it has been broken; and, if so, what is the proper punishment. It is not open to the Court to consider the reasons which induced the Commissioner of Police to make the order. In my opinion, therefore, the first factor, which the learned Magistrate says that he takes into consideration in considering the sentence, is not a legitimate factor.

The second factor is whether the case under s. 128 is that of a first offence, or whether the accused has returned more than once wrongfully. That of course is a matter which the Court is entitled to take into account in determining the sentence. But at the same time it must be remembered that an order of externment is made in the public interest, and it is a serious offence to ignore that order. The mere fact that it has only been ignored once is not a good reason for imposing a light sentence.

The third factor is the age of the accused, but that is only relevant where the accused is very young or very old, and in this case he is aged thirty.

The fourth factor is the reason which may have prompted the accused to return to Bombay. I agree that if the accused proves conclusively that he had some reason unconnected with any criminal intent, that is a matter which may be taken into account in imposing the sentence. If, for instance, he proves that he came back to Bombay to see his dying mother or something of that sort, any Court would take that into consideration in mitigation of the offence. Nothing of the sort is proved in this case.

The fifth ground is the period of time during which the accused may have remained in custody. That no doubt is a matter to which the Court always pays some regard.

I think, therefore, the principles on which the learned Magistrate says that he is in the habit of acting are correct, except as to the first matter, viz., the character of the convictions which have brought the case within s. 27(2A) of the City of Bombay Police Act, which seems to me to be irrelevant.

In the present case we think that two months' rigorous imprisonment was too little, and we propose to enhance the sentence to nine months' rigorous imprisonment.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 488—Maintenance—Wife and husband living apart—Children living with wife—Refusal by husband to maintain children when living with wife—Whether Magistrate competent to make order for maintenance of children—Practice.

The object of s. 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, is to avoid vagrancy by providing that a Magistrate may up to a limited extent see that a wife and children are maintained by a husband or father able to maintain them.

Where a Magistrate finds that the husband and wife are living apart and the children are living with the wife and the father refuses or neglects to maintain the children where they are living, the Magistrate has jurisdiction to make an order for the maintenance of the children under s. 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898. If the father's case is that the children ought not to be living with the wife, but ought to be living with him or under his direction, then he must take proper proceedings in a civil Court to get the children removed from the custody of the mother, and although such proceedings may sometimes involve expense which a father is unable or unwilling to bear, that cannot deprive the Magistrate of the right to exercise his powers under s. 488. If the civil Court makes an order under which the children cease to reside with the mother, and if the father is then willing to provide for their maintenance, he can then apply to the Magistrate, under s. 489 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to modify his previous order.

APPLICATION for maintenance under s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

One Ebrahim (respondent) was married to Khurshedbai (applicant) in 1918.

On May 24, 1939, the applicant separated from the respondent with her three children who were aged fifteen, ten and seven years respectively.

The applicant filed the present application for separate maintenance alleging that the respondent had turned her out of his house after ill-treating her in various ways. The respondent denied the allegations and stated that her refusal to stay with him was due to the fact that she was living in adultery with one Jamal. At the commencement of the case before the trying Magistrate the respondent made an offer to maintain the applicant if she either came and lived with him or with her brother or sister. The applicant declined these offers.

The learned Magistrate held as a fact that the respondent had not refused or neglected to maintain the applicant and he therefore refused to make any order as to maintenance in favour of the wife. The Magistrate however made an order on the respondent for payment of maintenance to the three children observing as follows :—

“The case of the children however stands on a different footing. It is not the duty of the Court acting under s. 488 as I conceive it to decide questions of guardianship. Section 488 is intended for the relief of temporary distress and for the prevention of vagrancy as is clear from the fact that maximum sum which could be awarded is only Rs. 100/. A child within the meaning of s. 488 means a son or a daughter. Reference to age is purposely omitted, the object being that any son or daughter is entitled to maintenance so long as he or she is unable to maintain himself (See 11 Cr. L. J. 427 and 37 Mad. 565). The Calcutta High Court has also held in the case of Hemanta Kumar Bannerjee v. Manorama Devi, 36 Cr. L. J. 1144, as follows : ‘The word ‘child’ has not been defined in the Criminal Procedure Code. In the absence of any statutory definition or anything contrary to the Act, a child is not a person who is competent to enter into a contract or to enforce any claim under the law.’ There are three children concerned in this case, one is a boy aged 15 years named Ahmed Ibrahim, the other two are girls named Roshan and Mariambi aged 10 and 7 years respectively. These are all children within the meaning of s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code. The respondent says that he will maintain if they are handed over to him. But it has been laid down in 10 Rangoon 486 that a father may apply to the civil Court for the custody of his child but meanwhile he is bound to pay maintenance for the child even though it is living with the mother as the child cannot be made to starve because the father and the mother are living separate... For finer questions of maintenance based on rights of guardianship and custody the parties may go to a civil Court. But the object of s. 488 as I have previously said is to relieve temporary distress. I have got no power to hand over the custody of the son to the father and so far as the girls are concerned the mother is entitled to custody under the Mohamedan law. I have got to take the position as it stands and make an order for maintenance to prevent them from starving.”

The applicant as well as the respondent applied in revision to the High Court.

The trying Magistrate made a report to the High Court under s. 441 of the Criminal Procedure Code raising the question whether in the circumstances of the case the Court can make an order under s. 488 of the Code for maintenance of the children.

The applications were heard together.

BEAUMONT C. J. These are two revision applications, one by the husband and the other by the wife in proceedings under s. 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The parties are Mahomedans, and the husband and wife do not get on, and are at the moment living apart, and three children of the marriage,—a boy of fifteen and two girls of ten and seven—, are in fact living with the wife. The wife applied for maintenance, and the learned Magistrate held as a fact that the respondent had not refused or neglected to maintain her, and, therefore, he refused to make any order as to maintenance in favour of the wife, and in revision we do not see any ground for differing from the learned Magistrate on that question.

The learned Magistrate, however, made an order on the respondent for payment of maintenance to the three children, and the father applies to us to set aside that order. The learned Magistrate has made a report to the Court under s. 441 of the Criminal Procedure Code, because he says that questions of this sort frequently arise. The position being that the husband and wife are in fact living apart, and that the children are in fact living with the wife, the husband says :

"I am not going to maintain the children whilst they are living with my wife. They ought to live with me, and if they come and live with me or with somebody of whom I approve, I will maintain them."

The learned Magistrate raises the question whether in those circumstances the Court under s. 488 can make an order for maintenance of the children. In my opinion, the Court can make an order under such circumstances. Powers under s. 488 are limited. The object of the section, no doubt, is to avoid vagrancy by providing that a Magistrate may up to a limited extent see that a wife and children are maintained by a husband or father able to maintain them. But I think that the Magistrate must take the facts as he finds them to be. If in fact the children are living with the wife, and if in fact the father is refusing or neglecting to maintain them where they are living. I think that the Magistrate has jurisdiction to make an order. If the father's case is that the children ought not to be living with the wife, but ought to be living with him or under his direction, then he must take proper proceedings in a civil Court to get the children removed from the custody of the mother. No doubt, such proceedings may sometimes involve expense, which a father is unable or unwilling to bear, but that cannot deprive the Magistrate of the right to exercise his powers under s. 488. If the civil Court makes an order under which the children cease to reside with the mother, and if the father is then willing to provide for their maintenance, he can, of course, apply to the Magistrate under s. 489 to modify his previous order. But, in my opinion, as long as the children are in fact residing with the wife, and the husband is in fact declining to maintain them, the Magistrate can make an order for their maintenance under s. 488.

We are, therefore, not prepared to differ from the order which the learned Magistrate made.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 526—Transfer of case—Sanction of prosecution by District Magistrate—Trial of case by City Magistrate.

A High Court will not transfer a case from the Court of a Magistrate to the Court of Sessions merely because the Magistrate trying the case is subordinate to the District Magistrate who had sanctioned the prosecution. If, however, there are reasons for thinking that in fact a particular Magistrate was likely to be influenced by the opinion of the District Magistrate, the High Court will not hesitate to transfer the case to the Sessions Court.

TRANSFER of case.

The accused, along with two others, was tried by the Second Class Magistrate of Madha, on a sanction to prosecute granted by the District Magistrate of Sholapur, for an offence punishable under s. 45 of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878. The trial ended in conviction of the accused, each of whom was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25.

The accused appealed against the convictions and sentences to the Court of the District Magistrate of Sholapur, who transferred the appeal to the Court of the City Magistrate of Sholapur for hearing.

The accused applied to the High Court to obtain an order transferring the appeal to the Sessions Court of Sholapur for hearing, on the ground that the City Magistrate was subordinate to the District Magistrate.

* Criminal Application for Transfer No. 471 of 1940.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is a revision application asking for the transfer of an appeal pending before the City Magistrate, Sholapur, and it involves a question of principle. The applicant was convicted under s. 45 of the Bombay Abkari Act, 1878, by a Second Class Magistrate, his prosecution having been sanctioned by the District Magistrate. An appeal lies from the decision of a Second Class Magistrate to the District Magistrate, and the District Magistrate, realising no doubt that it would not be proper for him to hear an appeal in a case in which he had sanctioned the prosecution, transferred the appeal to the City Magistrate of Sholapur.

Beaumont C.J.

It is contended by the applicant that we ought to transfer the appeal to the Sessions Judge of Sholapur on the ground that the City Magistrate is subordinate to the District Magistrate who sanctioned the prosecution. No doubt, the City Magistrate is subordinate technically to the District Magistrate, but in a city like Sholapur there is no reason for supposing that the City Magistrate would be in any way influenced in his decision of a particular case by the views of the District Magistrate. The City Magistrate is in an independent position, and no suggestion is made against his personal impartiality. We think, therefore, that it would not be right for us to transfer the case, as we are not prepared to accept the general principle that no Magistrate subordinate to the District Magistrate can deal with a case in which the District Magistrate has sanctioned prosecution. But at the same time, if there were at any time reasons for thinking that in fact a particular Magistrate was likely to be influenced by the opinion of the District Magistrate, we should not hesitate to transfer the case to the Sessions Court.

The application is rejected.

Section 105 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is a general provision which imposes the burden of bringing himself within an exception upon the person who relies upon the exception; and there is no distinction between a case in which the exception is contained in the body of the statute imposing the prohibition and a case in which it is not so included.

Hence, the accused who relies upon the permission given to him by sub-s. (5) of s. 123 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, has the burden cast upon him to prove that he comes within the terms of the sub-section and is thereby relieved of the liability which is otherwise upon him under sub-s. (7) of the section.

THE accused Dahyabhai owned a house within limits of the Borough Municipality of Ahmedabad.

On May 26, 1938, he asked for permission to make certain additions to his house under s. 123(1) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925.

Thereafter, on May 1, 1939, he submitted a revised plan to the Ahmedabad Municipality in which he sought permission for two projections (i) on the southern side, and (ii) on the western side of his house. No reply was given to the application till June 9, 1939, when the Municipality intimated to the accused that the question of granting permission for the southern side would be considered after the plan regarding the projection of the western side was altered.

The accused, however, started the construction of the projection on the southern side. The Municipality objected but without any effect.

On August 17, 1939, the Municipality filed a complaint against the accused for an offence punishable under s. 123(7) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925.

The Magistrate convicted the accused of the offence charged and sentenced him to pay a fine of Rs. 10.

(a) in case the Chief Officer within one month from the receipt of the notice given under sub-section (1) has neither—

(i) passed orders under sub-section (2) and served notice thereof in respect of the intended work; nor

(ii) issued under sub-section (4) any provisional order or any demand for further particulars;

(b) in case the Chief Officer having issued such demand for and having received such further particulars, has issued no further orders within one month from the receipt of such particulars.

(7) Whoever begins any construction, alteration, addition or reconstruction without giving the notice required by sub-section (1) or without furnishing any plan, information or particulars required by or under this section, or, except as provided in sub-section (5), without awaiting or in any manner contrary to such legal orders of the Chief Officer as may be issued under this section, or contrary to the provisions of sub-section (5) or (6) or in any other respect contrary to the provisions of this Act or of any by-law in force thereunder, shall be punished with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees;....

The Additional Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad being of opinion that the conviction was against law, referred the case to the High Court, observing as follows :—

"The learned trial Magistrate has held that the reply of the Municipality dated June 9, 1939, is an implicit refusal. As will be seen from the order, there is no refusal at all but a refusal to consider the matter. Besides, the order is not given in time."

The reference was heard.

D. V. Patel, for the accused.

J. C. Shah, for the complainant.

No appearance for the Crown.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is a reference made to us by the Additional Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad, wherein he suggests that the conviction of the accused under s. 123(7) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, is illegal and ought to be quashed.

The facts are not in dispute. On May 26, 1938, the accused gave notice under s. 123(1) of the Act that he desired to make certain additions to his house, and permission was granted to him. But then on May 1, 1939, he gave a further notice that he desired to make certain other additions, one on the west side and one on the south side, and on June 9 a reply was sent to him by the Municipality saying that the projection in the west shown in the plan should be removed, and thereafter arrangements would be made for the permission. That was certainly not a refusal of permission to make the erection on the southern side, although no permission was actually given. The accused afterwards made the erection on the southern side, and he was prosecuted under s. 123(7) and convicted and fined Rs. 10.

So far as material, s. 123 provides in sub-s. (1) that before beginning to construct any building, or to alter externally or add to any existing building, notice has to be given by the building owner to the Chief Officer, and under sub-s. (7) whoever begins any construction, alteration, addition or reconstruction without giving the notice required by sub-s. (1), or, except as provided in sub-s. (5), without awaiting the legal orders of the Chief Officer, shall be punished as therein mentioned.

The contention of the accused is that he was not bound to await the orders of the Chief Officer because he came within the exception contained in sub-s. (5), which provides so far as material :—

"A work proposed in a notice given under sub-section (1) may be proceeded with in the manner specified in such notice, provided such manner is not inconsistent with any provision of this Act or of any by-law for the time being in force thereunder in the following cases, namely :—

(a) in case the Chief Officer within one month from the receipt of the notice given under sub-section (1) has not issued any orders in the matter.

It is, no doubt, a fact in this case that the Chief Officer had not issued any notice in the matter, and, therefore, the accused was entitled to proceed with the extension of his house under sub-s. (5), provided that the building was not inconsistent with any provision of the Act or of any by-law.

Mr. Shah for the Municipality says that the building in question is a projection over a street, and is, therefore, prohibited by s. 143. The learned Magistrate seems to have inspected the premises, but there is no finding as to whether the building projects over a public street, and there is no evidence before us on the subject. Therefore, the question arises whether the burden is upon the Municipality to show that the accused's act is inconsistent with any other provision of the Act, or whether the burden is upon the accused to show that his building is not inconsistent with any provision of the Act.

Mr. Patel for the accused relies on a principle, which has been established in English cases, that where an exception is in the enacting clause imposing a prohibition, then the burden is upon the prosecution to prove that the case does not fall within the exception. In The King against Pratten<sup>1</sup> and in Gill against Scrivens<sup>2</sup> that principle was laid down, and the Court in the latter case referred to an earlier case of Jones v. Axen<sup>3</sup> where Treby C. J. stated the rule in this way :—

“The difference is, that where an exception is incorporated in the body of the clause, he who pleads the clause ought also to plead exception; but when there is a clause for the benefit of the pleader, and afterwards follows a proviso which is against him, he shall plead the clause, and leave it to the adversary to shew the proviso.”

That principle was applied in two later cases, Taylor v. Humphries<sup>4</sup> and Davis v. Scarce,<sup>5</sup> to the English Statute 11 & 12 Vic. c. 49. That statute made it an offence for a publican to supply refreshment before a certain hour on Sunday to anyone except travellers, and it was held that in a prosecution under the Act the burden was upon the prosecution to prove that the people supplied were not travellers, and that the burden was not upon the publican to prove that they were travellers. Those cases perhaps may be distinguished on the ground that there was a common law liability of an innkeeper to supply refreshments to those who visited his hotel, and that the prohibition against supplying refreshment on Sunday except to certain persons was in respect of the whole prohibition and exception from the common law liability, and the burden was upon the prosecution to prove that the case did not fall within such exception. However, the cases in the Term Reports seem to establish the principle for which Mr. Patel contends, and, no doubt, in this case the exception does fall within the terms of the section imposing the liability. But in India the rule is as laid down in s. 105 of the Indian Evidence Act, which provides :—

“When a person is accused of any offence, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the General Exceptions in the Indian Penal Code, or within any special exception or proviso contained in any other part of the same Code, or in any law defining the offence, is upon him, and the Court shall presume the absence of such circumstances.”

It seems to me that that is a general provision which imposes the burden of bringing himself within an exception upon the person who relies upon the exception, and there is no distinction between a case in which the exception is contained in the body of the Statute imposing the prohibition and a case in which it is not so included. I think, therefore, that we must hold that in this case, having regard to the terms of s. 105 of the Indian Evidence Act, the burden is upon the accused, who relies upon the permission given to him by sub-s. (5) to prove that he comes within the terms of that sub-section, and is thereby relieved of the liability which is otherwise upon him under sub-s. (7), and as there is no evidence before us that what he has done is not inconsistent with any provision of the Act, the conviction must be upheld.

We, therefore, make no order on the reference.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 94—Summons to produce books of account—Inspection of such books by prosecution—Power of Court to control inspection.

When an application is made to a Court, or to a police-officer in the mofussil, under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the Court is bound to consider whether there is a prima facie case for supposing that the documents are relevant, i.e. whether books of a particular type are likely to have a bearing on the case. If the Court thinks they are, then it can order production. But, such an order for production does not involve an obligation on the Court to give inspection of all the books produced to the complainant, though the Court has power to order such inspection. The Court should consider that question at a later stage of the proceeding, either at the trial or inquiry or on a special application, at which it could hear the accused as well as the complainant, and it should order inspection of only those books which the complainant satisfies it are really relevant.

Judgment of Broomfield and N. J. Wadia JJ., on the point in Central Bank of India, Limited v. Shamdasani,<sup>1</sup> overruled.

RIGHT to inspect documents produced under a summons issued under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

HUSSENBHOY
v.
RASHID

The complainant Rashid Vershi alleged that some time between April 1, 1935, and March 31, 1936, accused Nos. 1 and 2 sold off six-and-a-half per cent. treasury bonds of 1935 of the face value of Rs. 50,000 and four-and-a-half per cent. Government loan of 1955-60 of the face value of Rs. 55,000; that between April 1, 1936, and March 31, 1937, the accused sold off four-and-a-half per cent. Government loan 1955-60 of the face value of Rs. 10,200; and that the accused used the said money in their own business carried on under the name and style of Abdullahhoy Lalji & Co. He, therefore, filed on September 23, 1940, a complaint charging the accused with criminal breach of trust in respect of the above trust money, an offence made punishable under s. 406 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860.

At the same time, the complainant also applied for a summons against the accused, under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, for production of the books of account of the Trust for the years 1933 to date, as also the account books (i.e. ledgers, rojmelis, and nondh-books) of Abdullahhoy Lalji & Co. for the years 1935-1939. The Magistrate issued the summons as also a search warrant which was prayed for.

In execution of the search-warrant about thirty-six books of account and other books of Abdullahhoy Lalji & Co. were produced and taken charge of by the police.

On an application made by the accused, the Magistrate made an order, on October 2, 1940, ordering return to them of the account books of the charity and the accused's firm for the years 1939-40 and 1940-41, and directing that "the remaining books seized under the search-warrant remain in Court until the complainant has taken inspection of the relevant entries." on the following day the complainant's advocate gave a list of account books of which he needed inspection.

When the complainant sought inspection of the books of account detained in Court, the accused again raised objection to the inspection. The Magistrate in disposing of the objection stated as follows :—

"The complainant's advocate has urged that it is impossible to point out any particular entry until he has inspected the books which have been written by the accused and have always been under their control. He has further urged that the complainant has reasonable grounds for apprehending that the money belonging to the charity funds have been credited and debited in various accounts in the books of the accused's firm with a view to misappropriation and unless he takes inspection of the books it will be impossible for him to trace the charity moneys and to bring the charge home to the accused. He has also argued that this Court is bound by a decision of a divisional bench of the Bombay High Court reported in 39 Bom. L. R. 1187, at p. 1192, to the effect that the prosecution is entitled to inspection of all documents produced under a summons issued under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The documents in that case were produced by a third party, namely the Central Bank of India under a summons to produce issued by the learned Magistrate of the 6th Court under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The judgment of the divisional Court was delivered by Broomfield J., who held that an order for production of documents confers by implication a right on the part of the complainant to inspect the documents produced under the order. It is conceded by the learned counsel on both sides that there is no difference in the law relating to the inspection of documents produced under a summons issued under s. 94 or seized under a search-warrant issued under s. 96. In consequence of the said judgment of Broomfield J. the learned Magistrate passed an order in favour of the complainant in that case for inspection of the Bank's books. The Bank appealed from that order and the matter was again considered by a Special Bench of the High Court. The judgment of the Special Bench was delivered by the learned Chief Justice who held that the case did not arise under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code but under the Banker's Books Evidence Act. In the course of his judgment, however, the learned Chief Justice disagreed with the decision of Broomfield J. that the complainant has a right to inspection of documents produced under s. 94...

v.
RASHID

I would like to state very respectfully that I am in complete agreement with the opinion of the learned Chief Justice. The issue of a search warrant is a procedure which is intended by its very nature to be swift and sudden so as to render it impossible in the case of documents for the party who possesses them to conceal or tamper with them before they are produced. In most cases a search-warrant is issued on an ex parte application, and in many cases it is difficult for a Court to decide irrevocably on the relevancy, or the necessity of giving inspection, of documents without hearing the party to whom the documents belong. Such a law, as envisaged by the learned Chief Justice, may, in certain circumstances, cause incalculable damage to the mercantile community....

A consideration of the effect of s. 94 was not necessary for the determination of the case decided by the Special Bench. The case was actually decided under the provisions of the Banker's Books Evidence Act. The result in my opinion is that although the authority of the judgment of the Division Bench has been considerably undermined by the judgment of the Special Bench it has not been overruled by it. In fact it is not denied as a matter of law that a decision of the Appeal Court of the Bombay High Court cannot be overruled or set aside except by a full bench or by the Privy Council. I am therefore bound by the judgment of the Divisional Bench, and, in my opinion, I have no power to refuse inspection to the complainant of the accused's books seized under the search-warrant issued on September 23, 1940."

The accused applied against the order to the High Court under its revision jurisdiction.

The bench in issuing a rule observed that "this case will require a Full Bench."

On February 3, 1941, when the case was placed before a bench consisting of Beaumont C. J. and Macklin J., their Lordships ordered that it should be heard by a full bench.

Accordingly, the case was heard by a full bench consisting of Beaumont C. J., and Divatia and Macklin JJ. on February 7, 1941.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga. The question that arises here is, whether a Magistrate after he issues a search-warrant under s. 96 of the Criminal Procedure Code and the books are produced in his Court, has any right to control their inspection by the other side. The Magistrate has held, following the judgment of Broomfield J. reported in Central Bank of India, Limited v. Shamdassani,<sup>1</sup> that as soon as documents or books of account are produced in Court, the Magistrate has no option but to allow inspection of them by the other side.

There is no provision in the Criminal Procedure Code for discovery and inspection; but by reason of sub-s. (3) of s. 94 the Judges have held that even in a criminal case inspection can be given. Section 96 of the Code is in effect the same as s. 94. The word "inspection" in s. 96 has been held to mean inspection of premises or locality : Mahomed Jackariah & Co. v. Ahmed Mahomed.<sup>1</sup>

I submit that when you invoke the assistance of the Court for inspection of documents the Court has control over the inspection. Here, the other side desires to have inspection of our books of account which have no bearing on the subject-matter of complaint. There is a suit pending between the accused and his nephew in the High Court as regards the Indo-Aden Salt Works, and inspection of account-books of these Works is sought probably for the ends of the suit in the High Court. In the matter of the present complaint there is very little to be done by inspection. We admit that we have sold the war bonds of the value of Rs. 1 lac which were purchased for investing charity funds and that the proceeds of the bonds are credited to the accounts of the firm. The prosecution will gain nothing by inspection of our books.

The judgment of Broomfield J. if properly considered amounts to obiter. The learned Judge said that s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code was not controlled by s. 6 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1891. The observations of the Chief Justice in that case are also obiter. I submit that there is no warrant for the proposition that the prosecution has the right to inspect the books of the accused as soon as they are produced in Court under a search-warrant.

In In re Lakshmidas<sup>2</sup> the Court said (p. 982): "The question whether the production of a particular document or book is necessary or desirable for the purposes of any trial is one which must be decided by the Magistrate before he orders the production and in determining that question he has to exercise his discretion judicially in the sense that he must satisfy himself that the document or book has a bearing upon and is relevant to the case. When he has so satisfied himself, his jurisdiction to order its production comes into play and that carries with it the jurisdiction to allow the prosecution the right of inspection." The Court there relied upon Mahomed Jackariah & Co. v. Ahmed Mahomed,<sup>3</sup> the main argument in which was that the Criminal Procedure Code gave no right of discovery. All that the case says is that the Magistrate has power to give inspection of documents and books brought into Court under a search-warrant. It stands to reason that when a party invokes the assistance of the Court to produce books into Court and the books are so produced, the Magistrate must also have the power to control inspection of the books.

I submit that the judgment of the special bench in Central Bank of India v. Shamdasani is correct, and that the Magistrate has the right to consider of what documents he would allow inspection.

P. L. Thacker. It is not correct to say that I want inspection of all books belonging to the accused. What I ask for is the inspection of a few accounts in the books of account for the years 1934 to 1939 of the firm of Hussein-bhoy Lalji & Co. My case is that the trustees have misappropriated the charity money. This will appear from the entries in the rojmel, how these entries are posted in the ledger, and how they are dealt with in the moudh. Altogether I require inspection of about six or seven accounts. In the trial Court, I have already given a list of relevant accounts. I am not in a position to give a list of relevant entries, but I can only specify relevant accounts. The Magistrate has already heard arguments as to the relevancy of these accounts before he passed the final order.

Our case is that the charity money was misapplied in the years 1935-36 and 1936-37. These are wide dates. The above-mentioned accounts therefore become relevant to show when exactly the misappropriation took place. The inspection of the accounts will show how the charity money was ultimately utilised. The Magistrate has allowed inspection of only those documents mentioned in the letter of the complainant's advocate, dated October 3, 1940.

Regarding the case of Central Bank of India, Limited v. Shamdasani,<sup>1</sup> the other side has admitted that the remarks of the special bench in that case as regards s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code are obiter.

Three things are requisite under s. 94. First, the documents of which production is sought must be distinctly specified. Secondly, such documents must have reference to the inquiry or trial. Thirdly, before the Magistrate issues a summons or a search-warrant he must exercise judicial discretion in the matter. In the present case, all the three conditions are fulfilled.

In Mahomed Jackariah & Co. v. Ahmed<sup>2</sup> the Magistrate had ordered inspection of books produced, and the inspection was taken. The High Court upheld the order for inspection. The case says that the moment the books are produced a private prosecutor is in the same position as the prosecuting police. The police may then call for the books or seize them under the powers given to them by the Criminal Procedure Code or the Bombay City Police Act, 1902. There is no section in the Criminal Procedure Code or in the Bombay City Police Act to say that the books of account once produced are not to be inspected by the police. To say that I must specify the entries in the accounts before I can inspect the accounts would be putting the cart before the horse.

In In re Lakshmidas<sup>3</sup> the Court remarked (p. 982): "Further, if the Legislature did not intend by s. 94 that the right to inspection should follow as a necessary consequence of the production ordered under it, the production of such document or book before the Court at any trial must cease to have any value." This remark means that when once the books are produced the inspection of relevant accounts should be given. First of all, the Magistrate considers the relevancy of books to be produced before an order is made, and, secondly, after the books are produced, he may hear both the parties before inspection is given.

As distinguished from the case of Central Bank of India v. Shamdasani, in the present case no third party—and that a bank—is involved. The books belonging to the accused alone are produced. The object of the prosecution is to protect charity.

 HUSSENBHOY LALJI v. RASHID VERSHI

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an application in revision against an order made by the Presidency Magistrate, 2nd Additional Court, Mazagaon, granting inspection of documents.

The case is one in which the accused are charged with criminal breach of trust in relation to certain charitable funds, which it is alleged that they have improperly applied in their business. We are not in any way concerned with the merits of the prosecution case. On September 23, 1940, the learned Magistrate issued a search warrant, and also issued a summons for production of documents, which were specified in the complainant's application and include various accounts relating to this charity and also the books of account, that is to say ledgers, rojmelis and nondh books, for five years of the firm of Abdullabhoy Lalji & Co., which is the accused firm. Subsequently, the complainant wrote to the accused's attorneys claiming inspection of a large number of these documents, and an application was then made to the learned Magistrate asking him to order that the complainant has a right to such inspection.

The learned Magistrate took the view that he was bound by a decision of this Court in a revision application on a complaint filed by Shamdasani against the auditors of the Central Bank reported under Central Bank of India, Limited v. Shamdasani<sup>1</sup> to give such inspection without considering the relevance of the particular documents. The learned Magistrate considered that in that case this Court had held that, where an order for production of documents is made under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the complainant, whether the Crown or a private complainant, is entitled as of right to inspect those documents, and that the order of the Court for production involves allowing inspection. The learned Magistrate, against his own view of the law, considered that he was bound to follow that decision. That decision was discussed by a special bench of this Court on an application made in the same matter by the Central Bank, who had not been a party to the prior application, and the special bench undoubtedly expressed a view opposed to that which had been taken by the earlier bench; but, as the learned Magistrate rightly points out, the views of the special bench were obiter dicta because the decision turned on the Banker's Books Evidence Act, and not on the Criminal Procedure Code. In our view, assuming that this Court in the earlier case did hold that an order for production made under s. 94 of the Code involves as a necessary consequence a right on the part of the complainant to inspect all the books produced, the decision goes too far, much further than the decision of this Court in In re Lakhmidas,<sup>2</sup> which the Court purported to follow.

We think the true view is that, when an application is made to a Court, or to a police-officer in the mofussil, under s. 94 for production of documents, the Court is bound to consider whether there is a prima facie case for supposing that the documents are relevant. Obviously, if the accused is charged with a crime of violence, it is very unlikely that his business books will have any relevance on the matter. On the other hand, if he is charged with criminal breach of trust in matters relating to his business, it is probable that a considerable number of his business books will be relevant. But all that the Magistrate or the police-officer can do, when an application for production of books is made, which is usually ex parte, is to consider whether books of a particular type are likely to have a bearing on the matter. If he thinks they are, then he can order production; and, of course, his decision may be influenced by a desire to prevent the books being taken away or tampered with. But I am quite unable to agree that such an order for production involves an obligation on the Court to give inspection of all the books produced to the complainant, though I do not doubt that the Court has power to order such inspection. The Magistrate must consider that question at a later stage of the proceeding, either at the trial or inquiry, or on a special application, at which he can hear the accused as well as the complainant, and he should only order inspection of those books which the complainant satisfies him are really relevant.

Beaumont C.J.

The learned Magistrate, therefore, in this case should have applied his mind to the question whether the inspection of these documents is relevant to the complainant's case. He has not done so, because he considered the decision of this Court precluded him from doing so. We think the decision of this Court, in the case of Shamdasani against the auditors of the Central Bank above referred to if it went so far as that, was wrong and must be overruled. The learned Magistrate must apply his mind to the question whether the documents, of which inspection is sought, are relevant or not.

The applicant made a complaint to the police against the opponent for an offence under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, on which the police started investigation, arrested the opponent, and released him on bail. Subsequently, the police applied to a Magistrate to have the bail enlarged, which was done. After further investigation into the matter the police reported to the Magistrate that no offence was disclosed against the opponent, whereupon the Magistrate discharged the opponent and cancelled his bail-bond. case against the applicant for an offence under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code :—

Held, that in doing what he had done the Magistrate had taken cognizance of the case under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, and that, therefore, under the provisions of s. 195 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, it was that Magistrate alone who could lodge the complaint for an offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code.

COMPLAINT of false charge.

On May 14, 1940, the applicant J. D. Boywalla lodged a complaint against the opponent Sorabji Rustomji Engineer, for an offence punishable under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, before the Sub-Inspector of Police in the Lamington Road Police Station.

The Sub-Inspector entertained the complaint, arrested the opponent and released him on bail. On May 16, 1940, the police put up the opponent before the Presidency Magistrate, Third Additional Court, Girgaum, for extension of bail, which was granted. The police again put up the accused on May 29, 1940, before the Magistrate on a report, which was accepted by the Magistrate. The Magistrate discharged the opponent and cancelled the bail-bond.

On June 24, 1940, the opponent filed a complaint before the same Magistrate against the applicant, charging him with an offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, for filing a false complaint against him under s. 420 of the Code. A summons was served on the applicant on October 12, 1940. The prosecution led preliminary evidence, and the Magistrate framed a charge against the applicant on November 21, 1940.

On November 28, 1940, the applicant filed another complaint before the same Magistrate charging the opponent with an offence under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, on the same facts as before. The Magistrate ordered notice to be issued to the opponent.

On December 3, 1940, the applicant applied to the Magistrate for a stay of the case against him under s. 211, but the application was rejected by the Magistrate.

The applicant then applied to the High Court for an order quashing the proceedings against him.

T. S. Vyas, with A. B. Acharya, for the accused.

H. R. Pardiwalla, with M. B. Sakhalakar, for the complainant.

R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an application in revision made by one J. D. Boywalla, who asks us to quash a complaint lodged against him under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code. The case is a good illustration of the way in which the time of the criminal Courts and of the police in Bombay is wasted by the foolish behaviour of some of its citizens.

The facts are that Mr. Boywalla had got a motor car, as I understand, for the first time in his life, and he took the motor car to a garage, which belonged to the opponent, either alone or with partners, in order to have it painted and repaired. His case is that when he went to get his car back from the garage, the opponent told him that the battery had not been properly charged, although Mr. Boywalla says that he had recently had it charged. However, the opponent said that the battery required to be recharged, and that it had been recharged by him, for which a sum of Rs. 3 was payable, and Mr. Boywalla paid the three rupees. But then he found that his car would not start. The opponent in the meantime had gone out and was not available. So, after waiting for about an hour, Mr. Boywalla jumped to the conclusion that he had been cheated by the opponent in respect of the three rupees. He assumed that because the car would not start, the battery had not been charged as the opponent alleged, though any practical motorist knows that there are many other reasons which may account for a motor refusing to start. So Mr. Boywalla rushed off to the police and lodged a complaint against the opponent of cheating in respect of these three rupees, his case being that he had been induced to part with the money by the opponent's fraudulent and false statement that the battery had been charged. The police authorities, instead of telling him to go away and not to be silly, started investigation and arrested the opponent and released him on bail, and subsequently applied to the learned Magistrate of the Girgaon Police Court to have the bail enlarged, and an order to that effect was made. The police then investigated further into the matter, and eventually on May 29 the Police Sub-Inspector made a report to the learned Magistrate saying :

" I beg to place before Your Worship the marginally noted accused person who was arrested by the Police on 8-5-40 at about 2-0 P.M. u/s 420 of I. P. Code. He was released on bail the same day and his bail period was extended till to-day. As however no offence has been disclosed against him it is requested that he be discharged and his bail bond cancelled."

On that the learned Magistrate passed an order :

" Accused discharged. Bail bond cancelled. Deposit to be returned."

Subsequently the opponent filed a case against Mr. Boywalla under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, which provides that whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person, institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person, shall be punished. Obviously it may be difficult to prove that Mr. Boywalla knew that there was no just or lawful ground for his proceeding. I very much doubt whether he had the slightest idea as to what was necessary in order to secure a conviction for cheating under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code. His conduct in lodging the complaint was, I think, most irresponsible, but whether an offence could be proved under s. 211 is problematical.

However, the point of law taken on behalf of Mr. Boywalla is that it is the Magistrate who must lodge the complaint under the provisions of s. 195 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code. That section provides, so far as material, that no Court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any Court, except on the complaint in writing of such Court. The complaint here is not lodged by the learned Magistrate, and I should think it very unlikely that the learned Magistrate would consent to lodge a complaint in such a trivial matter.

The question, however, is whether the making of this alleged false charge was committed in, or in relation to, a proceeding in Court. It is contended on behalf of the opponent that the order made by the learned Magistrate extending bail, and subsequently discharging the accused and cancelling his bail bond, was an administrative order, and not a judicial order, since the Magistrate never considered the merits of the case. I am quite unable to accept that argument. Indeed, it is a novelty to me to hear it suggested that there is any authority which can make an administrative order discharging an arrested person from judicial custody. This man had been arrested, and released on bail, and, in my opinion, the only authority which could release him from custody, or from being on bail, was a Magistrate or Judge acting judicially, and I have no doubt whatever that the learned Magistrate acted, and intended to act, as a Magistrate in a judicial capacity.

But then it is contended both by the opponent and by the learned Government Pleader that there is no power under the Criminal Procedure Code for a Magistrate to discharge an arrested person, without having taken cognizance of the case, or a mere report of a police-officer, and it is said that here the learned Magistrate had not taken cognizance of the case. The logical result of that argument, if it were to prevail, would be, not that the order of discharge was an administrative order, but that it was an invalid order, and the accused still remained on bail. In my opinion, however, there is no force in the argument.

Under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code a Presidency Magistrate may take cognizance of any offence upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence, or upon a report in writing of such facts made by a police-officer, or upon information received from any person other than a police-officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed. Section 204 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that if, in the opinion of a Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence, there is sufficient ground for proceeding, then he can proceed either by summons or warrant as therein mentioned. The wording of that section seems to suggest that there may be a case in which the Magistrate has taken cognizance, but in which, in his opinion, there is no sufficient ground for proceeding; and it is quite true that the Criminal Procedure Code does not provide what is to happen in that case. But it seems to me to follow by necessary implication that the Magistrate must in such a case discharge the accused. If he is not prepared to proceed further, and the accused is under arrest and before him, he must necessarily discharge him. There is no other course open to the Magistrate; the accused cannot be left indefinitely in custody or on bail. There is nothing that I know of in the Procedure Code which suggests that such a course is not legal. When, in the case of a man who has been arrested and released on bail the police-officer reports that there appears to be no case, and invites the Magistrate to discharge the man, the Magistrate is not bound to act upon the police view. He can undoubtedly say: "I will have a further inquiry in this matter. I think the police are wrong in suggesting that the accused should be discharged." And he may direct further investigation. On the other hand, I have no doubt that he may say: "I have no reason for thinking that the report of this police-officer, who is a responsible person, is wrong, and if he tells me that after investigation he thinks there is no case, I will do as he suggests and discharge the accused." But in either case the Magistrate is taking cognizance of the case. He cannot discharge the accused, or direct a further investigation, unless he first takes cognizance. The learned Magistrate in discharging the accused is making an order similar in character to the order which he can make under s. 203 of the Criminal Procedure Code, where he acts on a report of the police or an investigation undertaken at his request. If after considering the report he thinks that there is no sufficient ground for proceeding, he may discharge the accused. Although the Code does not expressly so provide, I have no doubt that a Magistrate can act upon the report of a police-officer as to the result of a police inquiry undertaken under the Code in accordance with the powers conferred upon the police, and can discharge an accused person without further inquiry. But in such a case the order of the Magistrate is a judicial order, which would be open to review by this Court.

In my opinion, therefore, the alleged false charge in this case was made in, or in relation to, a proceeding in Court. It resulted in the man being actually arrested and brought before the Magistrate and dealt with by the Magistrate. Therefore, the complaint must be that of the Magistrate, and as there is no such complaint, the proceedings must be quashed.

The Borough Municipality of Broach framed by-laws under s. 61 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, one of which made it compulsory for traders in fire-wood and charcoal to obtain licenses for carrying on their trade, but prescribed no fee for the grant of such licenses. Subsequently the Municipality, with the sanction of Government, framed, in the exercise of the power given to it by the provisions of s. 58 (j) of the Act, a new rule (r. 208 (a)), under which it levied a yearly license fee, not only in respect of storing wood, coal and charcoal, but also for the manufacture and sale of sweetmeats, the object of the levy being to enable the Municipality to meet educational expenses.

The plaintiffs, who respectively were traders in fire-wood and charcoal and manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats and confectionary, and carried on their business within the municipal limits of Broach, sued for a declaration that the Municipality had no right to recover from them any sum under the pretext of license fees. The lower Courts having held that the levy was legal, the plaintiffs appealed :—

Held, (1) that, under s. 90 (1) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, the question of charging license fees would arise when a license was granted, and a license could only be granted if the law required a license to be granted ;

(2) that there was no provision in the Act requiring persons carrying on the trades enumerated in its s. 186 (1) to apply for and obtain a license, that under the scheme of the Act it was left to the discretion of the Municipality to so require them, that the Municipality might, by framing the necessary by-laws, require any trade to be carried on under a license, and that the section therefore provided a penalty for using a place for a trade without a license only when the by-laws provided for obtaining a license ;

(3) that the object for which a fee or tax was levied by a public body did not serve necessarily as a guide for saying whether an imposition was a " fee " or " tax " ;

(4) that merely because the Municipality before making the rule had in a public notification indicated the object for which it was to be applied (viz., to meet educational expenses), that would not render the formality observed in passing the rule unsuitable or unauthorised ;

(5) that inasmuch as the by-laws provided for a license to be taken in the case of storage of fire-wood and charcoal, the Municipality was competent to make rules prescribing the fee to be charged for such license ;

(6) but that as regards the manufacture and sale of sweetmeats the Municipality not having first made a by-law insisting upon a license and then framed a rule prescribing a fee under s. 58 (j) of the Act, the levy of fees upon the manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats was not in accordance with law.

SUITS for declaration and injunction.

These were two suits against the Broach Borough Municipality. Sorabji and another, the plaintiffs in one suit, were dealers in fire-wood and charcoal : the plaintiffs in the other suit were manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats. Both sets of plaintiffs carried on their business within the municipal limits of Broach.

The Municipality, under the powers given to it by s. 61 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, framed by-laws, one of which made it compulsory for traders in fire-wood and charcoal to take out a license for carrying on their trade within the municipal limits. There was no by-law laying a like obligation on manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats.

On February 7, 1933, the Municipality issued a public notice to the effect that it intended to add a new rule (viz., r. 208A) and to impose under it an annual license fee with respect to certain trades in order to make up the enhanced expenditure on education. Objections were invited to the levy of the fees, and the plaintiffs offered their objections to the levy. On May 13, 1933, the Municipality resolved to enact the proposed rule ; and obtained sanction of Government to it on July 2, 1933. The Municipality thereupon passed a resolution on August 6, 1934, for recovering license fee at the rate of Rs. 12 a year from traders in fire-wood and charcoal, and a fee of Rs. 25 per year from the manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats, with effect from October 1, 1934.

SORABJI
LAKDAVALA
v.
BROACH MU-

On September 29, 1934, the plaintiffs filed two suits against the Municipality to obtain a declaration that the Municipality was not entitled to recover license fee from them, and for an injunction restraining it from recovering the fee. They alleged that it was the declared object of the Municipality to impose a tax for meeting its expenditure in other departments and not simply to raise money for meeting the costs of the supervision of the trades on which the fee was sought to be levied; that it had no power to levy it without observing the formalities prescribed by law for imposing a new tax; and that it had not observed all the formalities which were required by law before levying such a fee.

The Municipality contended inter alia that the resolution passed by it for levying the license-fee was legal and it had authority to pass it; that it had duly obtained the sanction of Government required for it; that the distinction sought to be drawn between a license-fee and a tax was against law; that the Municipality had the right to make use of the taxes or fees which it recovered; that a license fee was also a kind of tax and was included in the term tax; and that the fees sought to be imposed on the plaintiffs' trade were inadequate and nominal.

The trial Judge held that the Municipality had a legal right to levy the fees in question, and dismissed the suits.

On appeal, the District Judge came to the same conclusion and held that the amounts in dispute were levied as a fee and not as a tax, that the Municipality had a legal right to levy it and it had followed the necessary formalities prescribed by law in respect of it; and that the amount levied was neither unreasonable nor ultra vires.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

R. J. Thakor, with Pochaji Jamshedji, for the appellants (fire-wood merchants).

M. B. Dave, with Pochaji Jamshedji, for the appellants (sweetmeat sellers).

S. M. Shah, with V. T. Gambhirwalla, for the respondent.

WASSOODU J. These two appeals arise from the judgments of the District Judge of Broach. The dispute relates to the legality of the levy of license fees from the appellants under a rule which is No. 208 (a) passed by the Broach City Municipality and sanctioned by Government on July 2, 1934. The plaintiffs, in the two suits Nos. 330 and 331 of 1934, from which these appeals arise, are respectively traders in fire-wood and charcoal, and manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats and confectionary, and carry on their business within the Broach Borough Municipal limits. They alleged that the Municipality proposed to levy yearly a license fee according to the new rule upon their trade and claimed a declaration that the Municipality had no right to recover any sum whatever from them under the pretext of license fees particularly when the avowed object of the levy was to enable

A. C. J. the Municipality to meet educational expenses. They also claimed injunction 1940. against the Municipality preventing that body from recovering those fees.
 — The Courts below have held that the levy was legal, and in consequence the SORABJI suits were dismissed with costs. Against those decrees the plaintiffs have LAKDAVALA brought these two appeals.
 v.
 BROACH MU- It seems to me that the case of the plaintiffs who are dealers in fire-wood NICIPALITY and charcoal can be distinguished from the other case in which the plaintiffs — are manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats and confectionary. It will be Wassoodew J. convenient to deal with the case of the former plaintiffs first.

It is common ground that under the by-laws framed by the Municipality under s. 61 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), it is necessary, only for traders in fire-wood and charcoal to obtain licenses for carrying on their trade. No fee was prescribed for the grant of such licenses until the new rule, which is distinct from a by-law, was framed in 1934. That rule which is rule No. 208 (a) of the Broach City Municipality provides as follows :—

* * * * *

“License fees shall be chargeable per year for every license issued for—

* * * * *

(9) Storing wood, coal, charcoal.

* * * * *

(11) Manufacture and sale of sweetmeats.”

Against each item the amount of annual license fee is given in the column of the fees prescribed. For the one in serial No. 9 above the annual fee is Rs. 12 and for serial No. 11, Rs. 25. Now, that rule is made in the exercise of the power given to the Municipality by the provisions of s. 58 (j) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act. That section authorises the Municipality to make rules not inconsistent with the Act prescribing the taxes to be levied in the municipal borough for municipal purposes, and the fees to be charged for licenses or permissions granted under s. 90. Section 90 (1) provides as follows :—

“When any license is granted under this Act, or when permission is given thereunder for making any temporary erection or for putting up any projection, or for the temporary occupation of any public street or other land vested in the municipality, the authority granting or giving such license or permission may charge a fee for the same.”

That seems to be the only provision in the Act authorising the Municipality to charge license fees. Obviously the question of charging fees must arise when a license is granted. And a license could only be granted if the law requires a license to be granted. It is not claimed that all trades must be carried on under a municipal license. That is also made clear in the penal provisions of the statute. Section 186, sub-s. (4), provides as follows :—

“Whoever uses without a license or during the suspension or after the withdrawal of a license, any place for any purpose mentioned in sub-section (1) in any municipal borough in which by-laws are for the time being in force prescribing the conditions on or subject to which, the circumstances in which, and the areas or localities in respect of which, licenses for such use may be granted, refused, suspended or withdrawn, shall be punished with fine.” ...

In sub-s. (1) of that section the following provision occurs :—

"If it be shown to the satisfaction of the standing committee that any building or place used or intended by any person to be used—

- * * * * *
- (n) for storing hay, straw, fodder, wood, coal or other combustible material,
- * * * * *
- (p) for the manufacture or sale of sweetmeats,

- the standing committee may by written notice require the owner or occupier—
- (i) at once to discontinue the use of, or at once to desist from carrying out or allowing to be carried out the intention so to use, such building or place, or
- (ii) to use it in such manner or after such structural alterations as the standing committee in such notice prescribes, so that it may not become, or may be no longer, a nuisance or dangerous."

There is no provision in the Act requiring the persons carrying on the above trades to apply for and obtain a license. Whether they should be so required is left to the discretion of the Municipality under the scheme of the Act; and the Municipality may by framing the necessary by-laws require any trade to be carried on under a license. Accordingly a penalty is provided for using a place for a trade without a license when the by-laws provide for obtaining a license. In the case of the fire-wood dealer the by-laws, as I have said, provide that a license should be taken. If so, the Municipality was competent to make rules prescribing the fee to be charged for such license. Prima facie, therefore, the action of the Municipality would be justified.

But it is urged that the action of the Municipality was irregular, if not illegal, because they could not raise revenue for general purposes under the guise of imposing license fees, for it is said that different formalities are laid down for levying a tax and a license fee, and as the avowed object of the Municipality was to supplement the income for educational purposes, this imposition was no other than a tax. That argument, in my opinion, is not altogether well founded. Counsel has relied upon Emperor v. Brij Mohan Lal<sup>1</sup> for the view that license fees are quite distinct from taxes and the one cannot be levied in the name of the other for they are distinguishable and the levy of each must be preceded by the requisite formalities. That case would not serve as authority for the obvious reason that the Court was dealing with an entirely different enactment. I readily concede that the law regulating the procedure and formality for the imposition of either a fee or a tax must be strictly observed before the levy can be regularized or rendered legal. It is evident that the procedure in regard to the levy of a fee is intended by the Act to be different from the procedure in regard to the levy of a tax (see ss. 58 and 75). "Tax" is defined in s. 3 (20) of the Act as—the definition is not exhaustive—meaning "any toll, rate, cess, fee or other impost leviable under this Act and shall include a water rate." Apart from the procedural difference there is a very subtle distinction if any between "tax" and "fee" as used in the ordinary sense. When imposed by the legislature or local bodies both are burdens or charges upon persons and property, and the object of both is to raise money for a public purpose or to

A. C. J. . serve some public object. So then, the object for which a fee or tax is levied 1940 by a public body would not serve necessarily as a guide for saying whether an imposition is a "fee" or "tax."

As I have pointed out above, the levy of license fee is the subject of special procedure in the statute and it is sufficient to say that the formalities prescribed have been gone through in making the rule. Merely because the Municipality before making the rule had in a public notification indicated the object for which it was to be applied—here it was said "to cope with the increased expenditure of the education department"—it would not in my opinion render the formality observed unsuitable or unauthorised. That the object of the application of a fee or tax does not determine the procedure is evident from the definition of "Municipal fund" in s. 65 of the Act and particularly proviso (b) thereof. Under the term "Municipal fund" is included all taxes, fines and penalties paid or levied under the Act. The definition is comprehensive enough to include fees, for the proceeds of all impositions levied constitute municipal fund. The Municipality is also given power in proviso (b); to set apart any portion of the municipal fund for a particular purpose, such as for schools or dispensaries, subject to the Commissioner's approval, and to apply any sums properly so credited exclusively to the special purposes for which such sums were received or set apart. Therefore the object is not the determinative factor in observing the formality for the levy.

It is argued that as a tax for educational requirements will fall under the special head under s. 73 (xiii) of the Act, namely, "special educational tax", any imposition intended to be applied for education must be imposed in the manner in which a tax is imposed and the procedure in s. 75 of the Act should have been followed. Section 73 does not say that the liability of the Municipality for education must be met wholly out of the special education tax. I therefore do not think there is any substance in that objection. If the by-laws of the Municipality require a license to carry on a particular trade or business and the Municipality frames a rule prescribing a fee for granting such a license, and it is not proved that it is unreasonable, the levy in the case of the traders in fire-wood and charcoal would be legitimate and must be upheld notwithstanding the fact that it may happen that the incidence may affect particular trades or professions. Accordingly Second Appeal No. 33 of 1939 must be dismissed with costs.

Turning then to the case of the appellants who are manufacturers and sellers of sweetmeats, it appears that prior to r. 208 (a) no license was issued to such sellers. It also appears that no by-law was ever framed by the Municipality requiring a seller or manufacturer of sweetmeats to obtain a license. Undoubtedly the Municipality has power to frame within its discretion such a by-law under s. 61. That section provides as follows :—

"(1) A municipality may from time to time, with the previous sanction of the Provincial Government, make, alter or rescind by-laws not inconsistent with this Act—

* * * * *

(b) prescribing the conditions on or subject to which and the circumstances in which and the areas or localities in respect of which, licenses may be granted, refused, suspended or withdrawn for the use of any place not belonging to the municipality—

A. C. J.
1941

- (ii) for the manufacture, preparation, storing, sale or supply for the purpose of trade of any article or thing intended for human food or drink, whether such food or drink is to be consumed in such place or not ;
- (iii) for any of the purposes mentioned in sub-section (1) of section 186 (to which reference is already made); ...”

SORABJI
v.
BROACH MU-NICIPALITY

As I have pointed out s. 186 (1) provides for regulating the storing of fire-wood and other combustible material and for the manufacture or sale of sweetmeats. In the absence of any by-law in that respect, there would be no obligation to take out a license. The Municipality in order to fortify its right to levy a fee from the sweetmeat seller has first to make a by-law insisting upon a license and then frame a rule prescribing a fee under s. 58 (j) of the Act. It will not be sufficient to rely upon s. 90 in the absence of a by-law, for obviously the party need not take out a license, and there would be no power in the Municipality to punish him for that omission. Therefore Second Appeal No. 34 of 1939 filed by the plaintiffs-sweetmeat sellers must be allowed and the lower Courts' decrees set aside. There shall be a decree in the plaintiffs' favour in terms of the prayer in the plaint with costs throughout.

Joshi watan land—Inalienability of such land—Hindu law—Joint family—Manager—Alienation of Joshi watan lands.

Joshi service watan land, held under a sanad in the ordinary form used for grants of land given in return for services to be rendered to a village community, are inalienable and not liable to be sold in execution of a decree against the holder of the lands.

The manager of a joint Hindu family cannot bind other members of the family by an alienation of coparcenary land which is not alienable.

SUIT for declaration.

Krishnaji (plaintiff) was the son of Dattambhat (defendant No. 2). They were undivided, and held certain lands, one of which (survey No. 207, plot No. 1) was Joshi service watan land, which was granted by a sanad for the performance of Joshi (priestly) services in the village of Nainglaj.

v.

PARAPPA

In 1922 defendant No. 2 mortgaged the watan land to Datto (defendant No. 1).

In 1928 defendant No. 1 sued (Suit No. 753 of 1928) defendant No. 2 on the mortgage, and obtained a decree for realisation of the money by sale of the land. In 1933, defendant No. 1 applied to execute his decree (darkhast No. 253 of 1933). Defendant No. 2 put in an objection in the darkhast that the lands being watan lands could not be sold in execution; but the objection was overruled.

On March 30, 1935, the plaintiff sued for a declaration that the suit land being Joshi watan land was not liable to be sold in execution of a decree.

The trial Judge held that the present suit was barred by res judicata under s. 11, expln. iv, of the Civil Procedure Code, by reason of the omission of defendant No. 2 to plead the alienability of the land in the first suit so far as regards the share of defendant No. 2 in the land was concerned, that the land was non-transferable and inalienable, that the debt in suit was contracted by defendant No. 2 for legal necessity, and that the share of defendant No. 2 in the watan land was liable to be sold in execution of the mortgage decree. Defendant No. 1 died during the pendency of the suit.

On appeal, the Assistant Judge held that it was not open to the plaintiff to contend that the watan property was not alienable, that it was not proved that the property was not alienable, and that it was open to the representatives of defendant No. 1 to proceed against the property. The suit was therefore dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

R. A. Jahagirdar, Government Pleader, for the appellant.

B. D. Belvi, for respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

BEAUMONT C. J. This is an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Judge of Belgaum. The material facts are that defendant No. 2 and the plaintiff are father and son, members of a joint family, and part of the coparcenary property consists of some Joshi service inam land. In the year 1922 defendant No. 2, as manager of the family, mortgaged this Joshi service inam land to defendant No. 1 for Rs. 300. In 1928 defendant No. 1 obtained a mortgage decree against defendant No. 2, and in 1933 defendant No. 1 issued a darkhast and obtained an order for sale of this property. In March, 1935, the plaintiff filed the present suit asking for a declaration that the Joshi service inam land is inalienable and not liable to be sold in execution of the decree of defendant No. 1, and he asked for an injunction restraining defendant No. 1 from selling any portion of the land in execution of the decree. The learned trial Judge held that the land was inalienable but that defendant No. 2 was estopped from raising the point by virtue of the decree which had been obtained against him, and accordingly the learned Judge made a declaration that the plaintiff's joint half share in the suit land was not liable to sale in execution of the decree and that defendant No. 2's joint half share in the suit land was liable for sale. What exactly that order amounts to, I am not sure. The property being joint, all that sale of defendant No. 2's interest would amount to ultimately would be a right to the purchaser to apply for partition of the property, and having got partition, he could then sell defendant No. 2's share. In appeal the learned Assistant Judge held that the property was not inalienable and also that the plaintiff was bound by the decree obtained against defendant No. 2, the manager of the property, and he dismissed the plaintiff's suit. From that order this appeal is brought.

On the first question as to whether this land is alienable or not, it seems to me clear that under the sanad, by which Government granted the land, it is made inalienable. The sanad is in the ordinary form used for grants of land given in return for services to be rendered to a village community, and such lands are normally rendered inalienable. This Court in an unreported case, Narayanbhat Gundbhat Joshi v. Vishnu Abarao Mahajan,<sup>1</sup> dealing with a sanad in the same terms as the present sanad, held that the land was inalienable, and I feel no doubt that that decision is right. Act XV of 1895, to which the learned Government Pleader referred, saves restrictions on alienation in grants by Government, from any objection under the Transfer of Property Act. I think, therefore, that the suit land is in fact inalienable.

The question then arises to what extent the plaintiff is bound by the alienation effected by defendant No. 2 and by the decree obtained against defendant No. 2. It was held by both the lower Courts that the alienation by defendant No. 2 was made by him as manager for the purpose of legal necessity, and, therefore, if the land were alienable in the ordinary way, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff would be bound by the alienation, although he was no party to it. But I know of no authority for the proposition that a manager of a joint Hindu family can bind other members of the family by an alienation of coparcenary land which is not alienable. It seems to me obvious that if the land is not alienable, the manager of the family cannot alienate it as against other members of the joint family. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is not bound by the alienation made by defendant No. 2 or by the decree obtained against defendant No. 2. We are not concerned with the rights of defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2 inter se. I think all that we can do is to make a declaration that the suit property is inalienable, and not liable to sale as against the plaintiff in execution of the decree of 1933, and grant an injunction against defendant No. 1 executing the decree to the prejudice of the plaintiff.

The appeal will have to be allowed with costs throughout.

SEN. J. I agree. On the question whether the property in suit is alienable, the Assistant Judge in my opinion was clearly wrong in holding that in spite of the terms of the sanad the subsequent resolutions of Government have enlarged the right of the grantee rendering the inalienability "a thing of the past." The sanad in this case is similar in terms to that which this Court had to deal with in Sattappa v. Mahomedsaheb,<sup>2</sup> though the land there was a Kazi inam land. Section 8 of Schedule B to Act XI of 1852 places the Joshi and the Kazi inam lands on the same footing, and in Narayanbhat Gundbhat Joshi v. Vishnu Abarao Mahajan<sup>3</sup> it was expressly held that the Joshi inam land of the kind we are dealing with was not alienable.

The lower Courts have held that defendant No. 2 is now estopped from repudiating his alienation and, therefore, from challenging the sale in execution. But it has to be remembered that in this suit it is not defendant No. 2 but the plaintiff who is challenging the sale of the land, and the fact that defendant No. 2 might be estopped from challenging the sale in execution is not strictly relevant in this suit as we are not concerned with the rights of defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2 inter se. Even granting that defendant No. 2 may be estopped from challenging the sale, what we are concerned with is what effect that has on the contentions of the plaintiff and on the reliefs that he has asked for.

It seems to me that the rule of estoppel or of res judicata will not apply against the plaintiff's suit. Such a rule would no doubt apply to the son where the father as manager was competent to alienate the property on behalf of the son, but in this case obviously he was not so competent. The father can represent the son only where he is competent to sell or enter into any transaction in respect of the family property.

It also seems to me that the rule as to the pious obligation of the son would also not apply, although that rule would apply during the lifetime of the father, and although a debt incurred for family necessity but by acting in a manner contrary to the terms of the grant may not be strictly what is known as "avyavaharika." It is obvious that the pious obligation must be confined to the question of the payment of the father's debt and that it cannot be allowed to override the provisions of a grant that the land was not to be alienated at all. The plaintiff, therefore, is not precluded from contending that the payment of his father's debt should not take a form which is prohibited by his sanad.

The effect of the foregoing discussion seems to be that neither the principle of res judicata nor the son's liability for his father's debt nor the son's pious obligation can be allowed to encroach on the inalienability of the land, and the plaintiff is therefore clearly entitled to the declaration he seeks. As to his prayer for an injunction, I agree that it should take the form proposed by my Lord the Chief Justice.

DINBAI NUSSERWANJI GOAWALLA.*

1940

November 26.

Lease—Construction—“Rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind”, meaning of—Whether Urban Immoveable Property Tax comes within these words—“Dues,” meaning of.

The terms of a clause in a lease were—“That the lessees shall pay the following Municipal taxes, viz., general tax, halalkhore tax and License Fees, the water tax by meter...and riot taxes and all other existing and future rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind or nature for the time being payable either by the landlord or tenant in respect of the demised premises or any part thereof and the lessees shall pay to the lessors the amount of such taxes or dues when demanded.” On a question having arisen whether the lessees were bound to pay to the lessor the Urban Immoveable Property Tax imposed subsequent to the date of the lease, the lessees contended that under the above clause the only taxes payable by them were municipal taxes :—

Held, that on the true construction of the clause the lessees were bound to pay the Urban Immoveable Property Tax which was both a tax and a due in respect of the demised premises and that the liability of the lessees was not confined to municipal taxes.

As the word “dues” follows the words “riot taxes”, it is not restricted to municipal taxes, and has a wider import than the word “rates” or “taxes”.

THE plaintiffs, Mancherji and others, leased their milch cattle stables to defendant No. 1, Nusserwanji, and defendant No. 2, Shawaksha, at a monthly rent of Rs. 1,501 from January 1, 1938. They also leased to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 their dairy chawl and godown at a monthly rent of Rs. 199. The material portion of cl. 9 of the lease was in the following terms.—

“9. That the lessees shall pay the following Municipal taxes, viz., general tax, halalkhore tax and License Fees, the water tax by meter in respect of the water that may be required for drinking and washing purposes of the cattle and riot taxes and all other existing and future rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind or nature for the time being payable either by the landlord or tenant in respect of the demised premises or any part thereof and the lessees shall pay to the lessors the amount of such taxes or dues when demanded.”

The plaintiffs alleged that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 failed to pay the rents for the months of March and April, 1940, amounting to Rs. 3,400, and the sum of Rs. 3,357-1-0 in respect of municipal and other taxes in spite of their repeated demands.

Defendant No. 1 having died his legal representatives were brought on the record. But they did not defend the suit.

Defendant No. 2 in his written statement contended inter alia that on the true construction of cl. 9 of the lease the defendants were only bound to pay the municipal taxes mentioned in the clause and were under no obligation to pay the Urban Immoveable Property Tax which was a Government tax and not a municipal tax.

K. A. Somjee, for the plaintiffs.

J. S. Khergamwala, for defendant No. 2.

BLACKWELL J. The plaintiffs bring this suit to recover rents in respect of the properties covered by a lease, exhibit A, which is admitted, and in respect of certain other properties let to the defendants for the months of March and April, 1940, amounting to Rs. 3,400 and also to recover a sum of Rs. 3,357-1-0 alleged to be payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs in respect of certain municipal and other taxes in accordance with the provisions of the lease.

In paragraph 3 of the written statement of defendant No. 2, who alone appears to defend the suit, an agreement alleged to have been come to between the plaintiffs and the original defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2 on March 12, 1940, at the office of the plaintiffs' attorneys is set out, under which it is alleged that the time for payment of the amounts claimed in this suit was postponed, and that this suit is premature.

Defendant No. 2 also alleges in paragraph 1 of his written statement that on a true construction of cl. (9) of the lease the defendants are only bound to pay the municipal taxes mentioned in the clause, and are under no obligation to pay the property tax, which is part of the amount claimed, and which defendant No. 2 submits is a Government tax and not a municipal tax, and is not covered by cl. (9) of the lease.

Defendant No. 2 raised three issues which are as follows :—

(1) Whether the defendants are bound to pay to the plaintiffs the Urban Immoveable Property Tax under cl. (9) of the lease?

(2) Whether the plaintiffs agreed to the arrangement set out in paragraph 3 of the written statement?

(3) What sum, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?

After defendant No. 2 had given evidence for a short time, Mr. Khergamwala abandoned the second issue and relied solely upon issue 1. This issue involves a question of construction of cl. (9) of the lease. That clause is set out in paragraph 3 of the plaint and is in the following terms :—

"9. That the lessees shall pay the following Municipal taxes, viz., general tax, halalkhore tax and License Fees, the water tax by meter in respect of the water that may be required for drinking and washing purposes of the cattle and riot taxes and all other existing and future rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind or nature for the time being payable either by the landlord or tenant in respect of the demised premises or any part thereof and the lessees shall pay to the lessors the amount of such taxes or dues when demanded."

The question arising for determination is whether the Urban Immoveable Property Tax falls within that clause.

The date of the lease is January 27, 1938. The Urban Immoveable Property Tax first came into operation in Bombay on March 30, 1939, by reason of Part VI of Bombay Act IV of 1939 which amended the Bombay Finance Act of 1932. Section 22 of the Amending Act of 1939 provides as follows :—

"There shall, subject to the provisions of section 23, be levied and paid to the Provincial Government a tax on buildings and lands, hereinafter called the 'Urban Immoveable Property Tax' at ten per cent. of the annual letting value of such buildings or lands."

O. C. J.
1940

CONTRACTOR
v.
DINBAI
Blackwell J.

Section 24(I), sub-s. (a), provides that this tax shall be collected in the areas within the limits of a Municipality to which this part extends under s. 20 by the Municipality concerned notwithstanding any law under which such Municipality is constituted. Bombay Act I of 1940, s. 6, introduced after s. 24A of Act XVII of 1939, which provides for a penalty in default of payment, a new s. 24AA which enacts that the collection of the tax under s. 24 and the recovery of the penalty under s. 24A on behalf of any Municipality shall be made by the appropriate municipal authority appointed to collect the property tax on behalf of such Municipality under the law under which such Municipality is constituted.

Mr. Khergamvala for defendant No. 2 argued that the only taxes payable by the lessees under cl. (9) of the lease were municipal taxes. He submitted that the Urban Immoveable Property Tax was not a municipal tax but a Government tax, and that although it was collected through the machinery of the Municipality it could not be regarded as a municipal tax, and did not fall within cl. (9) of the lease.

In my opinion on the true construction of cl. (9) of the lease the liability of the lessees is not confined to municipal taxes in the sense contended for by Mr. Khergamvala, viz., taxes the benefit of which is had by the Municipality. Mr. Khergamvala argued that the words in the clause "all other existing and future rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind or nature for the time being payable either by the landlord or tenant in respect of the demised premises" must be regarded as ejusdem generis with municipal taxes with which that clause begins. I cannot accept this argument. After enumerating a number of municipal taxes the clause goes on to refer to riot tax. The riot tax is a police tax. Section 45 of the Bombay City Police Act, 1902, deals with the provision of compensation recoverable for injury or damage caused by an unlawful assembly and requires the Municipal Commissioner to recover the amount of compensation fixed by the Chief Presidency Magistrate by an addition to the general tax. Mr. Khergamvala admitted that the Municipality did not have the benefit of the amount so recovered, and that it had to be paid into the Court of the Chief Presidency Magistrate for distribution by him among the persons entitled. It is plain, therefore, that cl. (9) cannot be confined to municipal taxes in the sense contended for by Mr. Khergamvala, viz., taxes the benefit of which is retained by the Municipality. Consequently, I have to construe the words "all other existing and future rates taxes or dues" as following upon the words "riot taxes," which I hold are not municipal taxes in the sense for which Mr. Khergamvala contends. Moreover, a further difficulty in the way of Mr. Khergamvala's argument, in my opinion, consists in the use of the words "or dues". Mr. Khergamvala submitted that the word "dues" must be restricted to municipal dues. I do not agree with him. Those words follow upon the words "riot taxes," which I hold are not municipal taxes. The word "dues" has a wider import than the word "rates" or "taxes".

O. C. J. In my opinion the intention of cl. (9) was that the lessors should receive a monthly rent of Rs. 1,501 clear of all municipal taxes, riot taxes, and all other existing and future rates taxes or dues of whatsoever kind, and these later words, following, as they do, the words "riot taxes" cannot be restricted as meaning municipal taxes in the sense for which Mr. Khergamvala contends. It is in my opinion clear that the Urban Immoveable Property Tax is both a tax and a due in respect of the demised premises. I think that on the true construction of cl. (9) the lessees are bound to pay those taxes.

v.
DINBAI
GOAWALLA
Blackwell J.

Accordingly I answer the first issue in the affirmative.

The first issue having been thus answered the plaintiffs proceeded to prove their case strictly against defendants Nos. 1A, 1B and 1C, who did not appear. After proving the claim the witness Kesardas Kamalsey stated that since the filing of the suit the plaintiffs had been paid a sum of Rs. 3,500 by all the defendants in the suit. In addition to this defendant No. 2 had paid into Court a sum of Rs. 1,204-1-0 with his written statement and that money has been withdrawn by the plaintiffs in part satisfaction of their claim. The witness accordingly said that the amount now due by all the defendants to the plaintiffs is Rs. 2,053. The plaintiffs' counsel informs me that the plaintiffs are willing to give up their claim for interest and will be content with interest on the decretal amount. Counsel for defendant No. 2 agrees that the figure of Rs. 2,053 is the correct amount.

Accordingly I pass a decree in favour of the plaintiffs against all the defendants for Rs. 2,053 with costs and interest on judgment at six per cent. The decree as against defendants Nos. 1A, 1B and 1C will be restricted to the extent of the assets of the original defendant No. 1 come to their hands.

v.

December 19.

PATEL HAJI UMERJI ADAM & CO.*

Wrongful distress—Suit to recover damages for abuse of legal process—Essentials for such suit—Termination of proceedings in plaintiff's favour—Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882), Secs. 53, 60—Distress warrant—Distraint of tenant's property—Release of distraint on payment of rent—Termination of proceedings, not in tenant's favour.

To succeed in an action to recover damages for the abuse of civil proceedings e.g. the wrongful issue of a distress warrant, the plaintiff has to allege and prove that the defendant acted without reasonable and probable cause and maliciously. In certain classes of cases the plaintiff has also to prove that the proceedings have come to a proper or legal end, that is, terminated in his favour. This is not necessary if from the nature of the proceedings they are incapable of so terminating.

Hence where a landlord distrains property belonging to his tenant for non-payment of rent due under a distress warrant duly issued under the provisions of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, and afterwards releases the distrained property on payment of the rent due, but the tenant has taken no steps to have the warrant discharged by the Court from which it issued, the proceedings cannot be regarded as having terminated in his favour so as to sustain an action for damages against the landlord.

Under s. 53 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, it is competent to the landlord to apply for the issue of a distress warrant even if the rent in arrears is for one month only.

An application to discharge or suspend a distress warrant, under s. 60 of the Act, is generally made on the ground, (1) that the debtor is not justly indebted for the rent claimed from him, or (2) that the rent claimed is excessive, or (3) that it has not become due or payable, or (4) that it is not due and payable for the period for which it is claimed.

There can be no cause of action in respect of the doing of a legal act even if it is done with malice and without reasonable and probable cause.

SUIT to recover damages for levy of wrongful distress.

The plaintiffs, Haji Nasiruddin Karim Mahomed and four others, carried on business as milk merchants, and owned about one hundred buffaloes which they housed in stables belonging to Sir Mahomed Yusuf. The defendants, Patel Haji Umerji Adam Rokad and others, were rent-farming contractors of the stables, and the plaintiffs had attorned tenants to them as from December 1, 1938.

The rent of the stables for the month of January, 1939, became due from the plaintiffs. It was not paid at the end of the month.

On February 15, 1939, the defendants took steps to recover the rent due, and obtained from the Small Cause Court in Bombay distress warrants against all the plaintiffs. In execution of the warrants they took into custody buffaloes belonging to the plaintiffs on February 16. On February 18, the plaintiffs paid the rent due and had the distraint removed.

On February 18, 1939, the plaintiffs demanded a sum of Rs. 30,000 from the defendants as damages for levying wrongful distress against them.

On April 11, 1939, the plaintiffs filed a suit to recover the sum of Rs. 30,000 from the defendants as damages for taking out wrongful distress warrants and executing them.

The defendants contended inter alia that the plaint disclosed no cause of action, that as the plaintiffs had failed to pay the rent due by them for the month of January, 1939, the defendants were entitled in law to obtain distress warrants to recover the rent due, that the defendants did not act falsely and maliciously and without any reasonable and probable cause, and that they were not guilty of the abuse of the process of the Court.

Among the issues raised at the trial, issue No. 1, viz., whether the plaint discloses any cause of action, was tried first.

C. K. Daphlary, with N. H. Bhagwati, for the plaintiffs.

v.
UMERJI
ADAM & Co.

O. C. J. B. J. WADIA J. The plaintiffs carry on business as milk merchants in the 1940 firm name and style of Haji Nasiruddin Karim Mahomed & Co. at Joge-NASIRUDDIN shwari, outside the Fort of Bombay, and own a large number of buffaloes KARIM which were housed in the stables belonging to Sir Mahomed Yusuf, situate MAHOMED at Lamington Road. The defendants are the rent farming contractors of
 v. the stables, and the plaintiffs had attorned tenants to them as from Decem-UMERJI ber 1, 1938. There were really five different tenancies taken in the names ADAM & Co. of the five plaintiffs separately. This suit is to recover a sum of Rs. 30,000 as damages from the defendants for having executed certain distress warrants obtained from the Small Cause Court, Bombay, on an application made on behalf of the defendants on February 15, 1939, for the rent due to them from the plaintiffs for the month of January, 1939. The distress warrants were executed on February 16 and the buffaloes were attached, but the plaintiffs paid the amount of the rent due to the defendants on February 18, and the distraint was removed and the attachment raised. Plaintiffs say that the distress warrants were obtained falsely and maliciously and without any reasonable and probable cause and that in executing the same the defendants were guilty of the abuse of the process of the Court. The defendants contend that the plaint does not disclose any cause of action. They deny that they acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause and also deny all liability for damages.

Several issues were raised in the suit on behalf of the defendants. The first issue is whether the plaint discloses any cause of action, and that issue has been taken up first before proceeding with the others. The onus is on the defendants to show that the plaint discloses no cause of action. Their contention is two-fold, viz., (1) assuming that the facts in the plaint are true for the sake of argument, the distress levied by the defendants was neither illegal nor wrong and therefore the plaintiffs have no cause of action; (2) even assuming for the sake of argument that the distress was illegal and wrongful, the distress proceedings not having terminated in the plaintiffs' favour, the plaintiffs have no cause of action. I will take these two separately.

It is not in dispute that the rent for January, 1939, was due at the date of the applications for the distress warrants. The tenancy of the stables was monthly, and the rent for January became due at the end of that month, i.e. on February 1, 1939. Under s. 108 (1) of the Transfer of Property Act a lessee is bound, in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, to tender the rent to the lessor or his agent in that behalf at the proper time and place. There is nothing in that section to require the lessor to make a demand for the rent. The rent was not paid on February 1 and thereafter, and defendants applied on February 15 on the affidavits of one of their partners for levying distress warrants for the rent of the month of January. In England distress is a very ancient right which landlords exercised without legal process in order to recover their dues from defaulting tenants. It was once a purely private form of self-help, but it has still survived as a part of the customary law of real property in England, though considerably modified by statute. In India the rights of landholders to attach the holdings and moveables of ryots for arrears of rent are governed by statute law in various Provinces, and the right of distress depends upon the observance of the statutory formalities, the right being only conferred by statute and on the conditions mentioned in it. Before the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act of 1882 was passed, the law relating to distress in the Presidency-towns was governed by the Distress Act (I of 1875). That Act was repealed, and the provisions in it relating to distress have been almost verbatim embodied in Chapter VIII of the Act of 1882. That chapter contains the law now prevalent relating to distress in the three Presidency Towns therein mentioned which include Bombay. It contains rules both of the substantive law of distress and the rules of procedure for those towns, and it appears on all important points to be exhaustive, as it is provided by s. 68 that no distress shall be levied for arrears of rent except under the provisions of Chapter VIII. Under the Act "any person claiming to be entitled to arrears of rent of any house or premises" can only set the machinery of the Court in motion by an application for a distress warrant under s. 53 which has to be supported by an affidavit, and the affidavit has to be to the effect of Form A contained in sch. III of the Act, according to which the landlord or his duly constituted attorney on his behalf has to swear or affirm before the Judge or Registrar of the Small Cause Court that a particular tenant is "justly indebted" in a particular sum for the arrears of rent specified. Under s. 54 the distress warrant is issued by the Judge or Registrar under his hand and seal according to the Form B in the same schedule. The section further provides that the Judge or Registrar may at his discretion decline to issue the distress warrant. In accordance with the procedure thus laid down in the Act the defendants through their partner made an application to the Small Cause Court which was supported by five different affidavits in the same form in respect of the five tenancies of the five plaintiffs on February 15, 1939. It was argued that defendants who were the plaintiffs in those applications to the Small Cause Court were not entitled to apply for a distress warrant in respect of one month's rent only, and that a distraint for the rent of the month of January, 1939, only was wrongful and illegal. There is however no averment to that effect in the plaint. Five other affidavits were made, in the same form, on the same day by the same partner of the defendants, alleging that the defendants to those applications who are plaintiffs in this suit might remove the buffaloes to Jogeshwari in a few days which is without the jurisdiction of this Court and that it would therefore be well-nigh impossible for the plaintiffs to recover their just dues. Why the second affidavit was made is not clear. Plaintiffs allege in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the plaint that these allegations were false to the knowledge of the defendants, that the plaintiffs were landed proprietors, and that the defendants have in applying for and obtaining and executing the distress warrants acted falsely, maliciously, without any reasonable and probable cause, and abused the process of the Court. Plaintiff's counsel relies on the word "months" used in Form A which is in the plural. It is not quite clear whether the word "month" in Form C is used in the plural or in the singular. Counsel argued that the word used in the plural in Form A shows that the rent for which distress can be levied must be in arrears at least for two months, as Form A is referred to in the section itself. In the first place the words in the section are that the application shall be supported by an affidavit or affirmation "to the effect of the Form marked A", meaning that the affidavit or affirmation shall be substantially in that form. * Secondly, the words used in the beginning of the section are "arrears of rent of any house or premises". No particular period of arrears is there referred to. It would, in my opinion, be very strange for the Legislature to leave the minimum period, if any, for levying distress to be inferred from the Form in the Schedule attached to the Act, if its intention was to make any minimum period part of the substantive law. Plaintiffs' counsel at the close of his address applied to the Court to call the Registrar of the Small Cause Court to prove that the practice of the Small Cause Court at the time, i.e. in or about February, 1939, was not to levy distress for arrears of rent for less than two months unless special cause was shown. Any such practice that may have been followed cannot in my opinion render illegal that which is not clearly made illegal by the provisions of the statute itself. It is quite possible that, distraint for rent being a drastic remedy, the landlord does not apply for a distress warrant unless more than a month's rent at least is due, but that in itself cannot make the distress for a month's rent illegal. The alleged practice is in my opinion irrelevant to the issue I have to determine.

Defendants secondly contend that it is an essential part of the cause of action in a suit for damages for the abuse of civil proceedings that the proceedings in which the process complained of is taken out shall have terminated in favour of the plaintiffs or that the particular process complained of has been superseded or discharged, unless the proceedings are incapable of so terminating or of being superseded or discharged. As pointed out by Halsbury, Vol. XXII, Hailsham's Edn., paragraph 42, page 27, the plaintiff in an action for the abuse of civil proceedings has to allege and prove a case similar, mutatis mutandis, to that of a plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution. In an action for malicious prosecution it is well-known that the plaintiff in order to sustain his action for damages must first prove that the prosecution has terminated in his favour. It is an actionable wrong to institute certain kinds of proceedings against some one's person or against his property; but in order to succeed the plaintiff has to prove that the proceedings were instituted by the defendant, that the defendant acted without reasonable and probable cause, that the defendant also acted maliciously, and that in certain classes of cases the proceedings have come to a proper or legal end, i.e. terminated, in the plaintiff's favour. No action lies for instance for maliciously procuring the plaintiff to be adjudicated a bankrupt, unless and until the adjudication order is set aside or annulled: see Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley.<sup>1</sup> It is pointed out at p. 217 by the Earl of Selborne L. C. that the rule is founded upon public policy. Otherwise, as he observed, the most solemn proceedings of all our Courts of justice, civil and criminal, when they have come to a final determination settling the rights and liabilities of the parties, might be made themselves the subject of an independent controversy, and their propriety might be challenged by actions of this kind. He further stated that the fact of the adjudication standing would be a sufficient answer to the alleged cause of action. In Raj Chunder Roy v. Shama Soondari Debi<sup>1</sup> it was not disputed that an action for damages for arrest in execution of an ex parte decree will not lie until after the decree is set aside. As a matter of fact the ex parte decree in that case was set aside, but it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages, because it was not found that the defendant had acted without reasonable and probable cause. In Kedarnath Tulsidas v. Beharimal Jagarmal<sup>2</sup> Taraporewala J., as he then was, held that it was an essential part of the cause of action in a suit for damages for wrongful attachment before judgment that the proceedings in which the process complained of was taken out should have terminated in favour of the plaintiff or that the particular process complained of had been superseded or discharged. The order of the Court is valid until it is set aside, and ordinarily there can be no cause of action for damages on the allegation that the order of the Court was wrongfully obtained so long as the order of that Court stands. An arrest of a judgment-debtor or attachment of his property in execution of a decree of a civil Court is the act of the Court executing the decree; so also is an order for arrest or attachment before judgment. In Less v. Patterson<sup>3</sup> the writ of ne exeat regno issued by the defendant was not set aside, and it was held that as the defendant had not moved to discharge the writ, it must be taken to have been properly issued and defendant could not set-off any claim for damages in that behalf against a plaintiff in a partnership action. At p. 870 Fry J. observes as follows :—

"The writs of ne exeat were granted upon affidavits which satisfied the Court of the propriety of granting them, and Patterson has submitted to them instead of moving to discharge them. I must, therefore, take it now that the writs were properly issued."

It is provided by s. 60 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act of 1882 that the debtor or any other person alleging himself to be the owner of any property seized under this chapter, i.e. Chapter VIII, or the duly constituted attorney of such debtor or other person, may, at any time within five days from such seizure, apply to any Judge of the said Court to discharge or suspend the warrant, or to release a distrained article, and such Judge may discharge or suspend such warrant or release such article accordingly, upon such terms as he thinks just. It is not in dispute that no such application was made by the plaintiffs to the Small Cause Court Judge. There is also no averment in the plaint that the proceedings had terminated in the plaintiffs' favour. Plaintiffs' counsel argued that their cause of action was for damages on the ground that the distress warrants were obtained and executed maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, that the plaintiffs could not have applied under s. 60 to set aside the distress warrants on those grounds, and that therefore any proceedings which could have or might have been taken by the plaintiffs were incapable of terminating in their favour. Applications under s. 60 are generally made on the ground that the debtor is not justly indebted for the rent claimed from him, or that the rent claimed is excessive, or that it has not become due and payable, or that it was not payable for the period for which it was claimed. Under s. 62 it is provided inter alia that in any case under s. 60 the Judge may award such compensation by way of damages to the applicant as the Judge thinks fit, and the Judge must for that purpose make any enquiry that he thinks necessary; if the Judge awards or refuses such compensation, his order shall bar any suit for the recovery or compensation or damages caused by the distress. The plaintiffs, however, cannot be heard to say that in respect of the execution of a distress warrant under an order of the Court, which is binding until it is set aside, they have a cause of action for damages on the ground that the defendants acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause as alleged. Any exercise of malice or improper motive not in itself illegal will not convert a legal act done with such motive into a civil wrong for which reparation is due: see Allen v. Flood.<sup>1</sup> In England no jury is at liberty to find a verdict for a plaintiff because the defendant in doing an otherwise lawful act was inspired by an improper motive. If a person has done what he was justified in doing according to the law, the law will not permit an enquiry into his motive. No action can therefore lie if an execution creditor acting under an order of the Court or a creditor executing a distress warrant under an order of the Court acts with malice or improper motive, unless the order of the Court is first vacated. There is no cause of action in respect of the doing of a legal act, even if it is done with malice and without reasonable and probable cause.

It was next argued by plaintiffs' counsel, with some ingenuity, that the proceedings must be deemed to have terminated in the plaintiffs' favour, because in terms of s. 60 the distrained articles, viz., the buffaloes, were released on February 18. It is, however, necessary that the proceedings must not have merely terminated, but terminated in favour of the party claiming damages. The buffaloes were released on payment, and not without payment. So that if at all the proceedings terminated, they terminated in favour of the defendants when they got payment of the rent for which the distress warrants were levied.

It is true that in some cases of action for damages for abuse of civil proceedings it is not necessary that the proceedings should have terminated in the plaintiff's favour, if from their nature they are incapable of so terminating, e.g. if the defendants cause further proceedings to be dropped as in Nicholas v. Sivarama Ayyar.<sup>2</sup> The creditor may abandon the proceedings in consequence of any payment made by the debtor to obtain release as in Gidding v. Eyre.<sup>3</sup> Where the arrest or other proceeding complained of is an abuse of the process of the law to effect an object which is not within the scope of the process, it is not necessary that the proceedings should have terminated in plaintiff's favour: see Grainger v. Hill.<sup>4</sup> In such a case the process of the Court is employed to oppress or injure the debtor, and to compel him to do something which he is not bound to do under the process. The remedy of the aggrieved party is for the unfair user of the process, which user is not within its scope. That is not the case before me. The distress proceedings were capable of terminating in the plaintiffs' favour, if an application under s. 53 could be sustained. The plaintiffs have not moved the Court under the section, and one essential requirement to give them their cause of action is wanting. If an application cannot be sustained under s. 53, then the order of the Court stands, and the distress having been levied according to the law, the plaintiffs have no cause of action on the grounds merely of alleged malice and want of reasonable and probable cause.

I would therefore answer issue No. 1 in the negative. In view of my finding on issue No. 1, it is not necessary for me to determine the other issues that have been raised on behalf of the defendants. The suit must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

A mortgagee cannot be restrained from exercising his power of sale merely by reason of the mortgagor filing a suit for redemption, unless he pays the mortgage amount to the mortgagee or tenders the same.

A mortgagor is entitled to file a suit to restrain the mortgagee by an order and injunction of the Court from exercising his power of sale, if the power is exercised in a wrong and improper manner, or contrary to the terms of the contract.

The equitable relief by way of injunction is not to be refused because the mortgagor was unable to pay in the past and may be unable to pay in the future. The relief may be granted even if the mortgagor can come forward later and claim damages on account of an improper sale.

In order that the mortgage moneys may become immediately payable on the exercise of the mortgagee's option, there must be an act indicating to the SUIT for an injunction restraining the mortgagee from exercising his power of sale.

On May 31, 1935, plaintiff No. 1 (Bapamiya) and plaintiff No. 2 (Sulleman) and one Zohrabai, who were heirs of one Shakkar Chato, mortgaged an immoveable property to one Rahim Premji Parpia and Habib Rahim Parpia for Rs. 7,500.

On March 3, 1936, Zohrabai died leaving her surviving the plaintiffs as her heirs and legal representatives according to Mahomedan law.

On January 22, 1940, Rahim and Habib transferred by a deed the mortgage debt, which amounted to Rs. 11,200, to the defendant, Jehangir Dinshaw Belgaumwalla, who was to have under the deed of transfer full benefit of the covenants, power of sale and other provisions in the mortgage deed, for securing the repayment of the sum of Rs. 11,200. Under the deed of transfer of mortgage the due date for repayment was fixed for January 22, 1941, with a further option to the plaintiffs to extend the same to January 22, 1942, provided the plaintiffs paid interest regularly and otherwise observed and performed all the provisions and conditions of the mortgage deed of May 31, 1935.

On May 13, 1940, the plaintiffs paid interest, which amounted to Rs. 70 per month, for the month ending March 19, 1940.

The defendant wrote to the plaintiffs from time to time to pay off arrears of interest and the insurance premia paid by him, but the plaintiffs failed to pay.

On August 12, 1940, the defendant again wrote to the plaintiffs to pay off arrears of interest and in default threatened to enter into possession of the property mortgaged.

On August 26, 1940, the defendant advertised the sale of the mortgaged property for September 18, 1940.

The plaintiffs filed the present suit alleging that under the deeds of mortgage and the transfer of mortgage the defendant had power to put up the property for sale only in the following cases :—

"(1) if default is made in payment of the principal sum of Rs. 7,500 or any part thereof on the day appointed for the payment thereof and for the space of three calendar months next after a notice in writing required by section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act and requiring payment of the principal money or such part thereof as may for the time being be due, shall be served on mortgagors, . .

(2) or unless and until interest amounting at least to five hundred rupees shall be in arrears and remains unpaid for three months next after becoming due."

The mortgage deed further provided that if interest for any three months remained unpaid for three weeks, the whole of the mortgage debt should at the option of the mortgagees become immediately payable as if the due date had then elapsed.

The plaintiffs submitted that interest due amounted only to Rs. 420 ; that the defendant had not exercised his option whereby the said amount became immediately payable as if the due date had then elapsed ; that even if the defendant had exercised the option he had no right to put up the property for sale in the absence of a notice in writing required by s. 69 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 ; that the sale fixed for September 18, 1940, was wrongful and not in accordance with the terms of the mortgage ; that unless the defendant was restrained by an order and injunction from selling the property, the plaintiffs would be greatly prejudiced.

The defendant in his written statement contended inter alia that the suit was misconceived as plaintiffs had no power under the deeds of mortgage and transfer of mortgage to restrain him from exercising his power of sale ; that he was entitled to exercise his power of sale owing to the plaintiffs' breaches of conditions and covenants contained in the mortgage deed of May 31, 1935 ; that the plaintiffs committed the breaches by their failure to pay interest, to insure the property and pay the premium, and to pay the municipal taxes ; and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any intimation as to his exercise of the option.

N. H. Bhagwati, with V. K. Chhatrapati, for the plaintiffs.

P. B. Vachha and Darasha J. Vakil, for the defendant.

B. J. WADIA J. Plaintiffs have filed this suit as mortgagors against the defendant who is the present mortgagee of an immoveable property situate at Chimna Butcher Street, Bombay, to restrain the defendant by an order and injunction of the Court from selling the property on the ground that the proposed sale which was advertised for September 18 last was wrongful and not in accordance with the terms of the mortgage. The original mortgage deed dated May 31, 1935, was made between plaintiff No. 1 as the sole executor of his father's will along with plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 and one Bai Zohrabai, the heirs of plaintiff No. 1's father, as mortgagors on the one hand and Rahim Premji Parpia and Habib Rahim Parpia as mortgagees to secure repayment of the sum of Rs. 7,500 lent and advanced by the mortgagees. Zohrabai died about March 3, 1936, and the plaintiffs are her only heirs and legal representatives according to the Mahomedan law. By an indenture of transfer of mortgage dated January 22, 1940, the mortgage debt, which then amounted to Rs. 11,200, was transferred by the original mortgagees to the defendant, who was to have under the deed of transfer the full benefit of the covenants, power of sale and other powers and provisions contained in the mortgage deed for securing the repayment of the sum of Rs. 11,200. The due date for repayment was extended under the deed of transfer to January 22, 1941, with a further option to the mortgagors to extend the same to January 22, 1942, provided they paid interest regularly and otherwise observed and performed all the provisions and conditions of the mortgage.

The rate of interest agreed upon was annas ten per cent. per month. After the deed of transfer the plaintiffs paid to the defendant Rs. 70 for interest on February 20, 1940, for the month ending February 19, and on May 13, 1940, they paid a further sum of Rs. 70 for interest for the month ending March 19, 1940. Thereafter the plaintiffs in spite of demands from the defendant failed to pay the interest agreed upon.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the defendant was not entitled to have the property sold on two grounds : (1) that even if the due date of payment which was January 22, 1941, had been, under the circumstances contemplated by a clause in the mortgage deed which I will hereafter refer to, accelerated, the defendant had not intimated to the plaintiffs the exercise of his option to call in the mortgage amount, and (2) because no notice of sale in writing as required by s. 69(2) (a) of the Transfer of Property Act, and as also provided for in the mortgage deed, was given to the plaintiffs. Defendant on the other hand contends that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any intimation of the exercise of the option. In paragraph 13 of his written statement he further contended that he was entitled to put up the mortgaged property for sale without the notice in writing required by s. 69, but that contention was given up at the hearing by his counsel. Defendant also contends in paragraph 16 of his written statement that the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim any relief in this suit by reason of the order passed by the Court on the notice of motion for interim injunction on September 18 last.

The application for interim injunction was made in terms of prayer (b) of the plaint on September 18 before recess, but as the sale was advertised for the afternoon of the same day, I ordered that notice of the application should be given immediately to the mortgagee i.e. the defendant. After the recess both parties appeared by counsel, and a consent order was taken under which on the plaintiffs paying Rs. 500 to the defendant within two days the sale was to be adjourned for two months, but if the sum was not paid as ordered, the notice of motion was to be dismissed with costs. The words in the order "and the sale to proceed" set out in para. 15 of the written statement do not form part of the final order made by the Court on that date. They were at first written down by me after the substance of the consent order arrived at by the parties was mentioned to the Court, but a little later, either upon some discussion in Court or at the Court's own suggestion, the words which in my order ran as follows "and defendant to be at liberty to proceed with the sale" were struck out, presumably because it was not the Court's intention to decide the whole suit on an application for an interim injunction. Those words were at first written and even read out by the Court to the parties, but as I have already stated, after some discussion or at the Court's instance, they were struck out. Defendant's counsel argued that even without the addition of these words the implied effect of the order of the Court was that on failure to pay Rs. 500 within two days not only the notice of motion was to stand dismissed, but that the plaintiffs also were to lose their right to apply for and claim permanent injunction. This means in others words that by the order the Court practically decided the whole suit. If that was so, there was no meaning in ordering the written statement to be filed within ten days and expediting the suit without stating in so many words that the written statement was to be filed and the suit was to be expedited only if the sum of Rs. 500 was paid within two days. There would have been no need for a written statement, nor for expediting the suit, if on the failure to pay within two days the whole suit of the plaintiffs was to go by the board.

It is alleged in para. 1 of the written statement that the plaintiffs' suit is "misconceived" on the ground that under the terms of the mortgage and transfer of mortgage the plaintiffs could not restrain the exercise of the mortgagee's power of sale. At the hearing it was further argued that the suit as framed was not maintainable, because no suit can lie only for an injunction without at the same time claiming other relief. That is nowhere alleged in the written statement, and although as a point of procedure it can be taken at any time, counsel for the defendant has not even raised an issue upon it. He argued that as soon as the mortgagee became entitled to call in his moneys by reason of the acceleration of the date of payment, the mortgagors' right to redeem accrued simultaneously to them, and as there was no prayer for redemption, the whole suit was bad. On the other hand plaintiff's counsel argued that ordinarily a mortgagor's suit for redemption could not be brought before the expiry of the stipulated period, that is, before the due date, and that if in the event of the due date being accelerated defendant as mortgagee became entitled at his option to call in the mortgage amount, he had not exercised that option by calling in the amount upon which the mortgagor's right to redeem would accrue. It has been held both in England and in India that the mortgagee cannot be restrained from exercising his power of sale merely by reason of the mortgagor filing a suit for redemption, unless he pays the mortgage amount to the mortgagee or tenders the same. There is, however, nothing to prevent a mortgagor from seeking to restrain the exercise of the mortgagee's power of sale if the power is exercised in a wrong and improper manner, contrary to the terms of the contract : see Jagjivan Nanabhai v. Shridhar Balkrishna Nagarkar<sup>1</sup> and Jerup Teja & Co. v. Peerbhoy.<sup>2</sup> No case was cited before me to show that if the right to redeem had not accrued to the mortgagor he could not bring in a suit for an injunction restraining a wrongful sale, but that his only remedy was either to pay or tender the moneys and allow the property to be sold, and then pursue his remedy in damages if any. In my opinion the plaintiffs could not at the particular stage and under the circumstances of the case have asked for any other relief except an injunction, and they could only succeed if they showed that the proposed sale was wrongful in the sense that it was against the terms of the mortgage. I do not think it can be said that in such a case a suit merely for an injunction is incompetent. Suits in passing off actions and for infringement of trade mark for instance are often filed only for injunction and costs.

It is not in dispute that under the terms of the transfer of mortgage the due date was extended to January 22, 1941, with the further option I have mentioned before. Counsel, however, referred to the clause in the mortgage deed which provides that it is agreed that in the event of any damage happening to the mortgaged property in the manner specified whereby the security was impaired, or in the event of interest for any three months being in arrears and remaining unpaid for three weeks after being due, or if the mortgagors or any of them were adjudged insolvent, or committed a breach of any one of the covenants, provisions, terms and conditions in the mortgage, then notwithstanding anything contained in the mortgage to the contrary

"the whole of the mortgage debt shall at once at the option of the mortgagees become immediately payable as if the due date had then elapsed and in such cases all such rights and remedies shall be available to the mortgagees as would be available to them under the terms of these presents or by law upon default being made in payment of the principal money and interest hereby secured."

It is not in dispute that interest was in arrears for three months and unpaid. It is also not disputed that the plaintiffs had failed to insure the mortgaged property and to pay the insurance premium. Under the circumstances the due date which was January 22, 1941, was accelerated, and the option to call in his moneys and all the rights of the mortgagee accrued to him. The mortgagee could under the terms of the mortgage deed apply for a receiver of the mortgaged property, or enter into possession, or file a suit for sale, or by exercising the option reserved to him he could proceed to realise his mortgage debt without filing a suit. It has been pointed out by the Privy Council in Lasa Din v. Gulab Kunwar<sup>1</sup> that a proviso or clause in the mortgage deed of the nature which I have referred to above is "exclusively for the benefit of the mortgagees" and "purports to give them an option either to enforce their security at once, or if the security is ample, to stand by their investment for the full term of the mortgage." In an earlier Privy Council case, Pancham v. Ansar Husain,<sup>2</sup> the question was one of limitation under art. 132 of the Limitation Act for an action by a mortgagee upon a breach of the clause which gave the mortgagee the power to enforce the mortgage by sale even if the time for repayment had not arrived. It was pointed out by Lord Blanesburgh at p. 194 that such a default on the part of the mortgagor gave to the mortgagee "a right by appropriate action to make the mortgage moneys immediately due". As pointed out by Sir Dinshah Mulla in his Commentary on the Transfer of Property Act, 2nd edn., at p. 419, such appropriate action may be by a notice of demand as in Raghubir Singh Raja v. Kunwar Rajendra Bahadur Singh,<sup>3</sup> or by the mere filing of a suit as in Abdul Rahman v. Sheo Dayal.<sup>4</sup> In order that the mortgage moneys may become immediately payable on the exercise of the mortgagee's option there must be an action indicating to the mortgagor the exercise of that option, so as to enable the mortgagor to realise his position and save his equity of redemption if possible.

What was the appropriate action taken by the defendant as mortgagee? On April 25, 1940, the mortgagee called upon the mortgagors to pay up the arrears of interest failing which he threatened to take proceedings at their risk as to costs. He followed this up with a reminder on July 15 and again on July 24. As no reply was forthcoming, the mortgagee by his attorneys' letter dated August 12, 1940, intimated to the plaintiffs that the defendant had no other alternative but to enter into possession of the mortgaged property and recover the rents and profits, but that he would give the mortgagors one more chance to pay off the arrears failing which he would "exercise his rights under the mortgage herein as indicated above", meaning thereby that he would enter into possession of the mortgaged property. Thereafter the defendant seems to have changed his mind. He advertised the property for sale once in the issue of the Bombay Samachar of August 26 and once in the issue of the Bombay Chronicle of August 30, 1940. The sale was advertised for September 18, 1940. No intimation was given to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs themselves came to know of the intended sale on September 2, 1940, as alleged by them in para. 7 of the plaint, and that is admitted by the defendant in para. 9 of his written statement. The question therefore that arises is, is an advertisement for sale by public auction without any intimation to the mortgagor an appropriate action by the mortgagee under the terms of the Privy Council judgment to make the mortgage amount immediately payable at his option? In para. 13 of his written statement the defendant alleges that the plaintiffs were "apprised" by correspondence annexed to the plaint that the defendant was proceeding to exercise his power of sale. But even that was only by way of answer to the plaintiffs' letter of September 17, in which they pointed out inter alia that they had not received even the notice required by s. 69 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is not alleged in the written statement that such advertisement amounted to an intimation of the mortgagee's exercise of his option. In fact the only contention taken up by the defendant in the written statement was that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any intimation at all. In my opinion the mere fact that the defendant became entitled to call in the mortgage moneys immediately is not an exercise of the option given to him under the mortgage deed. The mortgage moneys can only become due and payable as soon as the option is exercised upon an intimation on which the mortgagors could come to know their position, for unless the mortgagee calls in the moneys the mortgagor cannot know that the due date has been accelerated. He should also know which of the rights under the mortgage the mortgagee wishes to exercise.

Further, or in any event, it is admitted on behalf of the defendant that no notice was given to the mortgagors as required by s. 69(2)(a). Section 69(2) provides that the power of sale without the intervention of the Court shall not be exercised unless and until (a) notice in writing requiring payment of the principal money has been served on the mortgagor, or on one of several mortgagors, and default has been made in payment of the principal money, or of part thereof, for three months after such service; or (b) some interest under the mortgage amounting at least to Rs. 500 is in arrear and unpaid for three months after becoming due. Both these clauses seem to be based on s. 20 of the English Conveyancing Act of 1881 now corresponding to s. 103 of the Law of Property Act of 1925. This power of sale in the mortgage deed is really an authority given to the mortgagee to defeat the mortgagor's equity of redemption, but it could only be exercised on the fulfilment of either of the two conditions mentioned in s. 69(2). These conditions are also reproduced in the mortgage deed. In the case of default of payment of interest amounting at least to Rs. 500 no notice is necessary, but in the case of default of any payment of the principal notice in writing is necessary unless the mortgagor has waived it or consented to dispense with it. It is necessary because without such notice the exercise of the power of sale would be oppressive. As pointed out by the Privy Council in Rajah Kishendatt Ram v. Rajah Mumtaz Ali Khan,<sup>1</sup> the effect of a power of sale is "to destroy the equity of redemption" and "the estate, if purchased by a stranger, passes into his hands free from all the incumbrances". The object of the notice, as pointed out by our Court in Doolabhdas v. Chhabildas,<sup>2</sup> is also to enable the mortgagor to collect the amount of moneys payable by him if he can, and to pay the same before the time for exercising the power of sale arrives.

Defendant's counsel admits that such notice is necessary, but he relies on the clause in the mortgage deed which provides in substance that notwithstanding any irregularity in propriety or want of necessity of a sale by the mortgagee under his power the sale will be valid and effectual and the remedy of the mortgagor shall be in damages only. The clause is a long one, but I have merely set out its substance. Counsel referred to Prichard v. Wilson.<sup>3</sup> In that case there was a covenant in a mortgage deed not to exercise the power of sale except after three months' notice. The covenant was followed by a proviso that the purchaser should not be affected by the absence of such notice, and that the remedy of the mortgagor should be by an action for damages. Sir J. Romilly M. R. was of opinion that the construction of the covenant appeared to him to be one of some difficulty, but upon consideration he was of opinion "that the express proviso as to the remedy of the plaintiff by action for damages, takes away the jurisdiction of this Court", the jurisdiction being the jurisdiction to grant an injunction. No reason whatsoever is given for this opinion. It was a case decided in 1864 before even the Conveyancing Act of 1881 came into force. It was followed by Starling J. in Munchurji Furdoonji Mehta v. Noor Mahomedbhoy Jairajbhoy Pirbhoy.<sup>4</sup> No reason is given for his judgment. He merely reproduces the clause about the remedy being in damages and then goes on to say that the case of Prichard v. Wilson "lays down the rule that in such a case a Court of Equity will not grant an injunction to stop a sale." This case was decided, as pointed out by Sir Dinshah Mulla, before the Transfer of Property Act was applied to Bombay. Counsel argued that this Court was bound to follow the case. It is the judgment of a Court of coordinate jurisdiction, and I believe counsel was referring to the decision of the Appeal Court in Tyabji Dayabhai & Co. v. Jetha Devji & Co.,<sup>1</sup> where Marten C. J. pointed out that a decision of a single Judge of this Court was binding upon another Judge on the Original Side, if it was a decision "which really followed the practice of this Court which had existed for a great number of years". The ruling embodied in Prichard's case and followed in Muncherji Furdoonji's case has not been mentioned in any case in Bombay either before Muncherji Furdoonji's case or after it. I should like also to point out that the clause in the mortgage deed on which counsel relies begins by saying "without prejudice to all rights conferred on the mortgagees by s. 69 of the Transfer of Property Act" etc. Now the right conferred by s. 69 (2) on the mortgagee is the right to exercise his power of sale only upon fulfilment of one of the two conditions; and as I have stated before, giving the notice required by s. 69(2) (a), is not only necessary but is imperative, and even the period of three months cannot be curtailed by agreement of the parties. I should like to point out the observation made in Lasa Din v. Gulab Kunwar by Sir George Lowndes at p. 385 that it is always dangerous to apply English decisions to the construction of an Indian Act. No doubt the two cases which I have referred to before do not bear upon the construction of any provision of the Transfer of Property Act, but I am reluctant to interpret s. 69(2) (a), even if it is followed by the clause as to the remedy in damages, on the basis of the decision in Prichard v. Wilson followed in Muncherji Furdoonji Mehta's case for which no reason has been assigned.

It was lastly argued that it did not appear on the facts of this case that the plaintiffs would ever be able, even if they were willing, to redeem this property, and that they were not even able to pay Rs. 500 within a couple of days as ordered by the Court. It was further contended that any relief in this suit would be futile because the mortgagee can any day sell under s. 69(2) (b) without notice. That may be so, but the fact that the mortgagee can hereafter take the right action cannot in my opinion legalise an action already taken which was not right and proper according to the law. It is true that granting an injunction is an equitable remedy. It is equally true that it is in the discretion of the Court. But the exercise of the discretion must always be based upon judicial principles; in other words, it can only be exercised according to the provisions and requirements of the law. I do not see why sitting as a Court of Equity I should refuse the equitable relief by way of injunction merely because the mortgagors were unable to pay in the past and might be unable to pay even in the future. I also do not see why I should refuse to grant the relief because the mortgagors can later come forward and claim damages, if any, by reason of an improper sale. Here there are two conditions which have not been fulfilled. There is no intimation of the exercise of the mortgagee's option, and there is no notice in writing as required by the statute; and the parties wish to stand upon their strict rights regardless of the consequences of any future action which may be taken by the mortgagee. I cannot say that conditions exist in this case which entitle the mortgagee to exercise his power of sale or which prevent the mortgagors from applying to the Court to restrain the exer-

Society—Promotion of education—Position of such society whether akin to club, or joint stock company—Suit, maintainability of, for wrong done to society—Suit by minority of members in their own name—Societies Registration Act (XXI of 1860).

The position of a society registered under the Societies Registration Act, 1860, is like that of a club or a joint stock company. In order to redress a wrong done to the society or to recover moneys or damages alleged to be due to the society, the action should be brought by the society itself. Where the persons against whom the relief is sought are in majority and control the society and do not permit an action to be brought in the name of the society, the minority of members can bring an action in their own names. But they cannot have a larger right to relief than the society itself would have if it had brought the action, and cannot complain of acts which are valid if done with the approval of the majority of the members, or are capable of being confirmed by the majority. The cases in which the minority can maintain such an action are confined to those in which the acts complained of are of a fraudulent character or beyond the powers of the company.

A society was registered in 1932, under the Societies Registration Act, 1860, to promote the education of boys and girls hailing from Southern India. At a general meeting of the society called on December 4, 1938, eight persons were elected to form the managing committee and they co-opted one more member in April, 1939. The managing committee resolved to borrow money for the purpose of erecting a school building. The plaintiff, who was a member of the society, challenged the advisability and legality of the acts of the managing committee. On a requisition being sent by eighteen members of the society, a general meeting was convened on October 15, 1939, at which the election of the managing committee and their acts were validated. The plaintiff filed a suit on behalf of himself and other members of the society, except the defendants who were the nine members of the managing committee whose appointment and acts were confirmed by the general meeting held on October 15, 1939. The plaintiff sought for a declaration that the loans raised by the defendants were unauthorised and prayed that a managing committee be constituted under the direction of the Court :—

Held, that, as the acts of the defendants which were challenged were in respect of alleged wrong done to the society as a body, it was necessary that the society should be a party to the litigation ;

that it was not competent to the plaintiff, either alone or representing himself and the other members of the society other than the defendants, to bring a suit without ascertaining the wishes of the society ; and that, therefore, the suit as framed was not maintainable and the Court had no jurisdiction to try it in the absence of the society.

KANIA J. The South Indian Education Society was registered in 1932 under the Societies Registration Act XXI of 1860. The memorandum of association, the rules and the by-laws of the society were duly registered in accordance with the Act. The memorandum defines the objects. The society was founded mainly to promote the education of the boys and girls of Southern India and with that object in view it thought of erecting a building to house the school. Not having sufficient funds on hand schemes were suggested to borrow money. It was suggested that debentures should be issued. To find out if that scheme would be workable several persons were approached and they expressed their willingness to subscribe. When it came to payment, however, the response on the whole being unsatisfactory, there occurred a divergence of opinion. The plaintiff who was a member of the society and who took part in getting promises to subscribe the debentures resigned in January, 1936. On July 26, 1936, a general meeting of the society was called at which a managing committee was elected. In the plaint the proceedings of this meeting are challenged. This election was for the years 1936-37-38. The next general meeting of the society was called on December 4, 1938. At that meeting eight persons were elected to the managing committee. They co-opted one member in April, 1939. The managing committee, on a consideration of the situation, resolved to borrow money from certain other parties and entered into an agreement with them for that purpose. The plaintiff started correspondence in which he challenged the advisability and legality of those acts. He challenged the constitution of the managing committee also. A requisition signed by eighteen members and dated September 24, 1939, was forwarded to the then existing managing committee which called a general meeting of the members on October 15, 1939. The requisition signed by the eighteen members showed a desire to pass four resolutions mentioned therein. They were to validate the election of the managing committee which had been functioning till then and their acts. A notice containing the four resolutions which were intended to be passed at the meeting was sent to each member on the register of the society. The meeting was held on October 15, 1939, at which twenty-four persons were present. The four resolutions mentioned in the notice and requisition were duly proposed and passed unanimously. The plaintiff then filed this suit on behalf of himself and the other members of the society except the defendants. The defendants are the nine members whose appointment to the managing committee was confirmed by the general meeting held on October 15, 1939. The following reliefs are asked for : that it may be declared that the defendants were not the duly elected members of the managing committee elected on July 26, 1936 ; that it may be declared that the loans raised by the defendants in their capacity as members of the managing committee of the society were unauthorised ; that the agreement of mortgage entered into by the defendants with Hirji Laxmidas was not binding and that the defendants may be restrained from completing the mortgage. The plaintiff further prayed that a managing committee be constituted for the society by and under the direction of this honourable Court, and for that purpose all necessary directions may be given for enrolment of members and framing a proper register of members of the society.

The defendants filed a written statement in which they denied that the meetings of 1936 and 1938 were improperly convened. According to them the managing committees elected at those meetings were properly elected. They further contended that the meeting of October 15, 1939, was properly convened and the resolutions passed at that meeting in any event validated the resolutions passed by the managing committee at the previous meetings and their acts. It was also contended in the written statement that the suit as framed was not maintainable.

Several issues were raised. At the commencement of the hearing it was pointed out to the plaintiff that if he persisted in challenging the election of the managing committee at the meeting of July 26, 1936, the suit must fail, because he was re-elected a member by the same managing committee. If therefore the plaintiff's contention was accepted, and there was no validly elected managing committee, the plaintiff could not be a member of the society and therefore he will have no right to maintain the suit. On considering this contention Mr. Amin intimated to the Court that the plaintiff did not challenge the proceedings of the general meeting of the society held on July 26, 1936, and gave up his contentions in respect of the same. He also did not dispute that the defendants were duly elected members of the managing committee for the years 1936-37-38. On that, issues Nos. 3, 5 and 6 must be answered against the plaintiff. The third issue was raised because two of the defendants were not elected at the meeting of July 26, 1936, and that issue became unnecessary.

The first question is whether the suit as framed is maintainable. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that the society was not a party to the suit. The allegations contained in the plaint amounted to an alleged irregularity in the internal management of the society. Taking them all together they did not amount to an allegation that the acts were ultra vires the society. They were all acts within the powers of the society. The only dispute raised by the plaint was whether, within the powers of the society, the managing body had acted according to its rules and by-laws. It was further argued on behalf of the defendants that as the society itself did not challenge the acts the question was one of the internal management of the affairs of the society and the Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit. If the society complained that the acts of the defendants were irregular and the society was not bound by the same, the position may be different. In such a case the Court can call a meeting of the members of the society and inquire whether the society, as a body approved of the challenged acts of the defendants or even if they were outside the powers of the defendants, but being within the scope of the society's affairs, it ratified the same. Such a situation cannot arise in this suit because the society was not a party to the litigation. The plaintiff relied on Nariman v. Municipal Corporation of Bombay<sup>1</sup> and Pender v. Lushington<sup>2</sup> to support his contention that the plaintiff alone was entitled to maintain the suit. In the former case the plaintiff alleged that an amendment to a certain proposition was moved and was declared lost by the casting vote of the chairman. The plaintiff contended that some of the councillors who voted at the aforesaid meeting were disqualified from voting by reason of s. 36 read with s. 16 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1888) and the decision of the chairman therefore that the aforesaid amendment was lost was incorrect. The Court held that the plaintiff had a right to file the suit and challenge the capacity of named councillors to vote at the meeting. It held that the decision of the chairman was not conclusive and it was the function of the Court to decide whether it was conclusive or not. In my opinion that decision does not help the plaintiff at all. The existence of the Municipal Corporation is recognised by a statute and the working of it is controlled by the different sections of the Act. Section 36 lays down how a meeting of the Corporation has to transact its business. If therefore there was any irregularity and non-observance of the provisions of the section, it was not within the competence of anybody to validate the irregularity or ratify the action irregularly done. Because there were imperative provisions in the Municipal Act for working the Corporation, any omission to act according to those provisions made the transaction ultra vires the corporation. In the present case it is not even suggested that the disputed acts are ultra vires the society.

Pender v. Lushington also does not help the plaintiff. In that case a shareholder of the company was prevented from voting at a meeting. He filed a suit and applied for an injunction. The facts showed that the company was a party to the litigation. That was clearly a case where the plaintiff's individual right was denied and his status as a member of the company was in dispute. That gives rise to an individual grievance and a remedy for that can be obtained in a Court of law. In the present case it is not suggested that the plaintiff was prevented from doing anything as a member of the society.

The position of a society registered under the Societies Registration Act is more like that of a club or a joint stock company. The position of members
